The Way to God Realization

[By Sj. Nimananda Das Adhicary B. Ag., B.T.]

FROM time immemorial investigations after truth are being made along two different lines—one the अवरोह पन्था or the way of descending where the conclusion directly follows from a cause or proposition, and the other the अधिरोह पन्था or the way of ascending where the conclusion is sought to be established by argument based on one's own experience.

In the first, deductive reasoning has been employed, and the investigation proceeds from the now inaccessible first principle to the known. In the second inductive reasoning has been employed, and the investigation proceeds from the known to the unknown. Those, who acknowledge the authority of God, have confidence in Him and His Acharyas or prophets and depend for their knowledge or Jnan upon His will or mercy, are the followers of the first, i.e. अवरोह पन्था. And their cult goes by the name of भक्ति or devotion. The three great religions, Hinduism, Mahamedanism and Christianity notwithstanding their differences with regard to the goal they propose to achieve, embrace भक्ति as the only means to attain the final goal.

The followers of the second, on the contrary, depend, for their knowledge, upon their own exertion. They do not acknowledge the authority of God, and very often deny it. They are called empiricists or elevationists. From so-called theists like the Karmin, the Yogin and the Jnanin down to avowed atheists like Charvaka and Epicurus are all but elevationists. The first three, for the sake of expediency, sometimes make a display of devotion ; but that is not to be confounded with real devotion or भक्ति

Of Karma, Yoga and Jnan the last is a great argumentative philosophy. The followers of this cult seek to establish a conclusion by an inverse argument—नेति नेति. Their absolute truth is Brahma without any attribute or guna and jiva, in reality, is Brahma. They are therefore popularly known as सोऽहंवादी. This class of thinkers are present among the Mahamedans also. They aim at ai-nal-huque i.e. oneness with God and are popularly known as sufis. Although the founder of the faith was mercilessly done to death as cafir, his faith is still existent.

Their argument is briefly this—jiva is albeit Brahma and nothing but Brahma, and, nothing short of him. But his ignorance that he is so, is due to maya which, according to them, means not it (ma=not and ya=it). The english equivalent of this word is illusion. This illusion is twofold,—the intrinsic and the extrinsic. If a man suddenly comes on a rope and takes it for a serpent, he is under the intrinsic illusion. But when he goes to describe that it is so long so thick, so coiled, he is under the influence of the extrinsic illusion. By the first the rope is taken for a serpent ; and by the second the properties of the rope, such as the length, the thickness, the position of the rope are attributed to the illusory serpent.

Thus the first kind of illusion relates to jiva's own self. Under its influence the jiva although Brahma, cannot think as such; or, in otherwords Brahma has forgotten Himself into a jiva. The second kind of illusion relates to the phenomenon of the earth. Under its influence the different names and forms, the different personalities and the individualities seem to have a reality of their own, to subsist by themselves, to exist by themselves, to be real on their own account.

But just as carbon appears in charcoal as well as in diamonds, so there is one divinity that manifests itself in all these different names and forms. If we can get beyond these names and forms, if we can rise above these, we shall see that we are everything.

Now let us discuss the merit of empiricism in the matter of investigation of the truth. Let us see if our intellect can at all triumph in this business. Take our senses through which the mind receives impulses from the external objects. These impulses are interpreted in the light of the experience of the senses and not in the light of the objects themselves ; or, in other words, we interpret things not as they are but as they appear to us. So Kant, a western thinker says, 'We know nothing about the external nature except as by the faculty of senses it is represented to us, and we take for granted the objects of our sense-perception.'

The senses are made up of five elements, and as such, they can bear witness to the elements only. Beyond that they cannot go, and, should not venture to go. The objects thus remain uninterpreted and unexplained. The thing in itself ever remains obscure to our intelligence.

Herbert Spencer, another great western thinker, comes to the very same conclusion. In his first principles 'The unknowable' he writes 'There must exist some principle which being the basis of science cannot be established by science.'

Now if this is true of a region that we see, how much more true it is of a region that we do not see and into which we have no access for the present. All reasoned-out conclusions must rest on some postulate, and to establish any such postulate with regard to the region now inaccessible, we must needs find a place in it where our intellect cannot go. Our intellect, although it has much to do in the empirical realms, is but completely helpless in the realms of metaphysics. The triumph of our intellect is thus apparent and not real. The empiricist simply founders himself against an ever impregnable region.

The Sruti rings a death-knell to all the pretensions of an empiricist when it says,

नायमात्मा प्रवचनेन लभ्यो
न मेधया न बहुना श्रुतेन ।
यमेवैष वृणुते तेन लभ्य-स्तस्यैष आत्मा विवृणुते तनुं स्वाम् ॥

which means excellent speech, intellect and vast learning in Sastras do not enable any body to realise Him. Only to him, whom He considers worthy, does He show Himself.

Now, why does not the empiricist triumph ? In the conclusions of some of the greatest western thinkers we have tried to give the reason. Now let us see what reasons our Sastras offer. We shall briefly allude to them.

Underlying all these names and forms we find jiva or soul or atma. Herein all agree. This jiva is a part and God Vishnu is the whole. Thus in Geeta Lord Krishna says,— ममैवांशो जीवलोके जीवभूतः सनातनः, which means jivas are my parts, and as such, they are eternal. These jivas are many and are very aptly compared with the sparks of fire, God Vishnu being compared with the fire itself. Jivas, like Vishnu, are eternal and spiritual, and, as His parts, ever existent. Vishnu is Sat-chit-ananda, and His parts possess in a proportionate degree all these attributes. The Bible and the Koran agree with the Geeta in the postdeath existence of jivas as seperate entities, as angels, along with God in heaven.

The greatest of all great teachers, Sri Gaur Sundar, who is Vishnu Himself, teaches us that jiva is jiva and Vishnu is Vishnu. Jiva can never be Vishnu nor can Vishnu forget Himself into a jiva. Forgetfulness is never the character of all-knowing Vishnu. Maya cannot have any influence over all-powerful Vishnu. He is above all, beyond all. He is the highest unchallangeable truth, and over the Lord of Maya.

Maya, according to Sri Gaur Sundar does not mean illusion as the Jnanis or Mayavadins understand, but is the अपर प्रकृति or the material aspect of God. This is divided into eight elements such as earth, water, fire, air, ether, mind, intellect and egotion, and is the cause of the phenomenon of this world.

Maya, although it does not enter into the composition of jiva which is, like Vishnu, entirely an atmic principle, does exercise influence over him when Vishnu desires it. As a result of this influence jiva, the real self, is made to put on two mortal garments. One of these garments is Sukshma Sharira or the subtle body which consists of mind, intellect and egotism, and the other, the Sthula sharira or the physical body which consists of the other five elements,—earth, water, fire, air and ether.

Jiva, in reality, is ever subject to his Lord Vishnu. His fundamental function is His service. But like his Lord he has a free will also. So long as he does not abuse his free will, he will ever remain conscious to his function towards his Lord. There will be no wavering, no breaking away from it. But whenever he has the misfortune to abuse it and assume the attitude of a master desiring to enjoy things for himself without rendering them unto his Lord, there is breaking away from it He then shows a mood to plunge into this world, and submits to endless torture from Mayadevi who is the presiding deity of this world. Mayadevi, at the command of Vishnu, her Lord, now wraps him up in the two mortal costumes above referred to, and casts her illusory gloom over him making him forget his real nature.

Oblivious of his true self jiva now identifies himself with these mortal garments or upadhis and designates himself at one time as a Hindu and at another time as a Mahamedan, at one time as a male and at another time as a female, at one time as a tree and at another time as a wild cat, and so on. There is no end of this false identifications. It is confined not to his own self only but is extended to all things that he sees around him. He is equally blind to the real nature of objects he sees. He accepts everything for his own enjoyment without at all referring it to Vishnu who is the undisputed Lord of all.

The apparent self that now originates from this false identification tries to obliterate the eternal line of demarcation between self and not-self, between chit and achit, between reality and non-reality. Although in essence pure and eternal, he now comes to think that he is subject to births and deaths. But in fact the true self never dies nor is it ever born. Births and deaths belong to his mortal garments only but not to him. They are attributed to him by the apparent self. In the same way it is wrong to say that a man in a running train moves. The man in fact does not move. It is the train that moves, and its movement is attributed to him by those who are not in the train. If we get in the train we cease to say that the man moves. In the same way we shake off this false assumption as soon as we return to ourselves. With the recovery of the self the not-self vanishes and with it all worldly afflictions do so.

Now what is the thinking principle in the apparent self ? Certainly it is the material mind. It is this material mind that hankers after wealth, fame and beauty of this world. It is ever imperfect, and is always guided by motive or desire. It cannot be made perfect any more than charcoal can be made white. And why ? Because it is an offspring of Maya. And as such it cannot be expected to overcome her influence. Whoever believes in its efficacy as a spiritual weapon is deceived. Mind never aims at a spiritual triumph, and we must not attribute any to it. On the contrary, our best endeavour should be made to extricate ourselves from its dangerous clutches

Hitherto, then, we have discussed, at a sufficient length, how we do not realise God. Now we propose to discuss how we realise God. It is needless to say that as soon as we realise our divine nature as servants of God, we realise Him. Realisation of God means the same thing as realisation of self.

For this let us refer to the scriptures of the three great religions —Hinduism, Mahamedanism and Christianity and see if they offer us any clue to the solution of this most important problem.

Let us take up the Bible first and see what Jesus, the son of God, says on the subject. At one time Jesus preached saying 'Ask, and it shall be given you ; seek and ye shall find ; knock and it shall be opened unto you.' (St. Mathew). Now how shall we knock that the door of heaven shall be opened unto us ? To this he replied saying, 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father ; and no man knoweth the son but the Father, neither knoweth any man the Father save the son, and he to whomsoever the son will reveal Him.' (St. Mathew).

At another time he said 'He that receiveth me receiveth Him that sent me.' (St. Mathew) 'Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father Which is in heaven.'

All these utterings clearly indicate that we are to depend, for our knowledge of God, upon somebody else. This somebody else must be a free man. He must be free from the bondage of Maya, otherwise how can he be expected to dispel Maya from others when he himself is subject to her Jesus has deprecated the idea of accepting leadership of such people speaking 'About the Pharisees who were offended with his teaching, he advised his disciples to neglect them saying 'Let them alone; they be blind leaders of the blind And if they blind, both shall fall into the ditch' (St. Mathew)

Now how to follow a spiritual guide? What are the qualifications that a disciple needs to follow him? Christ's utterings on this subject are clear. We shall briefly allude to a few such utterings He said,—

'The disciple is not above his master nor the servant above his Lord. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his Lord.' (St. Mathew)

'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it.' (St. Mathew)

'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me.' (St. Mathew)

From his conversation with a newcomer we may still more clearly understand what his following means. The new comer, a rich man, said unto him 'Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? He said 'You keep the commandments: * * * The man said, 'All these things have I kept from my youth up: what lack I yet? Jesus said unto him, 'If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me.'

The disciples of Christ taught the same thing. Paul, having found the people of Athens blindly worshiping God, said 'Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things you are too superstitious. For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an alter with this inscription, 'To the unknown God' whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you.' (The Acts)

Jhon in his first epistle writes:

"Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Fathe is not in him.'

'For all that is in the world the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he who doeth the will of God abideth for ever.'

'Whosoever abideth in Him, sinneth not ; whosoever sinneth hath not seen Him, neither known Him.'

In the Koran, the principal scripture of the Mahamedans we find an echo of these utterings of Bible. We shall briefly allude to a few such utterings there of and supplement them by the teaching of some of the best and acknowledged guides of that religion.

'Jelika fadlullahe eutihe, maiasaoo. (Koran)

This means that the acquirement of this knowledge (about God) solely depends upon His kindness. He gives it to him whom He chooses.

'Mai itiullaha a rasulahu kakad faj kaojan ajima.' (Koran)

This means that he, who carries out the orders of God and follows His prophet is sure to achieve the highest good.

'Manla sekha lahu fala khuhu Saitanun.' (Muhammad's own uttering)

This means that without guide none can follow God. Hence one, who is without guide, is guided by Satan.

'ai bachha iblis o adamruey hasto,
Pachh bahar dasto na bayed dade dasto.
(Anichhun Asekin)

This means that there move (on the earth) many Satans in the disguise of men. Therefore, you must not indiscreetly select any one as your spiritual guide.

'Tabo gupto goey bedari dari,
Tujay gupte khaba kaibuye buri,
(Moulana Rome)

This means that as dream is impossible so long as you talk, so you cannot see God, so long as you are attracted towards the things of the earth.

'Latulhikum amoalukum O aoladakum as jikari—Mahe O mai iak al jalika, fowla eka humul khahirun. (Koran)

This means that your property, wife and children should not turn you away from Me. Those, whom they do so, will surely be loser.

When we refer to our own scriptures, we shall find the same statements made in a more definite and elaborate manner.

In the Geeta Lord Krishna says,

दैवी ह्येषा गुणमयी मम माया दुरत्यया ।
मामेव ये प्रपद्यन्ते मायामेतां तरन्ति ते ॥

which means my divine maya is such as can hardly be overcome, only those, who follow Me, can overcome her.

Though we have forgotten Vishnu but He has not forgotten us. In His overflowing kindness He has disclosed to us, with the help of His prophets or acharyas, the way how to follow Him. Hence in the Mahabharat Yudhisthira, asked by Dharma in disguise of a crane, said 'महाजनो येन गतः स पन्थाः' that means that His acharyas only know Him, and, as such, the way, followed by them, is the way to reach Him.

These acharyas are angels in human form, and it is only for our guidance, for our salvation that they at times come down to grace the earth with the dust of their feet. Hence in the Srimad Bhagabat, the Prince of all Sastras, we find a warning given to us by Vishnu Who says,—

'आचार्यं मां विजानीयान्नावमन्येत कर्हिचित्। न मर्त्यबुद्ध्यासूयेत सर्वदेवमयो गुरुः' ॥

which means 'know not the acharyya as different from Me, never think little of him, nor grudge him as mortal in as much as he is all divinity in himself.'

Now who is this acharyya whom we shall follow and who will guide us? Answer to this question is found in Narad-pancharatra, which says,—

'महाकुलप्रसूतोऽपि सर्वयज्ञेषु दीक्षितः। सहस्रशाखाध्यायी च न गुरुः स्यादवैष्णवः' ॥

which means, a man, be he born of a very high caste, initiated into all kinds of yajna or sacrifices, well learned in thousand branches of knowledge, if not a Vaishnava, cannot act as a guru or spiritual guide.

And why? Because only a Vaishnava believes in the existence of Vishnu acknowledges His authority as a supreme Lord, and, ever abides by it. Only he, and none else, propitiate Him. Vishnu, in turn, loves him most and exalts him by raising him to his former glory as His fellow and servant. Hence in Naradpancharatra Siva says to Narada 'न वैष्णवात् परो ज्ञानी', which means, there is none wiser than a Vaishnava. The worldteacher, Sri Gaur Sundar discloses the qualifications of a guru in the following words, which means, whosoever, acquainted with the mysteries of Lord Krishna, can be a spiritual guide. It does not matter whether he is a Brahmin or a Sannyasin or a Sudra.

'किबा विप्र किबा न्यासी शूद्र केने नय।

It is by the acceptance of the lead of such Vaishnavas that an honest disciple can expect to achieve the highest good. Leadership of others, notwithstanding their pretensions, is sure to bring disappointment to the followers. The latter, when they will see that their life-long endeavour has not moved them an inch towards the goal, rather has made them recede afar off, will come to woe, and gnash their teeth to find that it is too late for them.

Now, what is the necessity for such an extraneous help? Cannot a man by his own effort regain what he has himself lost? It has been argued before that he cannot. He needs the assistance of a guide. Hence in Srimad Bhagabat we find a passage, which means, it is not possible for a man, eternally enveloped by ignorance, to realise his self without the assistance of others who are in the know.

'अनाद्यावद्यायुक्तस्य पुरुषस्यात्मवेदनम्। स्वतो न सम्भवेदन्यत्तत्त्वज्ञो ज्ञानदो भवेत' ॥

Who are, then, those that accept their lead and that do not? In the Padmapuran we find a passage which runs thus,

द्वौभूतसर्गौ लोकेऽस्मिन दैवआसुर एव च। विष्णुभक्तो भवेद्दैव आसुरस्तद्विपर्ययः ॥ which means, there are always two classes of men on earth, devas and asuras. Those who worship Vishnu are devas and these who do not are asuras. The same two classes go by the names of 'the children of God' and 'the children of the devil' in Bible. The passage runs thus—

'In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother'. Chap 2. 1st epistle of John.

The children of God, the devas realise the necessity of worshipping Him and therefore go for this assistance; where as the children of devils the asuras do not want to worship Him and therefore do not go for it. To talk of such assistance before these people is simply to excite their laughter and court dishonour.

In the Srimad Bhagabat when Hiranyakashipu, who for his hatred of Vishnu, has been described as asura, brought his son Prahlad to look for his devotion to Vishnu and was about to chastise him for it, Prahlad told him

न ते विदुः स्वार्थगतिं हि विष्णु दुराशया ये बहिरर्थमानिनः।
अन्धा यथान्धैरुपनीयमाना
स्तेपीशतन्त्र्यामुरुदाम्नि बद्धा ॥

which means, the people, who choose to be guided by the wicked and whose mind is captivated by lust after such things as wealth, fame, beauty etc. of this world, can never appreciate the service of Vishnu as being the eternal function of the soul. They, like the blind led by the blind, go astray, and in consequence, become still more tightly fastened with the ropes of Vishnu's Maya.

Hence bhakti or devotion is the only way to God realisation. Besides this there is no other way open unto jivas thus entangled in the snares of Maya. The so-called ways—karma, yoga, jnan and such others are but few traps with fascinating baits thereon, whereby maya wants to tighten her terrible grip on those, who are unfortunate enough to be allured by them. Hence Sri Gaur Sundar says,

कृष्णभक्ति हय अभिधेय प्रधान।
भक्तिमुख निरीक्षक कर्म्म योग ज्ञान ॥
एइ सब साधनेर अति तुच्छ फल।
कृष्णभक्ति बिना ताहा दिते नारे बल ॥

Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita

which means that Krishna bhakti or devotion to Krishna isthe only means where-by God-ralisation is possible. The fruits that karma, yoga and jnan yield are but very trifling and even these they are not capable to yield independently without the co-operation of bhakti.

Bhakti or service of God, as has been said before, is the fundamental function of jiva, and he is glorified only when he regains the service which he has lost through his own fault..

Hence he must begin with service hereon earth, and the service during his sojourn will lead him, at its close, to His service in Baikuntha, his permanent abode, where he will reside through eternity as His associate and servant in form of an angel.

During his terestrial existence jiva cannot directly serve God. But neverthe less his whole hearted and sincere service rendered unto representative or guru on earth will hasten his goal by enabling him to overcome the influence of maya, and he will even while on earth, enjoy the pleasure of serving Him in Baikuntha, or in otherwords, he will bring down the transcendental kingdom on earth. Hence Sri Gaur Sundar says, which means that if jiva, hereon earth, becomes devoted to Krishna and serves guru, the spiritual guide, he will be able to cut through the snares of maya and regain His service.

ताते कृष्ण भजे करे गुरुर सेवन।
मायाजाल छुटे पाय कृष्णेर चरण॥

This guru must evidently be a true phrophet or a representative of God, otherwise the service rendered unto a false prophet or guru will defeat its purpose. The present world is full of these false prophets and we must beware of them lest we shall fall into their trap and lose everything.

In conclusion, we are very sanguine to note that the marvellous agreement of the statements made on this subject by the great teachers appearing on earth at different times and places, and, their solemn confirmation by the holy deeds of the subsequent leaders or gurus, have left us no shade of doubt with regard to the efficiency of bhakti as the way to God realisation, and have enforced us to think that while going by it, we are not embarking ourselves upon uncertainty, and, God blessing us, we are sure to veer our barks of life, under the instruction of our pilot, the guru, dash all shoals of errors and difficulties, into the heaven of truth and delight.

Om Hari Om

THE offence against the holy Name according to the Padma purana is tenfold, viz.—(1) Scandalizing sadhus augments one's offence against the Name, because the Lord's Name (Sri Krishna) cannot brook the slander of those sadhus who always take the holy Name and preach the glory of the Name to the world. So calumny of sadhus is a grave offence against the holy Name ; (2) those who think that Vishnu is quite different from His Name, Form, Qualities and Actions ; or those who consider the gods such as Shiva etc. as rivals,that is independent of, or identical with, the Supreme Lord Vishnu, commit an offence against the holy Name ; (3) those who consider that Sri Gurudeva who possesses the true knowledge of the Name is a being of this world and find fault with him in the belief that he is an erring mortal, thereby commit offence against the holy Name ; (4) denouncing the Vedas and the Vaishnava (सात्वत) Puranas is an offence against the holy Name ; (5) to think that the glorification of the Name of Hari is exaggeration of praise is an offence against the holy Name ; (6) it is an offence against the Name to think that the Names of Godhead Himself are fictitious, unreal and imaginary ; (7) it is an offence against the holy Name to commit sinful acts fortified by the belief that the taking of the Name will destroy those sins and such offence cannot certainly be expiated by such practices as abstinence, strict observance of rituals, meditation, contemplation, penances and austerities, artificial yogic processes etc. etc ; (8) out of ignorance or perversity to consider the taking of the Name which is spiritual as equal or similar to non-spiritual good works such as performance of moral duties, vowed observances, renunciation or sacrifices (होमादि) etc., is an offence against the holy Name ; (9) imparting religious instruction to persons who are atheistical or are opposed to listening to the Name, is an offence against the blessed holy Name ; (10) finally he who after having listened to the marvellous power and glory of the holy Name, being engrossed in selfish worldly enjoyments and identifying the soul with the physical or mental body does not evince regard or liking for hearing or taking the holy Name, also commits offence against the holy Name of Krishna.

It has already been stated that Sriman Mahaprabhu instructs the fallen jivas to follow the method of "तृणादपि सुनीच" etc. (see ante) for attaining the eligibility of chanting the holy Name of Krishna. Those who have taken shelter at the holy feet of Sri Chaitanya and Nityananda (Sri Chaitanya's Associated Counterpart) and have accepted them as their Lords, shed tears out of love for Krishna on sincerely taking the pure Name in accordance with the above-mentioned sloka 'तृणादपि' etc. We have stated just now that those who commit offence against the holy Name, fail to obtain the favour of Sri Krishna. But Sri Gauranga and Nityananda favour even offenders. An offender by taking the holy Name never obtains the love of Krishna, his final object. Those who follow Sri Gauranga and Nityananda as their Lords by constantly taking Their Names during the period of offence, attain the fruit of the holy Name after being thereby liberated from the sinful state. The truth underlying the above is that the offending novice betakes himself to the holy feet of Sri Gauranga and Nityananda for becoming fit to serve Krishna by getting rid of his ignorance (अविद्या) viz. forgetfulness of his real nature (स्वरूपभ्रम) ; also the holy Name of Krishna, which can only be taken by those who have realised their true self, are free from all offence and are ever engaged in serving Krishna, being chanted by a novice full of offence, never yields its fruit viz. the love of Krishna. For this reason the worship of Sri Gauranga and Nityananda is more important and essential for the jiva in the fallen state than the worship of Krishna which is possible only in the free state. The novice is sure to commit offence due to want of spiritual training if he takes the holy Name like one liberated. But in worshipping Sri Gauranga and Nityananda, the two world-teachers, if one betakes himself to Their holy feet even in the sinful state but without the pretence of being free, him Sri Gauranga and Nityananda enable to realise Their own Form(Krishna) and His Manifestation (Baladeva) by freeing him from Ignorance (अविद्या) whereby the jiva attains the knowledge of his ownself and of the relation that subsists between Sri Gauranga-Nityananda and himself (स्वरूपज्ञान).

To sum up, the knowledge of the relationship between Krishna and the jiva constitutes the first stage in spiritual endeavour. Sri Krishna is the Supreme Lord, ever-existent, spiritual and full of all transcendental bliss. All jivas are His eternal servants. They are also, in their real nature, beings that are ever-existent, spiritual and full of transcendental bliss. But fallen jivas are ignorant of their real nature and are given to selfish enjoyment of material pleasures. For their deliverance from the clutches of the illusory power, the holy Name has appeared in this world. The holy Name of Sri Krishna being spiritual, is identical with Sri Krishna Himself. The chanting of the holy Name with the knowledge of relationship is the only form of the service of Krishna that is available to fallen jivas and by its means they are enabled to attain the only object of their existence viz. the love of Krishna. It will thus appear that relationship with Krishna (सम्बन्ध) enabling us to serve Krishna by chanting His holy Name (अभिधेय) leading to love of Krishna (प्रयोजन), constitutes the basis of the whole field of our spiritual endeavour. The jiva is the eternal servant of Sri Krishna. The fallen jiva who is ignorant of this relationship, after being delivered from ignorance, takes the Name of Sri Krishna whereby he is enabled to attain the only object of his existence viz. the love of Sri Krishna (प्रेमा). Therefore, selfknowledge is relationship (सम्बन्ध), taking the holy Name is the means (अभिधेय), and love of Krishna (प्रेमा) is the object of our endeavours (प्रयोजन).

The holy Name appearing in the heart dances on the lips of one who listens constantly and with undivided attention to the glories of the holy Name embodying the above-mentioned relationship, method and object of endeavour from the lips of a spiritual preceptor. The object of the Vedanta is to acquaint us with the knowledge of the only Reality, or, in other words, the Source, the One containing and pervading all decimal parts. Inside this Unit are disposed in their due proportion and respective positions the positive or negative relations of the component decimal parts. The devotee is related to the object of his worship by means of the quality of his devotion. In cases where the devotion is lax there is proportional substitution of the worship of part for the worship of the whole. The severence of relationship with the enveloping object of worship of the dependant decimal power due to laxity of the devotional instinct, is forgetfulness of self or aversion to the service of Hari. Hence the ineligibility of those for the study of the Brahmasutra who, proud of their knowledge of the Scriptures, refuse to betake themselves to the holy feet of the spiritual preceptor. Those who are devoid of the quality of devotion to God and engrossed in non-spiritual objects in their endeavour to find out the object of worship do not follow the spiritual preceptor who has dedicated himself to the service of God. Discipleship is necessary because the fallen jivas are ignorant of God Whose holy feet the Vedas are ever engaged in serving. The possessor of merely phenomenal knowledge is, indeed, ignorant of the Being to know Whom is the object of the Vedanta. The so-called truth which presents itself to those who are deluded by empiricism, is dependent on external perception and belongs to the sphere of nescience (अपरा विद्या).

Those that are not eligible for taking the holy Name, being devoid of the conviction that the holy Name is identical with the Bearer of the Name, tend to become illusionist-Vedantists (मायावादी वैदान्तिक). They are really very foolish from the spiritual point of view. This foolishness or neutralisationism is due to the study of the Vedanta by the inductive method.

Ignorant psilanthropists (सहजिया), vain of their pseudo-Vaishnavism, affect to regard the Vedanta as the hunting-ground of the pure monists who are worshippers of the Ego; but the Vedanta is really the exclusive sphere of the transcendental devotees of Hari. The Vedantist dissertations from the pens of the Vaishnava Acharyyas of the four schools in conformity with the Srimad Bhagabat, the commentary of the Brahmasutra, are not to be discarded as evil company. This simple proposition is not grasped by the psilanthropists. As the result of this they are doomed to perdition by imagining the unalloyed devotion of really pure Vaishnavas and Vaishnava Acharyyas to be perverted or in other words, adulterated with pantheistic knowledge (ज्ञान)or fruitive and remunerative actions (कर्म्म), with the result that they themselves degenerate into illusionists missing the worship of Vishnu. By the empiric knowledge of the Vedanta the significance of repeating Krishna-mantra is not realised. Those who happen to be bewitched by empiric knowledge are also inextricably bound to the phenomenal world. The cross-threads of enjoyer and object of enjoyment being enabled to bind them to this world prevent them from restraining their thoughts of external objects.

When the jiva attains transcendental knowledge then only being freed from every nonspiritual pre-occupation he employs himself in serving transcendental God. The service of God is the only method as well as the object of the renunciation of the activities of the external world. Being freed from the knowledge of the external, enjoyable, material world by the gradual realisation of the transcendental, due to constant repetition of the mantra to oneself, the object of worship is realised in the spiritually enlightened heart of the devotee by dint of the latter's loving service under the lead of any one of the five kinds of attachment to Krishna in conjunction with excitants, (उद्दीपन) Such activity is not mere enjoyment of the twin external cases. As soon as the person chanting holy Name is really established in the realised state of transcendental knowledge viz. that the holy Name and its Possessor are identical, he attains the direct service of Krishna. There is then no strict necessity of using the grammatical dative in his prayers. The Absolute Reality itself which is the object of his address then becomes directly manifest in the spiritually enlightened heart. Then the eligibility of serving God unhampered by means of the vocative is attained. All the Shastras and all the mantras embodying the transcendental knowledge, by freeing the jiva in every way, employ him in this direct service of Krishna. The study, teaching and discussion of Srimad Bhagabat etc., as steps leading to the worship of the holy Name according to the statement of Sri Vyasadeva viz. "लोकस्याजानतो विद्वांश्चक्रे सात्वत संहितां", end in the realisation of the significance of the service of the holy Name. The transcendental knowledge obtained from Sri Gurudeva is nothing but this —that the holy Name and its Possessor are identical and capable of being known only by those who are free from wordly endeavours. I am ignorant of my relationship with God before I have betaken myself to the holy feet of Sri Gurudeva ; but since when I decide to serve him I am increasingly enabled to realise the difference between the free and the fallen states. Krishna's Name has not been used in this connection to signify either the dim perception of the Name or offence against the holy Name.

In the three Yugas of Satya, Treta and Dvapara, the scriptural method was held in due estimation; but with the advent of Kali un-canonical or the rationalistic method (तर्कपन्था) has come to prevail. The rise of the rationalistic mode is due to the predominance of empiric, inductive or purely ascending knowledge breeding doubt regarding the descent of the Absolute Reality. This ascending method is opposed to that of the scriptures. Krishna's Name being unlimited and spiritual is absolutely identical with the spiritual Reality viz. Sri Krishna Himself. The holy Name and its Possessor being identical, the Absolute Holy Name, like the Absolute Reality Krishna Himself, is also the eternal, pure, indivisible, free embodiment of spiritual bliss and the transcendental philosopher's stone (चिन्तामणि). As distinct from those worldly names that are other than Krishna, the holy Name is Sri Krishna Himself. The rationalistic thinker is thus barred from all access to it. It is only by serving the holy Name that the functions of the twin gross and subtle cases are ended. For this reason, during the prevalence of the rationalistic method all limited methods find themselves thwarted by rationalism. But the holy Name is the Absolute Reality that lies beyond the scope of rationalism. The Name of the unlimited Reality being alone capable of freeing the jiva from the clutches of the mental function which is given to speculations of material enjoyment, is the essence of all the mantras. The name, form, quality, existence and function of material objects are the subjects of rationalistic thought, but the unlimited Reality is not so. The Name, Form, Quality, the Characteristic traits of Servitors and Activities of the Absolute Name are sphered in the region of absolute, indivisible knowledge. The Illusionists (मायावादी) fall into the error of dualism by postulating difference between the Name, Form and Quality of the Absolute Reality. It is for this reason that their Acharyya has sought to rescue them from empiricism by such basic assertions as—'the spirit alone existed in the beginning' (सदेव सौम्येदमग्र आसीत्), 'everything in this world is Brahman' (सर्वं खल्विदं ब्रह्म) etc. Without taking Refuge at the feet of the holy Name and by offending against the Name it is never possible to be freed from materialistic rationalism wedded to selfish worldly enjoyment.

"By Krishna-mantra freedom from worldly affinities will be gained—by Krishna's Name the holy feet of Sri Krishna will be attained." The process is thus explained by Sri Jiva Goswami in his Kramasandarbha—"प्रथमं नाम्नः श्रवणमन्तःकरण शुद्धयर्थमपेक्ष्यमिति" etc. The passage may be rendered thus—'For the purification of the heart it is necessary first of all to listen to the chanting of the holy Name. After the heart has been purified by listening to the holy Name the fitness for the manifestation of the holy Form (श्रीरूप) is attained on hearing recital of Scriptural accounts of the holy Form. After the full appearance of the holy-Form the holy Qualities (श्रीगुण) manifest themselves. After the appearance of the holy Qualities, due to the characteristic traits of Servitors, the knowledge of the distinctive and perfect identification of the devotee arises. Subsequent to this, after the full manifestation of the Name, Form, Quality, Servitor has taken place, the transcendental activity (लीला) of God manifests itself. For this purpose this account of the successive stages in spiritual endeavour is written. In the matter of kirtana and smarana (recollection) also this sequence holds good. This hearing of the holy Name, if it is obtained from the holy lips of a spiritual preceptor (सद्गुरु), gives the highest happiness to devotees ; if it be otherwise it is sure to be productive of evil."

When Sri Gurudeva chants the holy Name the Name chanted by him enters the ear of the disciple. In obedience to Sri Gurudeva, and placing the holy Name with reverence in the heart, the disciple adores it by the method of repetition (जप). The holy Name being thus worshipped, manifesting its activity of self-exercised power, confers on the worshipper (कीर्त्तनकारी) the capacity of chanting the Name. On the attainment of this stage the devotee is able to convert the world to discipleship by chanting the holy Name. The world, ruled by the power of the kirtan of the Name, begins to repeat Krishna's Name. By such repetition the methods of adoration of the holy Name manifest themselves in one who thus repeats the Name in the forms of laughter, crying, dancing and singing. The holy Name and Sri Krishna being identical, by the power of repetition of the Name, the instinct of the service of the Absolute Reality, Sri Krishna is, aroused—this being known as 'bhava'. Those in whom 'bhava' has been aroused are no longer enthralled by the bonds of ignorance and are not sinful. They are imbued with attachment for Krishna, and therefore, taste the elixir of bliss that is produced in conjunction with the four-fold ingredients (सामग्री). The concentrated state of 'bhava' is love of Krishna (प्रेमा).

—(चै: च: आदि ७।७३)

UP till then the purpose of samkirtan was unknown to the generality of people of this world. It was by the agency of Thakur Haridas that God manifested to the world the holy mystery of the samkirtan. At the time of his residence at Fulia, Haridas made known to the people the kirtan of Hari or the taking of the Name of Hari with a loud voice. This at once produced a most peculiar up-heaval in the world that was averse to Hari. Many among the people were of opinion that all the objects of human life were gained by being simply born in a Brahman family as the result of meritorious deeds, and that, therefore, the kirtan of Hari was superfluous. They held that only such a person who was a Brahman by birth, —and no one of those who were born in any other caste even though such a person might really be a Brahman in the true sense, that is to say might be spiritually enlightened,—was fit to perform the kirtan of Hari ;—and considered as opposed to the injunction of the holy scriptures the chanting of the Name of Hari, or seeing the holy Image of Hari, during the four months of His rest ;—also that it was against the scriptures to sing the kirtan of Hari on any but Hari's day i.e. the eleventh day of each fortnight ;—that famines and other natural calamities visited the earth owing to the wrath of God being aroused by the kirtan of Hari chanted at improper times by ineligible persons ! While these controversies were in full swing, without paying any heed to such disputations, Haridas was engaged in doing good to the world by his performance of the kirtan of Hari. Sri Chaitanyadeva, Divine Love Himself, had not yet appeared in the world and showered the blessing of transcendental love on the parched hearts of the peoples of India when Haridas was manifesting such kindness to jiva, in utter disregard of the bitter protests of those who were averse to the service of God.

Sri Thakur Haridas, having now the devoted support of Prabhu Advaita, was busily occupied in organising the kirtan of Krishna at Fulia, Santipur, Nadia and the other towns On the night when Sri Gour Sundar was born, Thakur Haridas in the company of Sri Advaita, in the latter's Santipur house, danced, in ecstasy of kirtan at the advent of the Most Loving Lord, through the early part of that Falgun evening. Another day he accepted the dishes offered at funeral by Sri Advaita in vindication of the ideal of the true Brahman. Sri Advaita Prabhu, truly and profoundly learned in the smriti sastras, fully aware of the fact that there did not really exist in the kali age such pure Brahmans to whom one could offer the dedicated food at the social dinner, on the occasion of the performance of the last rites of his departed father, instead of giving those dishes as was the custom recommended by the smritis to tiny figures of Brahmans made of Kusa grass, most appropriately and successfully accomplished the feeding of Brahmans by offering the dishes to Sri Thakur Haridas. The offering by Sri Prabhu Advaita of the dishes of the prasadam of the Lord of sacrifices to prabhu Haridas on whose pure lips danced every night and day three lacs of the unalloyed Name of Hari in recognition of him as a true, spiritually enlightened, Brahman, undoubtedly constitutes one of the very highest precedents that have always been followed by the later devotees of the holy feet of Sri Chaitanya. It is a conclusive proof of the spiritual life led by the Vaishnavas that, without subscribing to the creed of those who put their trust in the efficacy of materialistic rites in conformity with their spiritual faith as the most essential part of their funeral observances, they always worship the pitris with the prasadam of Hari and please the spiritually enlightened Brahmans. Sri Advaita Prabhu daily offered the alms of the prasadam of Hari to Haridas with the remark 'by your acceptance of this food crores of Brahmans are fed.'

It was during the period of his residence at Fulia that one moon-lit night Maya devi herself, whose womb is the pot of this universe, the great mother of the world, appeared before Haridas as he was engaged in the performance of samkirtan. The place was illuminated by her extraordinary beauty, all sides were filled with the sweet perfume of the most exquisite scents and the ear was thrilled by the tinkling sound of the rarest ornaments. The holy Thakur was at the time completely under the spell of the bliss of the Name of Krishna. Mayadevi coming up to the Thakur said, "You are the friend of the world. You have beauty and every good quality, I ardently long for the favour of your intimacy. It is never the nature of the good to reject any one." At these dissembling words of Mayadevi the heart and senses of the profoundly reserved and un-impressionable Haridas, instead of being disturbed, became all the more absorbed in the samkirtan of the holy Name. He told Devi, "I hold the samkirtan of the alloted number of the Name as the great sacrifice; and, as sacrificing Brahman at the yajna of the Name, I have to take daily the full number of the Name. I am, therefore, unable to take up any other work till the full number is completed. Be seated at the door-step and listen to my kirtan. Your object will be fulfilled after you have listened to the end." Continuing to sing the kirtan Thakur Haridas passed successively the three divisions of the night and the approaching hours of dawn and at last beheld the sun rise in the morning. Mayadevi still waited for the return of another night. In this way, waiting on the Thakur's favour through the three divisions of three successive nights, having failed to delude Thakur Haridas, she at last announced herself to him. Devi said, "You are a great devotee of God. By seeing you and listening to your kirtan of Krishna my purified mind is eager to take the Name of Krishna. I beseech your favour. Instruct me regarding Krishna." And, then, making her obeisance to him, she continued, "I am Maya. I came to test you. I succeeded in deluding all jivas, even Brahma, with the single exception of yourself whom alone I have failed to bewitch. The Name of Rama I obtained formerly from Siva. By associating with you I feel impelled to take the Name of Krishna." Haridas, thereupon, bade her sing the samkirtan of Krishna. No one need be surprised that Mayadevi herself made love to one whom she recognised as superior to all her seductions.

CHAPTER III.

Summary :—In this chapter are described the appearance of Sriman Mahaprabhu after the previous manifestation of the samkirtan of Hari under the guise of eclipse, the examination of the conjuncture of the stars at the birth of Bisvambhar in the form of Infant, the rejoicings at Misra's house and the glories of the birth-tithis of Vishnu and Vaishnavas.

The advent of the Lord was preceded by an eclipse of the moon on which occasion all the people in accordance with old custom bathe in the Ganges chanting aloud, all the time the eclipse lasts, the Name of Hari. This manifestation of samkirtan by all the people of Nadia was the fitting prelude to the birth of the Lord Himself. Sachi and Jagannath were overwhelmed by the un-rivalled beauty of the child. The great astrologer Nilambar Chakravarti discovered the signs of the Sovereign paramount on examining the planetary conjunctions at the Lord's birth. His finding was corroborated by a Brahman-seer who accidentaly turned up and declared that the child is Narayana Himself, the Saviour of the world and the Establisher of all religion. He said further that the child will be a unique preacher of the religion, will bestow on all without distinction that religion which is coveted by Siva, Suka, Narada and those like them, will shower His mercy on all jivas, will be loved and revered by the whole world, and of other transcendental qualities of the Boy. The Brahman also announced that the Boy, like the yuga—Incarnation of Vishnu, will declare the Divine Dispensation for the kali age and will win the reverence of Yavanas whose minds will be softened towards Him. The chapter closes with a graphic description of the merriments in the Misra's house and all over Nabadvipa at the birth of the Lord and a short discourse on the edifying effects of the observance of the birth-tithis of Vishnu and Vaishnavas.

Burden of Song (एकपदी)

1 The jewels of the treasure of love on sale !
Behold the fair of Gorachand !

2 Thus the Lord appeared,
Manifesting previously the Samkirtan of Hari.

3 The people seeing the eclipse ran in all directions,
And, shouting 'Hari' all hastened to bathe in the Ganges.

4 Whose mouths had never, in all their lives, uttered once the name of Hari,
Having first bathed in the Ganges, shouted out incessantly the name of Hari.

5 There arose a perpetual chant of Hari filling the ten directions
As the best of the twice-born appearing smiled.

6 Sachi and Jagannath beholding their Son's sweet face Looked as it were the very image of joy.

7 What was necessary to do on such occasion occurred to no one,—
The ladies in their perplexity jubilantly shouted "Victory be Thine"!

8 All the relatives presently arrived in great hurry,
Jagannath's house was filled with joy.

9 Sachi's father, Nilambar Chakravarty,
A renowned Brahman, found all conjunctions of the stars presaged wonderful future for the child.

10 All conjunctures pointed to sovereignty ;
And Chakravarty also marvelled at the beauty of the Boy.

11 "A Brahman will be king in Gauda", so ran the prophecy,
Said the Brahman,"If this be he, we shall know."

12 The Brahman, a great astrologer, in the hearing of all,
Bluntly spoke out the indications of the stars.

13 "By the conjunctures the greatness of the Boy Appears as that of sovereign paramount ;—
indeed, I find no words to describe Him.

14 "In learning He will surpass Brihaspati,
And, with little effort, will possess all good qualities."

15 And on the spot, in the form of a Brahman, a Seer
Thus declared the future of the Lord —

16 The Brahman said, "This child is Narayan Himself ;
He will establish all religion ;

17 "He will spread the religion as it was never spread before ;
This Child will deliver the whole world.

18 "That which is at all time desired by Brahma, Siva, Suka,
All will obtain from Him.

19 "At sight of Him every one will attain Kindness for all beings, indifference to pleasure and pain ; Him all the world will love.

20 "Not to mention all, even Yavanas, who are the foes of Vishnu,
Will serve the feet of this child.

21 "In all the endless worlds His praise will be sung,
All, even the Brahmans, will prostrate themselves before this Child.

22 "He is the body itself of the Bhagabata religion,
Patient, and loyal to the gods and Brahmans toward preceptor and parents ;

23 "Like unto the manifestation of Vishnu, persuading all to religion,
Will be all the doing of this Child.

24 "The auspicious indications that the starry combinations disclose of Him
Who has power to fully explain ?

25 "Supremely blest art Thou, great Misra, and most fortunate,
My obeisance to thee whose son is this Child.

26 "What rare fortune is mine to have calculated such horoscope !
His Name will be Sri Bisvambhar.

27 "People will call Him 'Navadvipachandra ; Know this Boy as the Embodiment of transcendental and un-alloyed joy."

28 Lest the news introduce a jarring note of sadness
The Lord's renunciation was left unsaid.

29 Jagannath Misra having learnt the future of his son,
Overpowered with joy, bethought of some suitable gift for the Brahman ;

30 But there was nothing that he might give away, being utterly poor ; and yet, for very joy,
Clasping the feet of the Brahman the good Misra burst into tears and sobbed aloud.

31 That Brahman also wept holding the feet of Jagannath ;
And all the assembled people in deep ecstasy cried 'Hari, Hari'.

32 Listening to the Divine horoscope all kinsfolk,
As an auspicious act, sang aloud the glories foretold of the Child ;

33 The musicians arriving just at that moment
Made a great concert with mridanga, sanai and flute.

34 The consorts of the gods could not be distinguished from the wives of men,
And the gods and men got mixed up with one another.

35 The mother of the gods herself taking corn and a few blades of durba in her right hand, Placed them on the Lord's head and smiling said 'Live Thou for ever !'

36 "May Thou be eternally manifest in the word", she meant
It was this that made her smile in uttering the formula of benediction.

37 Sachidevi noticed the presence of ladies of wondrous beauty,
But no one durst accost them.

38 The goddesses took the dust of Sachi's feet, for excess of joy,
But Sachi, found no words to greet them.

39 The joy that manifested itself in Jagannath's house
Even Ananta himself fails to describe in the Veda.

40 All the people witnessed it in Sachi's house and over all Nadia,
No words can express the joy that prevailed;

41 In the streets, in every house, on the bank of the Ganges,
All the people incessantly chanted the Name of Hari.

42 Thus the Lord's birth occurring at night during the eclipse,
Was observed with highest festivities but no one could know!

43 The festival of the birth of Chaitanya falls on the full-moon eve of the month of Falgun,
To the tithi everyone, even Brahma himself, pays adoration.

44 Verily, the holiest of tithis is devotion's own pureself.
When the Prince of all Brahmanas appeared in the world.

45 Nityananda was born on the thirteenth day of the bright fortnight of Magh, Gaurchandra appeared on the full-moon eve of Falgun.

46 Auspicious for all undertakings are these two holy tithis,
Into these two merge every propitious conjunction of the stars.

47 For this reason if these two tithis are honoured
Devotion to Krishna is produced, the bondage of ignorance ends.

48 The sanctity that belongs to the tithi of the advent of the Lord Himself, Attaches in equal measure to the birth-day of a Vaishnava.

49 Who listens to this account of the appearance of Gaur chandra
Is never afflicted with sorrow in life or death.

50 Listening to the story of Chaitanya yields the fruit of devotion,
And companionship of Chaitanya at every successive birth.

51 This story of the first part is most pleasing to hear
Wherein is narrated the advent of Gaur-chandra.

52 There is no interval of these Divine pastimes,
The Veda only tells of their manifestation and disappearance.

53 I find neither begining nor end of Chaitanya's Story,
By His grace I write what He makes me say.

54 My obeisance at the feet of Gaur-chandra with His devotees,
May I commit no offence through this.

55 Sri Krishna-Chaitanya, the life of Nityananda-chand,
At Whose twin feet sings Brindabandas.

Propaganda Topics

(Communicated)

THIS year has been a very glorious one for the people of the United Provinces. More than four hundred years have elapsed since the soil of this ancient province was sanctified by the touch of the holy feet fo Sriman Mahaprabhu Chaitanya Deva when He passed through that part of India on His ever memorable journey to Sri Brindaban. Now, after so many years has the country been again blessed by the kind visit of His Associated-Counterpart,—the great Paramhansa Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj. Yes, blessed must be the land through which the Bhakta passes and twice blessed are the people who have the opportunity to see him do so. It is undoubtedly a special privilege to have the happy occasion of hearing the words of a Suddha Bhakta and it is given to the lot of a selected few to be able to follow the words. The good fortune of these choicest few is surely to be envied.

Benares :—With more than one hundred disciples and his beloved counterpart Sripad Kunja Behari Vidyabhusan the Paramhansa Maharaj visited Benares in the middle of Aswin. Every nook and corner of that ancient town began to be vibrated with the auspicious sound of Mridanga and Hari-Kirtan for fifteen days continually. Lectures were daily delivered at the famous Dasaswamedh Ghat where thousands of eager people, both local and visitors coming from different provinces of India, completely overcrowded the whole of the extensive space from top to the water-edge and drank deep from the nectar-flow of Hari kirtan coming out from the holy lips of Suddha Bhaktas. It was really a rare sight to witness how innumerable persons, young and old, ladies and gentlemen, dressed in different styles and costumes would gather together and listen spell-bound to the most enlightening delineations of Suddha Bhakti. The exquisite elucidations of the abstruse questions of philosophy, in perfect harmony with all the Sastras, bythe editor of the Gaudiya, were listened with great profit by many ; and the very charming speeches of the eloquent Srimad Swami Bhakti Hriday Ban was highly inspiring to everyone present.

In the Sanatan Gaudiya Math would Srila Paramhansa Goswami Maharaj explain every evening those famous chapters of Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita called Sanatan-Siksha to hundreds of audience overwhelmed with awe and admiration. These chapters contain the most intricate philosophy and intention of Suddha Bhakta in all those dissertations was explicitly interpreted to a letter by His Holiness in a variety of unique ways possible only from direct realisation of Truth.

Then came the memorable day, the 2nd of October, when the charming holy Images of Sriman Mahaprabhu and of Giridharigandharbica were for the first time installed at Benares in the Sanatan Gaudiya Math with a solemn ceremony amidst shouts of cheer from the attending people with whom the whole of the Math premises was fully packed up. All were sumptuously treated to Mahaprosad. On the 9th October a special meeting of the leading elites of the town was held in the Math yard. Srila Paramhansa Maharaj delivered a long lecture dwelling on the superiority of the teachings of Mahaprabhu. Some respectable citizens kindly formed themselves in a body to devise ways and means for translating all the treatises on Gaudiya Vaishnavism in Hindi and for preaching the teachings of Mahaprabhu throughout the United Provinces.

Cawnpore :—After two full weeks the whole party of the disciples at Benares, was divided into two batches,—one comprising fifteen heads started for Cawnpore with the Paramhansa Goswami Maharaj, and the other, with the rest, proceeded to Brindaban to perform the annual celebrations there in the Sri Krishna-Chaitanya Math. The former party was most cordially received at Cawnpore by Sripad Adhokshaja Das Adhicary who is a high Government official there.* Words fail to express adequately the whole-hearted hospitality rendered by Adhokshaja Probhu and his ever increasing eagerness to serve his Sri Gurudeva and his associates. Here many respectable people came to have a darshan of Srila Paramhansa Goswami Maharaj from morning till late at night.

Among the visitors there were also some sceptics and some pedants who wanted to make a parade of their knowledge of rationalistic philosophy but very soon their shallow knowledge was clearly exposed and their weak arguments dashed to pieces against the sound and invincible reasoning of srouta pantha. The Paramhansha Goswami Maharaj convinced all his visitors of the unquestionable superiority of Nambhajan to all other means of God-realisation. On the 14th October the Goswami Maharaj with a party of his disciples started for Jaipur ; while Swamiji Srimad Bhakti Sarvaswa Giri and Srijut Jadunandan Das Adhicary, B. A. remained at Cawnpore for more than a week and throughout the large commercial city of Cawnpore preached both in Hindi and in English the teachings of Sri Chaitanya Mahaparbhu on the cult of Suddha Bhakti. The whole city was on a stir and the people were struck with admiration to hear for the first time the lofty teachings of Sri Gour-Sundar from the lips of erudite and eloquent preachers.

Psilanthropism (प्राकृत सहजियावाद)

THIS limited, changeable, phenomenal wordl is the perverted reflection of the absolute, perfect and eternal region which is the abode of God. The evidence of the scriptures clearly declares the above to be the nature of the difference between the spiritual and material worlds. In as much as this material world is the reflected image of the absolute Reality it mimics, in a most perverted manner, the beauty of the original. Its beauty, however, is more false and useless even than that of the mirage and is no less fatal to the unwary who put their trust in it. The reality of the reflected image, as reflected image, need not be denied. But at the same time it is necessary not to overlook the fact that the reflected image is only the shadow of the real substance and may be called unreal in comparison with the latter; especially as the shadow has no independent existence of its own. In fact the shadow has neither the permanence nor the reality of the original. By no amount of sophistry the image can be considered to be identical with the object itself and be made to serve the purpose of the latter. The image of an automobile cannot be used as a conveyance. Children, indeed, are liable to be deluded by the image of a horse into believing it to be the real horse, but their efforts to ride the image are nonethe less doomed to failure. Exactly similar is our attempt to enjoy (?) the treasures (?) of this world. We are perpetually deluded by the mirage but refuse to be convinced of its unreality. We are constantly engaged in chasing the pleasures of this world never doubting that it is not only our privilege but quite within our power, to enjoy them. Nature presents herself to our fancy as a wayward mistress whose proper and only duty is to pander to the gratification of the senses of us, her lords by making a free offering of all her colour, taste, sound, touch and smell in all their gross and refined forms at our feet.

But the truth that the scriptures are never tired of dinning into our ears and which is not wholly unrecognisable if only we would stop to consider it with the attention that it deserves, is that we have been hurled into this strange and alien world as the result of this very immemorial proneness for selfish enjoyment that seized upon our souls in consequence of our forgetfulness of the lotus feet of Sri Krishna. In our present fallen state, from the moment of birth we are completely wrapped up in the meshes of this physical Nature and learn to believe that she is all in all. As a matter of fact, by abusing our freedom of choice, the instant we forget the service of God our real and eternal nature at once gets enveloped in a subtle case which is put upon it by the illusory energy of God, the mother of this physical world. This case is a mere material adjunct (उपाधि) and is quite different from the soul which it covers up. It consists of the mind (मनस्), intelligence (बुद्धि) and the perverted ego (अहङ्कार). This subtle case is further enclosed in an outer covering which serves to protect the inner case and also enables it to function properly. Our eternal and real self, the soul, is in this manner overlaid by these two coatings, both foreign to its nature, viz. the inner subtle, or mental case and the outer, gross or physical body. The outer case is also made up of the same five principles of matter which form the substance of the mental case, and is also in like manner merely an adjunct of the soul that is equally difficult to separate.

From the above it is clear that the substance of our thoughts viz. the mind, the instrument whereby we form conclusions, the principle of intelligence viz. the perverted ego by which we realise our existence in this world, the eye, the ear, the nose, the tongue, the skin, our speech, our hands, our feet and all the senses, are the handi-works of this physical nature (प्रकृति). Similarly all those objects which we see, hear, touch etc. are also the products of prakriti that is to say they are all material objects.

Being thus surrounded on every side by physical nature, nourished by her, enjoying her treasures and being joined to her by the wasp and the woof of the method and object of all our endeavours, our eternal, super-mundane nature is thereby forced to remain severely suppressed. In our present fallen state we are thus thoroughly mastered by the multitude of impressions contracted from her and are enveloped by and completely engrossed in this material world. The jiva that has forgot Krishna, that has forgot her own eternal nature, and who by reason of such forgetfulness mistakes matter for the spirit, is denoted by the term प्राकृत सहजिया of which the nearest English equivalent is the word 'psilanthropist.' That is to say, in the fallen state, we are, all of us more or less psilanthropists. The only exceptions being the devotees of God who alone recognise God's transcendental personality and the eternal existence of spiritual manifestation.

It has been stated above that this physical nature (प्रकृति) is the perverted reflection of the eternal and real world. The eternal region of which this material world is the perverted reflection is the spiritual world. In that world everything is spiritual. In that world there exist trees, creepers, grass, earth etc. in their real, eternal condition. In the spiritual world there is to be found none of the imperfections of this world. There the nature serves exclusively, not jiva, but Krishna. The ground, trees and plants, rivers, lakes, seas and mountains, woods and groves of that world are transcendental, that is to say they are objects that lie beyond the reach of this physical nature and by reason of their spiritual character, possessing eternal existence, they are fit to serve the transcendental activities of the Godhead Himself in as much as they all happen to be self-conscious, unlike their false counterparts of this universe.

The most merciful Lord condescends at times to depute his servants, the dwellers of that blessed region, to the benighted inhabitants of this ungodly world. And sometimes out of His great mercy the supreme Lord Himself comes down into our midst. The Lord Himself and His obedient servants alone know the real nature of the transcendental world. Those souls that are engrossed in matter are ignorant of the true nature of the spiritual region. This happens to be so because the fallen souls (बद्ध जीव) being altogether averse to Krishna from time immemorial by reason of the vast variety of the material bodies with which they were successively endowed by physical nature as the result of their ungodly activities, have remained without sight of Krishna for an incalculably long period. How then can we expect them to remember and tell us the tidings of the transcendental world ? Can a person who has never been to England give us true information regarding that country ?

The analogy of this mundane world does not, of course, apply fully to the case of the super-mundane. In this world for instance one who has never been to England may, by learning the account of that country from others who have visited it, be able to understand and also to convey to others information thus obtained. This is feasible because Bengal and England happen to be countries that are both of them situated within the limits of this physical universe and the one country materially resembles the other; and, therefore, it is possible for a person who is acquainted with the conditions of one country to understand the description of the other from the pen or lips of a person who happens to be like himself a denizen of their common universe. But the spiritual world happens to be quite unlike this physical world. The two are in fact centred round opposite poles. Therefore, it is not at all surprising that, engrossed as we are in the experience of this world, we fail to understand the real meaning of such accounts of the spiritual world as have been written or declared for our benefit by those who have had the privilege of possessing the true knowledge of that transcendental region; it is all the more so because the instruments with whose help we, fallen souls, have to study those accounts are themselves the cross threads in the texture that binds us to this world. Those who consider that by means of this material mind, intelligence and the perverted ego it is possible to undertake the investigation of the Spiritual Kingdom and to enlighten other people regarding the same, that it is possible, with the help of such mind, to understand the nature of the spiritual world by studying, the works of seers and explain the same to others, are psilanthropists in the sense in which that term has been used by the devotees of God.

The psilanthropists are grouped into numerous sects that are scattered over the world and psilanthropism has assumed a great variety of forms. An endeavour has been made in this paper to identify a few of those groups with the help of tests supplied by those scriptures that treat of un-alloyed devotion.

The psilathropically-disposed may, however, contend that if ordinary readers are not fit to understand devotional works penned by the great seers there was neither necessity for the publication of such works in this world, nor is it possible, indeed, to understand for what class of people they could have at all been intended. In anticipation of such objections the devotees of God declare that to those who approach the investigation of the transcendental Name, Form, Qualities and Deeds of the Godhead by means of their mundane intellects these spiritual truths are not revealed. In the words of Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita 'Spiritual truths cannot be realised by the un-spiritual,—this is constantly declared by the Vedas and the Purans'.*

Those spiritual works or tidings of the spiritual world have been penned for the perusal of persons who, by the mercy of the true devotees of God, have already been pre-disposed, to an extent, towards the service of the transcendental Reality. The advent of the devotees of God into this world is for the purpose of imparting spiritual enlightenment or arousing the consciousness of the spiritual self in the worldly minded after rescuing them from the slough of materialism. According to the Bhagabatam 'the devotees even when they appear in this world remain unaffected by the power of worldliness and it is this immunity that constitutes the Divinity of their nature.†

The superiority of the Godhead to jivas is discernible in the fact that even when the Supreme Lord appears in this material world He is still beyond its jurisdiction. When the intellect of the jiva submits unconditionally to the guidance of the Godhead it also escapes being affected by the qualities of the mundane world although lying in contact with it.

Those perfect beings who have themselves realised the nature of the transcendental self are always endeavouring to impart the knowledge of the spiritual, in other words, to arouse the consciousness of the transcendental, in fallen jivas, being moved to pity by the miseries that those fallen souls undergo in the prison-house of the enchantress viz. this material Nature. This process is denoted in our sastras by the word 'diksha' which may be rendered by an unsatisfactory English equivalent as 'initiation'. A fallen soul becomes fit for diksha as soon as it really seeks such help and is prepared to throw itself unreservedly at the feet of a preceptor who is acquainted with the nature of the spiritual self and is, therefore, free from all worldly ambitions. At the time of diksha the soul gives up all its worldly vanities and makes its complete submission 'with mind, body and speech' at the holy feet of Sree Gurudeva. Thereupon the Preceptor, after having first cleansed the disciple of all his sins, that is to say after freeing him from all earthly frailties, makes him fit for the service of Krishna. The body and mind of the person who is thus favoured lose all inclination for the persuit o worldly objects ; and on the disappearance of all un-spirituality, the transcendental knowledge or the real nature of the jiva is spontaneously manifested. The devotee being thus freed from sin and being further spiritually enlightened, is enabled to employ himself in the service of Krishna by means of his soul which itself is pure intelligence and un-alloyed bliss. The mind of such jiva is no longer the material mind, it is then the pure mind (शुद्धमन), the dwelling-place of Sri Krishna Himself.

It is the pure mind alone that can realise the Name, Form, Qualities and Deeds of Sri Krishna. By the material mind, that is to say by the mind that is engrossed in material colour, taste, smell, touch, sound etc., the transcendental Name, Form, Qualities and Deeds can never be realised. *

In the words of Thakur Narottamdas's prayer :

"Oh, when will the mind be pure giving up all worldly desire,
When shall I behold the holy Brindaban !"†

To remove any possible misconception on the part of psilanthropists like ourselves Sri Gaursundar Himself declares 'that the hearts of worldly people are polluted by their intimate connection with the activities of the material mind, and being fast bound there-to, belong to this world ; whereas My mind is altogether free from any earthly taint and is, therefore, entirely different from theirs : My mind is the hallowed playground of the transcendental God-head, there being no difference between My mind and Brindaban. Sri Krishna's pastimes are manifested only in the transcendental Brindaban, the worldly plane is not a fit place for the sports of Sri Krishna. In My spiritual mind cause Thou, O Lord, Thy lotus feet to appear'. *

They are psilanthropists who, even after having had the rare good fortune of listening to these words of Sri Gaursundar, make a show of contemplating, with this mundane mind, the Name, Form, Activities etc. of Sri Radha-Govinda, Who can be served only by the pure mind which is absolutely free from all sin, in other words, by the faculties of the immaculate soul alone. These deluded people are so foolish that they do not understand the simple enough truth that it is not possible to be a denizen of the spiritual Braja with this material body and mind. Failing utterly to grasp the significance of the words and deeds of transcendental devotees they fondly imagine that to dwell in Braja is same as residing in the Geographical locality of the name with this body which ever seeks the gratification of its senses. Those among them who admit that it is not possible 'to dwell in Braja' with the physical body adopt the zealous pursuit of familiar domestic duties, evidently under the impression that it is the practical manner of residing in Braja with the mind, never suspecting that it is impossible 'to dwell in Braja' with the material mind.

Those who suppose that the offensive taking of the holy Name is identical with the taking of the holy Name itself, that is to say who consider that it is possible to take the Name and to realise the Form, Qualities etc. of the Godhead, with the material organs of sense,—are psilanthropists.

They are psilanthropists—

Who think that it is possible to attain devotion for Krishna, which is the end of all spiritual endeavour, and to realise the transcendental Name, Form, Qualities etc. of the Godhead, even when, by reason of ignorance of our relationship with God, we may, with perverse tenacity, cling to wrong conclusions, or be without any conclusions at all.

Who think that persistence in offensive taking of the Name leads, by degrees, as a matter of course, to the realisation of the Holy Name itself and to love of God.

Who profess their readiness to give out to their disciples their particular (?) methods of spiritual realisation on receipt of a sum of money, as also such disciple who being still in the state of sinfulness begs of his preceptor for instruction in the principles of spiritual amour understanding the same in the worldly sense of carnality.

Who think that it is possible even in the sinful state to take the name of Krishna, to realise His Form, Qualities etc. and also to serve Him.

Who think that by mere persistent listening (even in the state of sinfulness) to the Name, Beauty, Qualities and Deeds of Sri Krishna love for the holy Name is aroused.

Who think that the Holy Name becomes manifest of itself by listening to the account of the Deeds of the Godhead.

Who hold that the sentiment of spiritual love (rasa) precedes faith (sradhà), or spiritual liking (rati), or that spiritual liking precedes faith.

Who think that it is possible in the sinful state to have the sight of the transcendental Form of the Godhead,—to take the transcendental Name,—to listen to the recital of transcendental Activities,—or to understand the five chapters on the Rasa (amorous pastimes of Sri Krishna with the gopis.) of the Srimad Bhagabatam or the song of the gopis or Govindalilamrita or Ujjala Nilmani or Gopalachampu, Muktacharita, Bidagdha Madhaba, Lalita Madhaba, Dankeli Koumudi, Jaydeva's Gitagovinda, Billvamangal's Krishnakarnamrita, Chandidas, Bidyapati's devotional songs, the amorous songs regarding Rai-Kanu, etc.,—or, that it is possible to sing in the market-place the Divine amours,—or permissible to unpack one's special (?) devotional methods at any and every place for pecuniary consideration.

Who do not understand that the transcendental Name does not manifest itself on the tongue so long as any interval of offence separates the two,—that the Form, Qualities, Activities and the true Nature of the Godhead do not manifest themselves to the material mind but only the perverted caricature of them shaped by sensual emotions contracted from the poetical or prose works of fiction that delineate our passions for the pleasrues of this world.

Who pretend to discourse regarding the Divine amours to sentimental persons who have no capacity for grasping those truths, or to the novices on the path of devotion, or to the ineligible.

Who dub those who are devoid of all spiritual taste (rati) as devotees fully established in such spiritual inclination due to their natural, innate love of the Godhead,—or, as fully possessed of the sentiment of spiritual love one who is barely in the stage of novitiate on the path of such loving devotion,—or, as spiritually disposed one who possesses sincere convictions of any sort.

Who hold that manifestation of the spiritual inclination is possible while there still exists any hankering for material objects,—or that it is possible for one who is not completely freed from such material prepossessions to be an amorous devotee,—or that the very first indications of spiritual amour can make their appearance before even the commencement of the novitiate,—or that spiritual amour is attainable independently of spiritual attachment,—or in one word, that there is no anomaly in placing the cart before the horse.

Who argue that, as it is possible to appreciate with our perverted mind and intelligence dramatic works like the Sakuntala, Raghuvamsa, Sahityadarpan, poetry, rhetoric, etc. etc., it is, therefore, equally possible to understand in the same way such works as Lalita Madhaba, Bidagdha Madhaba, Rasapanchadhyaya, Ujjala Nilamani etc.

Who suppose that harlots plying their trade are fit to utter the holy Name of Krishna with their mouths, to chant the spiritual songs regarding Rai-Kanu composed by Sri Chandidas and Vidyapati,—and that by listening to those songs from such lips other persons also may attain spiritual inclination and even love for Radha-Krishna after the manner of Billvamangal whose love for Radha-Krishna was aroused by his association with Chintamani.

Who think that the quality of Vaishnavism runs in the blood,—that the distinctive qualities of a gosvamin, of Nityananda, of Advaita, of an acharyya (spiritual Teacher), are transmissible through the medium of blood in accordance with the principle of heredity.

Who think that a Vaishnava has mundane parents,—who hold the view that the Vaishnava is capable of being included into any mundane caste, society or religion, that is to say, that the Vaishnava is a 'pashandi Hindu',—or that the Vaishnava is a member of any such communities as Brahman, Kshatriya, Vaisya, Sudra, Chandala, Yavana, Pukkasha, Abhira, Sumbha, Khasa, etc.

Who think that mahaprasad possesses immunity from defilement only at Puri-dhama by reason of the sanctity of the place,—who suppose that vegetarian diet is identical with mahaprasad,—who think that the salagrama, the stubble of the streets and the touch-stone belong to one and the same class of material objects viz. stone,—who think that the holy Image is capable of defilement by touch,—who imagine that by worshipping stone. God is worshipped,—or that (under the lead of familiar domestic instincts) by worshipping father and mother, husband and wife, of this world, Lakshmi and Narayan are worshipped,—who think that by serving the poor Narayana is served,—who think that by worshipping any name or form conceived by the mind God is worshipped.

Who think that the holy Name and mantra can be sold for a sum of money,—who think that the transcendental Name, Form, Qualities and Activities of the Godhead are capable of being chanted by the mouth of a paid reader or speaker and that by listening to such reading or preaching any good is secured.

Who think that this material body can be dressed up as sakhi (spiritual female companion) or gopi (spiritual milk-maid), or that this sinful body can serve the transcendental sakhis,—who think that it is possible to taste un-conventional spiritual amour (पारकीया रति) with the physical body,—who think that the truth of the un-conventional amour can be realised with this material mind which is addicted to the pleasures of the senses,—who think that it is possible to worship Gaur independently of Krishna,—who think that Vishnupriya can be worshipped by renouncing Sri Rupa,—who think that by adopting the materialistic interpretations of theosophy or metaphysics it is possible to obtain a moral explanation of the obscene pastimes of Sri Krishna,—who think that the love for Gaur is capable of being combined with ghost-ism,—who suppose that God appears before mortals by being adulterated with mundane qualities,—who think that it is possible to rehabilitate transcendental Gaursundar as the object of our sensuous enjoyment or as an amorous hero pandering to our senses.

Who suppose that with this physical body and material mind and empirical mode of thinking, out-look and realisation, by simply purchasing a Railway ticket, it is possible to travel to the transcendental Brindaban and Nabadvipa, comfortably seated in a snug, little Railway compartment, and that it is also possible to reside there in tolerable comfort by building a commodious pacca house of stone or brick and mortar, and that to live there in such fashion is to reside in the realm of the spirit.

Who think that it is possible with the same identical mind and at one and the same time to serve this world, one's wife and children, harlots, and—God.

Who think that by means of the same body, and simultaneously, the bodies of wife, children, harlots—and those of the devotees of God, can be touched.

Who think that it is possible at one and the same time to enjoy betel, tobacco, ganja, bhang, wine etc. and to sip the nectar of Krishna-talk,—who declare that they actually enjoy the sweetness of Krishna devotion although they confess to the necessity they are under of indulging in material pleasures,—who imagine that even while wholly absorbed in the holy Name of Krishna one cannot forego the necessity, or propensity, for intoxicants such as tobacco, ganja etc.

Who think that it is possible to serve Krishna and at the same time enjoy fish, meat, wife, cards etc.,—who think that if only they accept wholeheartedly (?) as spiritual (?) guide a professional guru or even a very great sinner who frequents the tavern (शुँड़ि-बाड़ी याओया), or one who is given to drink, sexuality, domesticity, trade etc. and hold the view that, by merely avoiding to discuss the defects of such guru, by sheer force of blind faith (?) in him, devotion to Krishna can be gained.

Who think that as the quality of the holy Name or mantra cannot change by the defective nature of the spiritual (?) guide, therefore, although the pseudo-guru imparts as mantra a mere string of certain letters of the alphabet resembling mantra or offers as the holy Name the offence against the Name, one has every chance of being benefitted by such mantra or offence against the Name.

Who dress up this frail, material body to personate Godhead Himself or His Incarnation,—who cause tulasi leaf, consecrated to the service of Krishna, to be offered by disciples at their own fleshy feet that are fit to be devoured by dogs and jackals,—who, abandoning the holy Name of 'Hare Krishna' taught by the sastras and the acharyyas as being the only saviour of the Kali Age and the Benefactor of the world, or, doubting the truth of the declaration of the sastras and the devotees to the effect that by the Name of 'Hare Krishna' alone all purpose is served, in the hope of earthly fame of becoming recognized as Incarnations announcing a new Dispensation, invent and give currency to new formulas that are opposed to the essence of the sastras and tainted with grotesque sentimentality.

Who, in the very act of chewing betel with scarlet lips thumping the khole, for gratifying their senses, indulge in singing the amours of the Divine Pair, and, for the purpose of deluding women-folk, cause their heads with carefully trimmed curls to touch the ground and their elephantine 'devotional' trunks, fattened with equal assiduity for sensuous enjoyments, to roll on the bare earth, salivate at the mouth, shed crocodile tears and twist and jerk the body,—and, on the other hand, simultaneously exhibit all the symptoms of the keenest anxiety for such trifles as a rupee a quarter-rupee, a shawl or a loin-cloth, or smoke away at ganja, coax the women, and giving out all this to be the kirtan, bhaba and the eight sattvic perturbations of Mahaprabhu Sri Chaitanya, deceive foolish people.

All such people and their aiders and abetters are—psilanthropists.

In fact all those who rely on their empirical ideas in discussing the transcendental Reality, conduct themselves towards the absolute Reality after the manner of their relation to mundane objects, indulge in hypocritical symptoms of having realised the spiritual Truth although utterly engrossed in the worldly slough, are by their very principles psilanthropists. Till one has had the good fortune of having obtained spiritual enlightenment from a spiritual preceptor by betaking himself to his holy feet with the sincere purpose of being freed from materialism, one cannot attain the really natural (i.e. transcendental) function viz. the un-alloyed, un-remitting, causeless, innate function of the soul in the form of the service of transcendental Sri Krishna.

"Humbler Than A Blade of Grass."

THE Samkirtan of Hari has been declared by Sri Gaursundar as the only method, as well as the goal, in regard to the attainment of the highest good by jivas in this Kali Age. By the chanting of the Holy Name the highest object of the human life, viz. love for Krishna, is gained. The following sloka enshrines the words spoken by the Lord Himself laying down the conditions to be fulfilled if the Holy Name is to be chanted in the manner that is free from offence :

"तृणादपि सुनीचेन तरोरपि सहिष्णुणा । अमानिना मानदेन कीर्त्तनीयः सदा हरिः ॥"
—(शिक्षाष्टक ३य श्लोक) ।

In the above sloka we are instructed to perform the kirtan of Hari by being infinitely more humble than a blade of grass, by exercising patience greater than that of the tree, by not desiring honour for ourselves and by honouring all other jivas realising that they are the eternal servants of Krishna. It is necessary to practise at one and the same time the quality of humility and that of honouring all. There is no room for self-contradiction in those words of the God-head. The practice of either quality cannot be incompatible with the fullest observance of the other.

All jivas, whether they are aware of it or not, are the servants of Krishna. The service of Krishna is the eternal function of the jiva-soul. The consciousness regarding this eternal Truth is aroused the instant the jiva throws himself unreservedly on the protection of the true devotee of God, such decision being itself the result of the jiva having previously served God and His devotees although he could not, till then, have done so consciously. The more closely one holds to the feet of the good preceptor, the more clearly is this relationship of the jiva with Krishna realised—and in proportion to the degree of such realisation the mental and physical associations lose their force. All jivas are found to be really one's kin in the highest sense as soon as one realises the service of Krishna to be the eternal function of the soul. There is no object that can then be considered as beneath one's notice by such a person. Lord Nityananda, who is all-in-all to the Gaudiya, in as much as he practised the principles that he taught, could not, therefore, ignore the spiritual nature of such evil-conditioned, forsaken drunkards and robbers as Jagai and Madhai. The world-teacher Nityananda was fully aware of their tastes and nature in the state of bondage as also the fact that they were universally held by the people of Nabadvip as out-casts and utterly worthless. But the greatest of the kind-hearted did not, for those reasons, overlook their eternal natures as the servants of Krishna although showing the highest kindness in ignoring the tastes and nature of their state of bondage in the fetters of the illusory energy of God. As everyone of the jivas without exception is the servant of Krishna and entitled to His service Prabhu Nityananda established Jagai and Madhai in the condition that is natural for the jiva by bestowing on them the necessary fitness accruing from listening to the unalloyed kirtan of Hari and association with the devotees of God. There-after Jagai and Madhai continued to live at Nabadvip as the Saviours of the world having become the devotees of God. This famous event undoubtedly constitutes the most striking instance of the manifestation of the quality of honouring the eternal and true nature of the jiva on the part of the greatest of all preceptors. The act is also at the same time in every way constistent with the functions of humility greater than that of the blade of grass, of patience greater than that of the tree, without the least self-contradiction.

Whatever may be the depth of humiliation in which jiva chooses to abide by being fettered with the functions of the body and the mind, a servant of the guru is ever prepared to honour the qualities of his soul, aware that he is the eternal servant of Krishna and perfectly pure in his own proper nature.

The nature and function of the soul are beyond the reach of the mind and speech of the fallen jiva. Therefore, desiring the eternal good of the jiva God has himself caused the manifestation to jiva of the eternal truths regarding the nature of the world, of God, their mutual relation etc., in the Scriptures such as Sri Veda, Sri Geeta, Sri Bhagabat etc., and, by means of His worthy agents who have been endowed by Himself with the Divine power for the purpose, in such devotional works as Sri Bhaktirasamrita-sindhu, Sri Chaitanya-Charitamrita, etc., this knowledge of relationship has been made available to the servant of the guru in the chain of unbroken spiritual succession by the grace of the Divine Master Himself. When the jiva, bewitched by the illusory energy of God, stuck fast in the qualities of the body and the mind, by disobeying the words of God and the Scriptures endeavours to bring down ruin and destruction upon himself and others by simulating the kirtan of Hari so as to accord with the tastes and nature of his and their bound state, the servant of the guru can no longer remain passive in the face of such fatal endeavour for effecting the destruction of the performer of such kirtan and of the hearers all of them being his dearest and nearest kin in the true sense. Fearlessly and without complaint enduring hundreds and thousands of dangers and obstacles thereby manifesting patience greater than that of the tree, discarding all personal honour or dishonour and conceit thus practising humility which is greater than that of a blade of grass, without coveting any honour for himself and at the same time fully honouring others by evincing the highest regard for the pure and eternal nature of the fallen jiva, in all his endeavours being actuated by the desire for the promotion of the highest good of himself and of all bound jivas, the servant of the guru undertakes the practice and preaching of the unalloyed Kirtan of Hari in conformity with the injunctions of God and the scriptures the knowledge of which he has received by submission to the lotus feet of the Divine Preceptor. If in consequence of such endeavour on his part the simulation of the kirtan of Hari by any one who chooses to disobey the scriptures and the path followed by the godly, is obstructed, such a contingency cannot well be prevented. There is no scope for malice or contempt in the kirtan and preaching as recommended by the guru and the scriptures that has to be practised by one who is to perform it. In His lila for the deliverance of the countries of the South, Sriman Mahaprabhu undoubtedly displayed infinite mercy towards the upholders of the opinions of the different schools of those places by exposing the defects of all mischievous speculations and breaking them to pieces. In the language of Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita—

"Casuists, interpretationists, illusionists,
The followers of Sankhya, Patanjala,
Smriti, Purana, Tantra —
All were violently bent on upholding their own opinions ;
But the Lord exposing the defects of all opinions, broke them to pieces ;
And on every point the Lord established the Vaishnava truth ;
No one could upset the conclusions declared by the Lord."*

The Scriptures forbid all conversation with God-less Buddhists. Sriman Mahaprabhu, pitying even them out of regard for the spiritual nature of the jiva, did great good by crushing their pride. In the words of the same high authority quoted above—

"Bands of atheists turned up hearing of His learning ;
Proudly they came waited upon by their disciples ;
And although Buddhists are not to be spoken to, unfit to be seen, Yet the Lord held discourse with them to destroy their pride."†

*(तार्किक मीमांसक.....खण्डे ॥ चैः चः मध्य ६म)

†("पाषण्डेर दल.....खण्डइते ॥")

These are very good examples of the proper performance of the duty of truly honouring others. Such conduct does not in the least infringe the sphere of the duty of humility greater than that of the blade of grass, although even such careless kindness failed to dissuade those atheists from the course that was congenial to their nature. But just as in their case the hostile endeavours of those atheists only served to bring down punishment on their guru without in the least affecting Mahaprabhu, so also at this present juncture by similar ungodly efforts similar ruin of the impious guru is bound to be the result and they will not touch those jivas who seek a refuge at the feet of Mahaprabhu.

This is the irresistible law of the lila of Mahaprabhu as devotee. To preach the unalloyed kirtan of Hari by practising the same oneself is the only eternal function of the servant of the guru. By its means the object of philanthropy and those of the well-being of oneself are simultaneously realised. This unalloyed kirtan of Hari alone is the highest of all spiritual endeavours : its essence is supremely beneficial to the bound jiva and is alone capable of resuscitating the faculty of the soul.

Sri Gaursundar, who is identical with the Darling Son of the Lord of Braja, arraying Himself in the attire of the devotee, by His own practice and preaching, perfected the practice and preaching of His devotees. When He was approached by Sarbabhauma with a request for imparting spiritual enlightenment (दीक्षा) to Maharaj Pratapa-rudra, the powerful and independent potentate of the countries of Utkal and Madras, He severely put down the proposal with the emphatic observation—

"To one who wants nothing for his own selfish enjoyment, who is prepared to serve God,
And is desirous of gaining the bounding shore of the ocean
of the world,
The sight of worldly people and of women
Is worse, alas ! even than the swallowing of poison."*

He further warned the proposer that 'he must never again utter such request. If he did so again, he would not find Him there.'†

Once again when the same Pratapa-rudra, having provided for the necessaries of Rai Ramananda and, on the occassion of Panda Vijaya (the ceremony of leaving the Temple by the holy Images at the Car Festival of Jagannath), 'Sweeping the path with a golden broom in his hand, and moistening the path with sandal-water', by thus serving God and His devotee, gave a clear proof of his spiritual nature, he obtained at once the feet of Sriman Mahaprabhu and also a glimpse of his six-armed Form. Sriman Mahaprabhu out of the fullness of his mercy ignored without ado the adventitious adjunct, in the shape of the garb of king, of Prataparudra, and could not but honour his spiritual nature employed in the service of God and His devotee.

The performance of kirtan of Hari free from offence in obedience to God, the spiritual preceptor and the Vaishnavas is alone for the jiva the highest form of spiritual endeavour or the essence of all such effort. Wherever are found—the want of such submission, the invocation of a string of words concocted by the mind in place of the supreme formula (महामन्त्र) of the Name of Sri Hari which is the medicine for the malady of worldliness prescribed by Sriman Mahaprabhu, the ascription of caste to, disrespect for, or seriously offensive conduct towards the guru and the community of the Vaishnavas, deliberately cherishing sinful inclinations relying on the power of the Holy Name to free from sin, accumulating luxuries for the purpose of one's own sensuous gratifications by means of the Holy Name, the holy Image and the holy Bhagabat, or the manifestation of such offences as an endeavour to put down the great saints,—on all such occasions and on the spot, holding the offender to be related to him by the ties of the highest kinship, the servant of the guru, out of respect for his spiritual nature, is compelled to act against the taste and nature, of his temporary bound state that happen to be opposed to the injunctions of the Scriptures, the guru and the Vaishnavas. Such conduct on the part of the servant of the guru appears unpleasant to the jiva in the bound state, but there is no other alternative. Conduct that is agreeable to the body and mind of the bound jivas serves only to prolong his state of bondage. In such circumstances there would appear to be no other method of destroying the evil mental tendencies of the bound jiva than the performance of the unalloyed kirtan in the shape of preaching the messages of the Scriptures and of the pure devotees (viz. the six Gosvamins) fully practising them oneself. There is no other weapon available to the servant of the guru for cutting the tangled knot except the words of the Scriptures and of the guru. Accordingly God Himself the Establisher of all religion, thus advised His beloved devotee, Uddhab, regarding the remedy—'the devotees will dissipate the evil mental tendencies of the bound jiva by their words.*

The servant of the guru has no other means except following in the foot-steps of Sriman Mahaprabhu and

* 'सन्त एवास्य...मुक्तिभिः'—(भाः ११।११।१३)

Prabhu Nityananda under the guidance of Sri Guru. He is unable to act in accordance with the tastes and nature of the bound jiva thereby disobeying the injunctions of the guru and of the Scriptures. This constitutes his proper function of honouring others. In such conduct there is no deficiency of the quality of humility that is greater than that of a blade of grass. This is the humble submission of the servant of the servants of the guru.

AT the village of Chandpur situated at the confluence of the Tribeni near Hugly there lived the multimillionaires Hiranya and Gobardhan Mazumdars who were the glory of the Kayastha community. They were the greatest friends and patrons of the Brahmans resident at Navadwip. Raghunath, son of Gobardhan and heir of the two brothers, was at this time a mere child. This great personage later became famous in the community of Vaishnavas under the appellation of Sri Das Goswamin. Sri Thakur Haridas on the occasion put up at the house of Balaram Acharyya who was the family priest of the Chandpur Mazumdars. Sri Balaram was a great pet of Thakur Haridas and highly favoured by him. The saintly Thakur occupied a lonely thatched hut of Balaram's house and received the prasadam of Krishna at the house of Bhattacharyya.

One day Balaram took Thakur Mahasaya to the hall of public assembly of the Mazumdars. The two brothers showed him every respect. Certain of the Pandits who were present in the assembly asserted that the effect of sin is destroyed by the power of the Name, while several others held that by means of the Name freedom from misery is obtained. On hearing this Thakur Haridas said that the destruction of sinfulness and emancipation from sorrows are not the results of the taking of the Name. The Name is like the sun. Love at the feet of Krishna is aroused on the appearance of the Sun of the Holy Name. As with sun-rise the fear of theives, ghosts and demons is ended the destruction of sinfulness is similarly an attendant circumstance on the appearance of the Name, and emancipation is another such secondary result, this later being comparable to the disappearance of darkness at sun-rise. The trivial fruit of freedom from misery is obtainable even from the dim reflection of the Name (नामाभास).

Hearing those words of Thakur Haridas a Brahman of the name of Gopal Chakravarty, an employee of the Mazumdars, whose official duty was to carry letters and cash and who happened to be present, flew into a rage and spoke with great chagrin, "Is it possible that freedom from misery which is not attainable in crores of births and not even by Brahma, can be had, as this person affirms, by the mere dim reflection of the Name ?" Haridas said, "Why do you entertain any doubt about it ? The Shastras state that freedom from misery is the result of the dim reflection of the Name." The insolent Brahman, Gopal, replied, "If it can be proved that there are no statements in the Shastras to the effect that emancipation is the result of the dim reflection of the Name, would you lay wager that you will cut off your own nose ?" Haridas signified his cordial agreement even to such a proposal. But the better-informed persons in the assembly, and even the Mazumdars themselves, were very much pained and humiliated by the behaviour of Gopal. Sri Balaram Acharyya sharply rebuked Gopal for insulting a sadhu. The Mazumdars dismissed Gopal from their service for his offensive conduct against the great saint.

Haridas Thakur without being sorry at such discourtesy said, "Gopal has done no wrong. He is ignorant and his mind is given to casuistry. By the methods of casuistical argument the glories of the name cannot be known. I have no desire that anybody should be sorry because of me." Although the great devotee Haridas was in every way prepared to forgive Gopal, but God did not allow him to escape the punishment of his offence. Before three days had passed Gopal was afflicted with leprosy. The prominent nose of Gopal became the special seat of the foul disease. The fingers of his hands and feet shrivelled up. By this event all the people of the locality were filled with astonishment. Thakur Haridas returned again to Santipur.

After some time Thakur Haridas journeyed to East Bengal. At the village of Harinadi he came across a very rude Brahman who behaved most insolently towards him. At the present day there is a village of the name of Harinadi in the District of Jessore. In Barisal there is another well-known village of the same name. We are unable to decide which of them was the village to which Thakur Mahasaya paid this visit. The Brahman in question opposed the kirtan of Thakur Haridas which the Thakur used to chant with a loud voice. The idea of the Brahman was that one who chanted the Name performed the function of the guru and such function was the monopoly of the Brahman caste. He had heard that Thakur Mahasaya was sprung from a non-Hindu Yavana family. He pretended to think that if the Name of God uttered by the Thakur's mouth ever reached his ear-holes the latter's observance of the rules of Varnasrama would thereby be rendered impossible. This embodiment of arrogance born in Brahman caste, therefore, presenting himself before the Thakur said, 'Mantras have to be repeated mentally. Who taught you to take the Name of Hari loudly against the rules of the Shastras ? I ask you to make a proper answer publicly before an assembly of Pundits." Haridas replied, "I have learnt the truth regarding the Name of Hari from the lips of Pundits such as yourself. I am telling you what I have heard. The Shastras say that he who chants the holy Name loudly is a hundred times worthier than one who repeats the Name mentally. As a matter of fact the Shastras highly praise him who chants the Name with a loud voice." The Brahman being dissatisfied with these words of the Shastras asked for the reason of such Shastric injunctions. Haridas rapt in Krishna-bliss continued, "Listen, Brahman. By hearing only once the Name of Krishna animals, birds and insects attain the blessed region of Sri Baikuntha. He who repeats the Name of Krishna in a low tone does good only to himself ; but he who chants the transcendental Name with a loud voice benefits all the hearers of the world. It is for this reason that in estimating the effect the chanter of kirtan with a loud voice has been held worthier than the mental reciter."

The Brahman on hearing this argument and the statements of the Shastras was maddened with anger and began to utter foul words against the Thakur. "It is," he said, "a proof of the special sanctity of this Age that Haridas born in a non-Hindu Yavana family is the expounder of the Veda and Philosophy. When such perversion of manner is to be found even at this begining of the Age of Evil there is no knowing what profane absurdities will occur in the future. You loiter from door to door and feast on sumptuous dishes. If the explanation offered by you turns out to be false your nose and ears should be cut off." The magnanimous saint relapsed into silence at these words and as he was leaving the place began loudly to chant the samkirtan of Hari. The Shastras mention endless torments at the hands of Yama (the upholder of the Divine Law) of those Pundits who have the nature of rakshasas. They are severely denounced by all godly persons and are shut out of the community of the good on account of their aversion to Vishnu in lieu of their endeavour to secure praise as so-called Brahmans by their hostility to Vaishnavas. Although Thakur Haridas did not mind the insult that was offered by this sinful Brahman, yet by the severe decree of Providence the nose of the Brahman fell off due to an attack of small-pox. By hostility to Vaishnavas the Vaishnava does not suffer in any way; but on the contrary great harm befalls the enemies of the Vaishnavas.

1. I have done no good,
I have had no knowledge,
I have never worshipped Thy feet ;
Given to worldly pleasures,
Self-deceived,
I am now encompassed by darkness on every side.

2. Thou, O Lord, art the Fountain of mercy :
At Thy lotus feet
I surrender my soul,
May Thou afford to be kind !

3. This is Thy promise,—
He who seeks Thy protection
No harm will know ;
Sinner as I am,
Finding no other way,
I now beg for Thy favour.

4. Every other desire
Wholly discarding,
O, when shall I be Thine !
Thou art the eternal Master,
I am Thy eternal servant,—
This is the sum of Bhakti-vinode's musings.

CHAPTER IV.

Summary :—This Chapter describes the doings of the Lord as an infant, the ceremony of niskraman of the Baby Gaur, Naming of the Child, the story of the Lord being stolen by two thieves who, deluded by the illusory energy of Vishnu, themselves carry Him back to the house and other events.

The affection of Jagannath and Sachi for their Boy increased every day. They never suspected the Divinity of their Son although they daily witnessed wonderful manifestations. Sri Bisvarup, the Incarnation of Samkarsana, nursed the Lord with tender brotherly affection constantly carrying Him in his arms. The ladies and all the kins folk by their loving devices for securing the safety of the Child furnish the highest pitch of that devotion which regards the Supreme Being as a helpless Darling Baby to be tended with the most watchful care. Touched by the extraordinary beauty of the Lord strangers as well as friends often offered Him presents of sweetmeat, plantain etc. which the Boy would give away as prasadam to those ladies who chanted the Name of Hari. Occasionally also Nimai drank the milk or ate up the cooked food or spoiled the property or eatables of neighbours in sheer boyish freak.

1 All glory to Thee, Gaur-chandra, with the lotus eyes !
All glory to the brother-hood of Thy beloved devotees !

2 Beam forth Thy auspicious glance, O Lord, dispelling all illusion.
That the mind may serve Thee night and day.

3 Thus Gaur-chandra appeared ;
Each day in Sachi's house joy grew more and more.

4 The Brahman and his wife, looking on the beautiful face of their son,
All the time floated on the sea of bliss.

5 Divine Bisvarup as soon as he saw his Brother,
With a smile, held to his bosom the Home of all happiness.

6 And all the kinsfolk in a body
Were grouped round the child watching night and day.

7 Some read mantras invoking Vishnu's protection, some called on Devi,
Some put a barrier on every side of the house by reciting the mantra.

8 The Lord often cried and His lotus eyes constantly filled with tears, Ceasing only while He heard the Name of Hari.

9 All took this supreme hint ;
And as soon as the Lord wept all chanted the Name of Hari

10 All the people constantly guarded the Lord,
As the merry gods played many a prank.

11 One god would enter the room unseen,
The people shouted out 'Here goes the thief', making his shadow.

12 Some repeated the Name of Narasingha,
The hymn to Aprajita could be heard, uttered by others.

13 By many mantras some secured the ten directions,
All this made a great noise in Sachi's house.

14 When the god came out of the room after seeing the Lord,
All cried, 'The thieves come and thus they go away.'

15 While some raised the cry 'the thief, the thief.'
Others kept shouting for the aid of Nrisingha.

16 One exorciser said, 'By rare luck thou escapest
Not knowing the great power of Nrisingha.'

17 The god laughs lingering on the spot unseen,
One whole month was passed in this fashion.

18 At the festival when the Baby came out of the hut in which He was born,
All the ladies went out with Sachi to bathe in the Ganges ;

19 Performing this bath in the Ganges to the accompaniment of music and song,
After first paying their devotions to the Ganges, they made their way to the scared grove of the goddess Sasthi ;

20 And having worshipped the feet of all the gods
The ladies returned to the house in a procession.

21 Fried rice, plantain, oil, vermilion, areca-nut, betel,
With due honour, the mother offered to them all.

22 Thereupon all the ladies having blessed the Child, Saluting the feet of the mother, returned to their homes.

23 Such were the ways of the Lord at this time.
Who can know Him if it be not His will ?

24 The Lord wanted to cause His own kirtan to be chanted,
And for this He would fall into fits of crying;

25 The women employed all their arts to soothe the Lord,
But, at each such attempt, the Lord only redoubled His cries.

26 When all of them together repeated aloud the Name of Hari,
The Lord looked at them with a smile on His lovely face ;

27 Apprised of the mind of the Baby all joined
In a constant chant of the Name of Hari by clap of hands.

28 Joyously they practised the samkirtan of Hari,
Their chant of Hari filled Sachi's house.

29 The Lord abode in this manner in the house of Jagannath,
And, after the fashion of Gopala, in secret, played many a merry prank.

30 Just when no one was there
He rummaged all things of the room,

31 And, disarranging everything, scattered them on every side,
Bespattering every part of the room with oil, milk, curd and ghee ,

32 Forewarned by Himself of the mother's coming
At once took to His bed and began to cry !

33 The mother chanted the Name of Hari to soothe the Child
When she found the room strewn with every thing,—

34 "Who scattered the paddy and rice, mudga and dal, all over the room !"
And then discovered her milk and curd in their broken pots !

35 There was only the suckling of four months in the room.
Who muddled all those things no one could understand.

36 All the family hurrying into the room
Could find no trace of any human being.

37 Some one said, "A demon came into the room,
And as he could not harm the Child by reason of the amulet, 38 "With an angry mind, for missing to hurt the Baby, Wrought all this damage ere he fled back to his place."

39 Jagannath Misra, as he saw the mischief that was done, was perplexed in mind,
But abstained from blaming any one believing it to be an act of the gods.

40 The pair eyed each other as they surveyed the losses inflicted by the gods,
But their grief was forgot so soon as they looked at the Boy.

41 Thus the Lord was wont to amuse Himself everyday, Till the time of Naming the Baby drew near.

42 Nilambar Chakravarty and other most learned persons
And all the friends duly arrived.

43 There also came many loyal matrons ;
In vermilion, each shining like the goddess Lakshmi.

44 They debated the choice of the Name,
The ladies selected their Name, a second one by the others.

45 "As the parents lost many elder issues, all daughters,
So this last-born Son be named Nimai."

46 The learned, however, took counsel together and said,
"We find only one Name suitable for Him.

47 "As soon as this Child has been born, in all the different lands
Famine has ceased and the peasants have obtained abundance of rain, 48 "By His birth the whole world is restored to health

As formerly by Narayana,

49 "Therefore, His Name is Visvambhar,
'Fountain-light' He is styled in the horoscope

50 "The Name 'Nimai', mentioned by dutiful matrons,
Is a secondary Name by which also He will be called by all."

51 At the time of Naming the Baby all the auspicious moments conjoined
And Brahmans read the Gita, Bhagabat and Veda.

52 And men and gods mixed in festive joy ;
The sound of couches and gongs mingled with the chant of Hari.

53 Paddy, books, fried rice, couri, gold, silver, etc
Were held out to the child to choose.

54 Jagannath said, "Ho, my darling Bisvambhar, Take that you like best and be quick."

55 The Lord, holy Sachi's Son, passing by other objects
Caught hold of the Bhagabat in close embrace.

56 The matrons acclaimed on all sides,—
Everyone said, "He will be a great scholar."

57 Some said, "The Child will be a great Vaishnava, Attaining easily the knowledge of all the scriptures."

58 In which-ever direction Lord Bisvambhar bent His smiling glance,
The whole frame of such favoured person was steeped in gladness.

59 Whoever took Him in the arms knew not how to be disengaged.
The ladies pressed to their bosoms the Unattainable of the gods.

60 As the Lord cried, the ladies
With clap of hands chanted the Name of Hari.

61 The Lord hearing the Name danced on the lap,
The ladies, with redoubled zeal song the Name of Hari.

62 The Lord constantly by such trick, caused the Name of Hari
To be uttered by every mouth even such was His will.

63 "Without His will no undertaking may succeed"
This truth by the Veda, sastras and the Bhagabata is declared.

64 In this manner, as the days passed, Causing His own samkirtan to be performed, holy Sachi's Darling grew up.

65 It was a most beautiful sight when the Lord crawled on His knees,
On His waist, pleasing to hear, tinkled
the tiny bells.

66 Most fearlessly He roamed over every part of the yard,
Caught at everything He saw, be it fire or the snake.

67 On a certain day as a serpent was wriggling across the house,
The Lord caught hold of the brute in childish play.

68 The reptile wound up and formed into a coil, God lay down and rested couching on the serpent.

69 All were stricken with terror as they saw it and set up a piteous wail,
The Lord, still reposing on the serpent, smiled.

70 All the people frantically recited the name of Gaduda,
The parents with others wept for fear.

71 Then Ananta took himself away on hearing their cries,
The Darling of Sachi following in pursuit.

72 They quickly snatched Him back and all of them clasped the Lord to their bosoms
The ladies cried, "Live Thou for ever."

VAISHNAB CEREMONY AT NAIMISHARANYA

Misrik, Nov. 25.

Today the installation ceremony of Sri-Chaitanya Mahaprabhu at Naimisharanya was held with great pomp. An unprecedentedly big procession with several elephants, camels and many horses all richly decorated and attended by about twenty thousand men passed safely around the place. Many Zeminders, Talukdars and nobles of the neighbouring places were present on the spot in different tents pitched before the Math.

Srimad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur addressed the audience present. All were sumptuously treated with Mahaprasad.

Lip and Life

MERE profession of devotion to God with the lip without practising the same in one's life is not the function of the preacher of God's word. Employing the lip in discoursing religion is only then lifted to the sphere of the service of God when such discourse proceeds from the heart that has been purified by devotion to the transcendental Reality. This makes all the difference between the mercenary preacher and the true pastor. The principle is thus expressed by Pandit Jagadananda, one of the closest associates of Sriman Mahaprabhu,—'It does not avail if only one repeats the words 'I belong to Gora' with his lips. The desired effect is produced only by the adoption of the conduct and judgment of Gora.* Because Mahaprabhu and the scriptures say that by taking the Name of Krishna the only true object of life is gained, we should not, therefore, suppose that it is sufficient merely to utter the Name with the tongue without caring to listen to what Mahaprabhu and the Shastras have to say further on the subject. If a novice does not take the trouble of listening carefully to those who are acquainted with the whole position, being devoid of necessary judgment he would fail to take the Name in the proper manner. He will in such case, according to Pandit Jagadananda, gain nothing by merely uttering the Name with his lips. Such utterance will be nothing but ordinary sounds which, according to the scriptures, will constitute an offence against the Name and, instead of benefitting, will harm the person who will be guilty of such offence. If, however, we follow the conduct and judgment of Mahaprabhu in taking the Name it will be possible for us to obtain thereby the highest object of the human life in the shape of the service of God.

*"गोरार आमि गोरार आमि मुखे बलिले नाहि चले। गोरार आचार गोरार विचार लइले फल फले॥"
—(प्रेमविवर्त्त)

The lip, therefore, like the other organs of sense, can be used in serving God if it be employed in the manner that is laid down in the scriptures. If it be not used in the manner recommended by the Shastras the word of God refuses to appear on the lip ; and those who listen to the utterances of a person who does not himself understand or follow the teachings of the Shastras, listen not to the word of God but to the vain utterances of a sinful creature who has absolutely no right to be a preacher of God's word.

In preaching the word of God the lip cannot be independent of life. The whole of the current misconception on the subject is due to the notion that the holy Name is merely a string of letters of the alphabet to be uttered like any ordinary word. Those people who object to the special sanctity of the holy Name as distinguished from ordinary words would be perfectly justified in their opposition if there had been no difference between the holy Name and an ordinary word. But as a matter of fact, in accordance with the teaching of all the Shastras, the holy Name is not at all like an ordinary word ; neither can it be uttered at the option of the speaker as ordinary words can be. The holy Name is identical with God Himself. It is transcendental. God first manifests Himself in the pure heart and from these appears on the tongue in the Form of the holy Name. After the holy Name has manifested itself on the tongue the holy Form, Qualities and Deeds of the Godhead manifest themselves to the mind of the devotee and he is thereupon enabled to preach the word of God to others. A perfectly pure heart is, therefore, an absolute pre-requisite for the manifestation of the word of God on the tongue of the preacher.

In this matter the lip can by no means be separated from life. God is served by the purified mind through the organs of sense. The tongue is only one of such organs. No sooner is the service of the Lord possible to one organ it becomes necessarily and simultaneously possible to every other organ of sense and the whole life of the devotee becomes one constant service of the Lord.

As it is not possible for the novice to understand the Shastras that treat of the transcendental world, listening to the word of God from the lips of a devotee is, therefore, the necessary first requisite for one who wants to attain the service of God. As soon as such listening has been perfected the mind becomes purified and, by the grace of of God, is enabled to serve Him by means of all the organs of sense. There is no difference between service of God by means of the tongue and that by means of any other organ of sense. The Shastric term for the spiritual teacher, Acharyya, means literally one who practises the religion. No one can be a teacher of religion who does not act in accordance with the principles that he teaches. There is no English word that is the exact equivalent of 'Acharyya'. Sriman Mahaprabhu Himself has said that 'no one is fit to teach religion who himself does not practise it.' In fact, preaching is only possible after practice has been perfected.

Religion is service of God. In such service theory and practice are identical. The one cannot be divorced from the other. In the service of the Lord there is diversity without difference. The devotees of God,—every one of them, simultaneously preach and practise the eternal religion viz. the service of the Lord. They are all of them the greatest and only benefactors of the world.

Therefore, those who contend that preaching of the word of God is possible for those who are in the sinful state, are grossly misinformed as regards the declarations of the Scriptures. Preaching of the word of God is the function of the Acharyya who practises what he preaches. It is only when the conscious service of the Lord has been fully attained that one is fit to be styled an Acharyya. One who is himself fully established in the state of grace can alone lend a helping hand in lifting his brethren who happen to be in the fallen condition. One who is fit to instruct others regarding the nature of Godhead must himself belong to the transcendental plane. On the transcendental plane there can be nothing that is worldly. The person who moves on the spiritual plane is absolutely free from all mundane affinities.

The methods of listening and preaching are given preference over other methods of practising devotion to God for the reason that they are specially suitable for fallen jivas due to the fact that the transcendental Reality is not directly perceptible to the physical senses. Of all the instruments for the acquisition of knowledge that are available to the fallen jiva the mind and the ear alone are capable of apprehending objects without coming into direct contact with them as is necessary in the case of the other senses. It is this peculiarity that makes them fitted for the reception of the transcendental Reality which is not directly perceptible by the physical senses. The ear receives its communications through the medium of sound.

Ordinary sounds which always refer to the objects of this world, convey information that is verifiable by the direct examination of the objects themselves by means of one, or more, or all of the other senses. These sounds originate and undergo dissolution in the material space. Such sounds are also different from the objects that are denoted by them. The sounds that refer to the objects of the transcendental world are quite different from ordinary sounds. The objects denoted by them are situated beyond the limits of this material world. It is, therefore, never possible to verify the information in the case of these, with the help of the other senses. There is also no difference between such sounds and the objects denoted by them, the two being identical. Such sounds as well as the objects denoted by them are eternal and unlimited. They are, therefore, quite different from ordinary sounds that have only a temporary and limited existence. In fact, the word of God and ordinary words are in every way different from one another. This difference cannot be really grasped by those who are in the sinful state. But the difference is none the less real and it is owing to this radical difference between the two that it is never possible for a person in the sinful state to be a preacher of the word of God. The word of God is identical with God Himself and manifests itself of its own accord on the tongue of one who is absolutely free from sin and who submits himself entirely at the holy feet of the Supreme Lord.

The service of God is the only true object of life. It becomes attainable to sinful jivas by a series of graded processes the first of which is the unconcious, accidental association with the devotees of God who appear in this world for the purpose of helping fallen jivas. Such association with the devotees of God enable fallen jivas as the next stage, to obtain the grace of God whereby their minds become inclined to listen to the word of God from the holy lips of devotees No sooner they begin to listen to the word of God the consciousness of the transcendental Reality is aroused in them and thereafter by means of constant listening they gradually attain the conscious service of the Godhead which is the real summum bonum of human existence. Those who attain this goal are automatically freed from all mundane affinities as a necessary secondary result.

Therefore, the supposition that it is possible for a person who is in the sinful state to preach the word of God, is opposed to all the conclusions of the Shastras. In preaching the word of God the lip must necessarily be identical with life. The body of the devotee of God, by reason of his complete surrender to God, becomes itself spiritual as it then belongs to God. The whole life of the devotee is dedicated to the exclusive service of the transcendental Reality. It is absolutly free from all taint of worldliness. Those who happen to be in the sinful state naturally enough fail to realise this transcendental purity of the devotee of God. They may even suppose that he is no better than an erring mortal engaged in ordinary worldly persuits. In their ignorance they may also proceed to judge his life by the ordinary worldly standard and suppose that they detect the same difference between the lip and life of the devotee of God as they do in their own case or in that of pseudo-preachers of the word of God. But this is a really fatal blunder in as much as it is an offence against the devotees of God which can be forgiven only by those against whom it is committed, such being the will of God Himself as manifested in the Scriptures.

The mortal frame a chain ;—
The soul confined for former wrongs
Should try to rise again !!

6. Why then this childish play in that
Which cannot be our own,
Which falls within a hundred years,
As if a rose ablown !

7. Our life is but a rosy hue
To go ere long to nought !
The soul alone would last for e'er
With good or evil frought !!

8. How deep the thought of times to be ?
How grave the aspect looks ?
And wrapt in awe become, Oh ! I
When reading Nature's books !

9. Man's life to him a problem dark !
A screen both left and right !
No soul hath come to tell us what Exists beyond our sight !!

10. But then a voice, how deep and soft,
Within ourselves is left ;—
Man ! Man ! thou art immortal Soul !
Thee Death can never melt !!

11. For thee thy Sire on High has kept
A store of bliss above,
To end of time, thou art Oh ! His
Who wants but purest Love.

12. Oh Love ! Thy power and spell benign
Now melt my soul to God !
How can my earthly words describe
That feeling soft and broad !!

13. Enjoyment—sorrow,—what but lots
To which the flesh is heir ?
The soul that sleeps alone concludes
In them it hath a share !!

14. And then ! my friends no more enjoy
Nor weep ! for all below ;—
The women, wine and flesh of beasts
No love on thee bestow !

15. But thine to love thy brother man
And give thyself to God,
And God doeth know your wages fair ;—
This fact is true and broad !!

16. Forget the past that sleeps, and ne'er
The future dream at all,
But act in times that are with thee
And progress thee shall call !!

17. But tell me not in reasoning cold,
The soul is made alone
By earth's mechanic, lifeless rules
And to destruction prone !

18. My God who gave us life and all Alone the Soul can kill,
Or give it all the joys above
His promise to fulfil !

19. So push thy onward march O Soul !
Against an evil deed
That stands with soldiers—hate and lust !
A hero be indeed !!

20. Maintain thy post in spirit world
As firmly as you can,
Let never matter push thee down,
O stand heroic man !

21. O Sharagrahi Vaishnab soul !
Thou art an angel fair :
Lead, lead me on to Vrindaban
And spirit's power declare !!

22. There rests my Soul from matter free
Upon my Lover's arms,
Eternal peace and Spirit's love
Are all my chanting charms !!

Worship and Service

WORSHIP is the preliminary stage on the path of the service of God. It is imperfect devotion. A constituent part of devotion is not the whole or perfect devotion. Worship is characterized by the sentiment of distant reverence for the objects of worship. It is service of God by means of objects of this world, based on the sentiment of reverence towards God that results from mundane considerations. In worship there is thus present more or less the factor of reference to gross and subtle matter. The reverence which is so prominent in worship is due to the apprehension of the transcendental nature of the object of worship by the worshipper who regards himself as connected with this physical world. In pure service or unalloyed devotion the sentiment of reverence is subdued and its milder radiance constitutes its decidedly superior excellence. The nature of the difference between the two is analogous to that between the scorching and terrific rays of the sun and the cool and soothing moon-beam. In devotion the jiva-soul, which is located beyond the sphere of gross and subtle material existence, is engaged in the direct service of God. The apprehensions by the senses of the emancipated devotee are not merely phenomenal, as he is privileged to directly serve the transcendental being vouchsafed actual proximity to the Absolute Truth that is beyond the reach of all mental speculations.

That which can be known only by those who possess the most exalted faith and which constitutes the specific quality of the teaching of the spiritual preceptor, is styled 'mystery' (रहस्य). In the list of processes to be gone through by the novice on the path of devotion, as given in the Bhaktirasamritasindhu, the 'mystery' of the direct service of the Lord is defined as walking in the footsteps of perfected devotees by one who after having been instructed in the Truth regarding Krishna has attained the third stage of novitiate, as the fruit of his serving the inner devotees in their practice of devotion. One who constantly serves the Lord free from all other desires, being emancipated from the bonds of this world, is drawn away from all association with people who are attached to objects other than Krishna. It is only then that there is manifested in him the aptitude for whole-time service of the Lord, that is to say service that lasts throughout the eight divisions of night and day (अष्टकाल भजन). The un-alloyed devotee who is thus fitted to serve the Lord realises as an obstacle to the attainment of his object all association with bound jivas such as the elevationists who aim at positive selfish enjoyment and the salvationists who desire the negative happiness of freedom from misery by discarding material enjoyment, both of whom are averse to the service of God. The elevationists and salvationists who are given to desire for objects other than Krishna, have no taste for the mystery of devotion to God and therefore, for the reason that they lack the fitness for admission into the realm of devotion that is radiant with spiritual effulgence throughout the eight divisions of the night and day, they do not possess that constant and absorbing interest for the great devotional work, referred to above, that is its due.

If the whole period of night and day be divided into eight equal parts each division is termed a 'yama'. The three 'yamas' of night an equal number of 'yamas' constituting day time being joined with the two 'yamas' of morning and evening, make up the total of eight 'yamas'. To serve Krishna at all time, in every way and with exclusive devotion, is only possible for the Vaishnava. Whole-time service of God is impossible for the non-spiritual egoist. The jiva is not liberated from the state of bondage by applying to objects that are associated with God the criteria of worldly judgment. The Vaishnava devotees who have realised their true self are constantly engaged in the service of Krishna. The slokas of the octade comprising the teaching of Sri Gaursundar are in the spirit of the eight-yama service. The eleven slokas of Sri Rupapada and the poems, embodying the desire for the devotion that is appropriate for the eight 'yamas', of all great devotees who are followers of Sri Rupa, help in promoting the constant flow of devotion. The mystery of the holy service of God is the subject that engages the constant attention of the servants of Sri Gurudeva whose minds are completely detached from material times, space or persons.

REVIVAL OF LEARNING IN OLD NAVADWIP

Para Vidya Peetha at Sri Mayapur.

THIS residential institution is established by the workers of the Sri Chaitanya Math for disseminating moral, intellectual and primarily religious culture in the truly nationalistic lines through the medium of Sanskrit among students of all caste and age. All branches of Sanskrit learning are taught by specially efficient professors in respective subjects. A comparative study of all schools of philosophy and theology is made in an impartial way. Students are also taught several useful avocations of life in practical lines.

The institution is situated in old Navadwip, the birth place of Mahaprayu Sri Chaitanyadeva and is on the banks of the historical lake-like "Ballal Dighi" over 700 years old. The site is away from populated areas with grand natural scenery around and is very healthy. Pure drinking water is supplied from a deep tube-well within the compound. Free medical help is available.

Only hundred more deserving students will be admitted free of all costs of tuition, lodging or boarding. Applications with good reference are invited by the Secretary.

Para Vidya Peetha, Sri Mayapur, Bamanpukur P. O., Nadia Dt., Bengal, India.

SRI Thakur Haridas at times visited the town of Nabadvip. There he put up at the tol-house of Sri Advaita Prabhu and chanted the samkirtan of the Name of Hari in company of Sribash and the other devotees. At this period Nimai Pandit, overflowing with Divine Love, was exhibiting the sportiveness of a most restless child, and, later on, manifested equal zeal in the display of learning. Having repaired to Gayadham and there offered pinda to his deceased father at the lotus feet of Sri Gadadhar, Sri Gaursundar manifested, while, He was still at Gaya, the lila of accepting the favour of initiation from Sripad Isvarpuri, a great Sannyasin belonging to the Sampradaya of Srimad Madhvacharyya ; and, on His return to Nabadvip, was transformed into an exclusive seeker after Krishna. Sri Advaita, Sribash, Haridas, Mukunda and other devotees, resident in Nabadvip, who delighted in the performance of the kirtan of Hari, were all highly encouraged beholding this un-thinkable change of Nimai Pandit, the possessor of un-bounded genius. Within a short time Nimai Pandit accepted the leadership of this community of the chanters of kirtan and thenceforward the joy of kirtan waxed stronger every day in the homes of the devotees of Nabadvip and specially in the residence of Sribash. The principal helpers in these joyous performances of kirtan were Sri Thakur Haridas and Sribash. Hari samkirtan attained such high intensity at Nabadvip that a few persons who were puffed up with the pride of worldliness, skilled in the wranglings of the Shastras and full of malice and arrogance, became the opponents of kirtan. Actuated by this sentiment of hostility they set themselves to devise various methods for counteracting the efforts of Sri Gaursundar in His quest after Krishna. On a certain day by open abuse, another day by secret plotting, on a third day by throwing filthy substances into the house of Sribash, they tried to obstruct the progress of kirtan. The resources of wickedness—slander, envy, malice, anger etc.—being employed in harassing the devotees, the tide of kirtan with daily increasing vigour began all the more violently to agitate, to their deepest depths, the different communities of the town of Nabadvip. The obstacles that were devised by sinful persons plotting in secret, instead of preventing kirtan, only served to expose to the public gaze the wicked ingenuity of the plotters. And now moved by the miseries of the fallen Jivas Sri Gaursundar thus spoke to Sri Prabhu Nityananda and Sri Thakur Haridas—

"Hear attentively, Nityananda, listen Haridas,
Carry everywhere this command
of Mine—
Appearing before every dwelling beg this alms—
'Say Krishna, serve Krishna, know only Krishna'
Speak or allow to be spoken nothing except this ;
And, returning at close of each day, report to Me the result."

Reverently, with the head bent in submission, receiving this command of the Lord Prabhu Nityananda and the revered Thakur Haridas, appearing at the door-steps of every dwelling, began to chant loudly these words—

'Say Krishna, chant Krishna, serve
Krishna ;
Krishna is life, Krishna is wealth,
for Krishna alone we exist.'
'Such is Krishna, brother, chant
Krishna with thy whole heart.'
'Say Krishna, serve Krishna, know only Krishna.'

Both of these chanters of kirtan wore the garb of sannyasins. Some of the people were delighted by listening to the kirtan song regarding it as the method of practising devotion to God ; but there were others who imputed various evil motives. Every evening Sri Thakur Haridas duly submitted at the feet of Sriman Mahaprabhu the result of the preaching of the day. On one of these days a great danger befell the two preachers through the animosity of two sinful Brahmans who bore the names of Jagai and Madhai. Those robbers wanted to lay violent hands on the two Prabhus as they were preaching the word of God and they could only save themselves from the clutches of the murderers, who hotly chased them, by precipitate flight. On learning particulars of the attack by the two robbers from Sri Thakur Haridas and hearing of the child-like behaviour of Prabhu Nityananda Prabhu Advaita predicted to Haridas the impending deliverence of the two ruffians. Jagai and Madhai lying in wait close to the house of Mahaprabhu listened through the nights to the kirtan of Krishna sung by the devotees without, however, relaxing the vigour of their wicked attempts. At last as Prabhu Nityananda was one night coming to the house of Mahaprabhu the two robber brothers made an attack on him. Madhabananda Bandopadhyaya under the influence of intoxicants having with all his strength struck Sri Prabhu Nityananda a blow with his fist and a stream of blood spurted out from the forehead of Prabhu Nityananda. At this Jagadananda interposed and made Madhai desist from his wickedness; and when Sri Mahaprabhu escorted by the brotherhood of His devotees reached the spot Prabhu Nityananda without anger informed the Lord of the magnanimity of Jagadananda. Forthwith the two robbers obtaining the mercy of the two Prabhus renounced their abominable trade and promised never again to sin in future!

Sri Thakur Haridas proved the main—stay of Sri Gaursundar in all His activities. We notice the presence of Thakur Haridas on the day of the great manifestation, on other days of kirtan, at the dance of Mahaprabhu in the mood of Devi at the house of Chandra-Shekhar, and in fact in every performance of Sri Gauranga. On the night when Gaur-Hari, the Saviour of the world, in order to effect the deliverence of the Kazi, led the procession of all the citizens chanting the kirtan of Hari, escorted by seven bands of His followers, to the residence of the Kazi, Sri Thakur Haridas was the foremost leader of the dancing chanters of kirtan performed by the original community of Vaishnavas.

On the day of the great manifestation by expatiating on all the past incidents in the career of the holy Thakur; Sriman Mahaprabhu openly proclaimed the glory of the matchless devotee with His own holy mouth. Having listened to the stories of former Sadhus from the lips of Haridas Sri Gaur-Hari expressed His wish to confer a suitable boon on the Thakur. In praying for the boon Haridas said—

"May I ever subsist on the leavings of those servants
Who adore Thy feet;
May this be my devotion at every birth;
May those leavings be my duty,
family, religion.
Darling of Sachi, Father, vouchsafe this favour—
Making me a dog, put me in the abode of Thy devotee"

Having heard this prayer of the Thakur the Lord thus spoke its fulfilment—

"With whom you hold speech even for the space of half a second
Will assuredly attain unto Me;
Who so ever regards you regards Me;
I ever dwell in thy body;
For all time you have bound Me fast to your heart."

In this connection Srila Thakur Brindabandas writes—

"Caste, family, high deeds, wealth are of no avail;
Without longing for the treasure of love Krishna is not gained.

Whatever may be the family in which the Vaishnava is born,
Yet is he the best, as all the Shastras say.
The base sinner who considers the caste of the Vaishnava Sinks into the lowest depths of being birth after birth.
All glory to Haridas, the great
devotee !
All sins vanish by the touch of Haridas !
The gods themselves covet the touch of Haridas !
Even the sacred Ganges longs for the immersion of Haridas !"

Sri Thakur Haridas preached the Name of Sri Hari by frequent journeys to different parts of Bengal stopping for sometime at each place. On one occasion the Thakur stayed in this manner at the house of Satyaraj Khan, the pride of the Kayastha community, and of his son Sri Ramananda Basu, all through the period of Chaturmasya, in order to preach and teach by example the mystery of the holy Name. Even to this day, at the village of Kulingram, in the District of Burdwan, on the site of the devotional practices of Thakur Haridas, is to be found the ancient establishment of the eternal worship of Sri Gauranga.

1. (Lord of my life) How tell Thee the story of my shame !
There is no sin
That I did not commit
Thousands of times and more, O Lord.

2. The fruit of those transgressions
Weighs me down in this life,—
Who is now to blame ?
At the time knowing well,
Deliberately I refused to consider the end,—
Yet now I want to be saved.

3. According to the offence
Punishment Thou wilt award,
And I shall be put into the bondage of this world :
Even so, through the cycle of those births,
In the company of Thy devotees,
May my mind ever repose at Thy feet.

4. This wise, cunning, desire of mine
I lay at Thy feet ;
The pride of my heart is gone ;
Kindest to the humble,
Thy un-alloyed mercy
Is now Bhakti-vinode's only hope.

[XI]

1. Mind, body, family, whatever is mine,
Youthful Son of Nanda, I tender at Thy feet.
2. In weal and woe, in life and death,
I am relieved of all anxiety, preferring those feet of Thine.
3. Save me or slay me as Thou will'st,
Thou art the Master of Thy eternal servant.
4. If it be Thy will to cause me to be born
May I have birth in the home of Thy devotee.
5. In the dwelling of Thy servant may I be born a worm,
I have no desire to be born a Brahma averse to Thee.
6. I crave the boon of the society of Thy devotee
Who is without a particle of desire for enjoyment or freedom from misery.
7. All I find in Thee,—father, mother, lover, son,
Lord, preceptor, husband.
8. "Hear, O Kan," says Bhaktivinode,
"Lord of Radha, Thou art my life."

[XII]

1. What-so-ever is meant by the words "I" and "Mine", Merciful Lord, at Thy feet I lay.
2. Lord, myself am no longer mine,
Even now I become solely Thine.

3. The jiva inhabiting this body with the word "I" gives up all egoism,
And forthwith the pride of being Thine takes possession of the heart.

4. My all—body, home, followers,
Brothers, friends, wife, son, chattels, way, house—

5. All these now are Thine and myself Thy servant,
I am now a mere occupant in Thy house.

6. Thou art the owner of the house, I obey Thy bidding.
Thy pleasure is now my only endeavour.

7. My virtues and defects of the gross and the subtle body
Are now no longer mine, I am redeemed.

8. To Thy will my will is sub-joined ;
Bhaktivinode from this day forgets himself.

[XIII]

1. Lord, there is now nothing left that may be called mine,
Thou alone art my father, friends, brother.

2. Friends, wife, sons, daughters are now Thy servants :
My efforts for them are on Thy account.

3. Wealth, followers, house, way,—in as much as they belong to Thee,—
I maintain, myself being a mere servant.

4. For Thy service I earn riches,
And bear the expenses of Thy household.

5. I know neither evil nor good, I only serve,
A watchman set to guard the properties of Thy household.

6. My senses I exercise according to Thy direction
And desire to hear, see, smell and taste.

7. Nothing I do for my own pleasure,
"Thy pleasure is the essence," says Bhaktivinode.

Sree Sree Chaitanya Bhagabat

73 Some tied amulets, some read formulas of benediction
Some fetching washing of the feet of Vishnu sprinkled His body.

74 Some said, "The Child has had a second birth,"
Said others, "Being of the species the snake did no harm."

75 Lord Gaur-chandra laughed as He eyed them all
And ever made after the snake, everybody helping to fetch Him back.

76 Whoever devoutly listens to these revelations, hid away in the scriptures,
Him the venomous serpant of worldliness never may harm.

77 Thus day by day the Lord, Darling of Sri Sachi, Moved about in the yard on His legs.

78 The beauty of every limb surpassed infinitely that of the god of love;
Pined the moon for the chance of gazing on that face.

79 The crops of curly hair that adorned the finely rounded head over-spread the forehead,
The eyes were like the lotus, attired like Gopal.

80 The arms extended to the knee, the lips were deep red,
The bosom was broad and marked with all good signs.

81 Natural red was the hue of the charming body of Gaur,
And especially beautiful were the fingers, hands and feet.

82 When the Lord heedlessly moved along as is the wont of children,
From His feet blood seemed to ooze, this alarmed the mother.

83 Great was the astonishment of Sachi and Jagannath at the sight,
And both experienced boundless happiness although destitute of earthly riches.

84 Seated by themselves in a solitary corner, the pair whisperd to each other,
"May be a great saint has vouchsafed to be born in the world.

85 "It seems that the misery of our wordly sojourn is ended
As one so high has been born in my house.

86 "I have never heard of any child with such nature
That constantly dances and laughs so soon as he hears the sound of the Name of Hari.

87 "That cries all the time and is not consoled
Till He hears the Name of Hari loudly uttered.

88 "And all the women, from peep of day,
Forming in a circle round the child, perform samkirtan.

89 "As the ladies clap their hands singing Hari,
The boy Gaursundar dances with the greatest ardour.

90 "The Lord, gray with the dust, rolls on the bare ground,
Rising up laughs as He runs to the lap of mother.

91 "Gaurchandra dances with such gestures of every limb
That the sight fills everybody with incomparable happiness."

92 Thus behaving as a child the Lord caused to be performed
The samkirtan of Hari, but no one could understand.

93 The Lord always moved about with great quickness in and out of the house
Most restlessly so that no one could catch Him.

94. The Lord went out of the house by Himself alone
And begged to have whatever He saw, fried rice, plantain, sweet-meats.

95 At the sight of the beauty of the Lord, supremely captivating,
Even perfect strangers gave whatever He asked.

96 All people gave the Lord sweet-meats and plantain
The Lord returned home very much pleased to get them.

97 And to those ladies who sang the Name of Hari,
He gave all that He got.

98 All laughed at such proof of the Child's cleverness
And forthwith chanted the Name of Hari clapping their hands.

99 At early dawn, at noon, in the evening or after nightfall,
The Lord was always going out of the house.

100 In the houses of friends that lived close
Committed thefts with great zest every day.

101 Drank the milk at the house of one, ate the cooked rice of another,
Broke the earthen pots in the house where nothing was found.

102 If there happened to be a child in the house, poked and made him cry,
The moment He was detected took to His heels.

103 If by chance He was caught by any one,
Falling at his feet begged most piteously to be excused :

104 "I shall not come again, let me go this time,
I promise to you I shall not steal again."

105 The intelligence of the Child astonished everybody,
No one was angry and all loved Him.

106 Everyone loved Him more than he loved his own son :
The very sight of Him captured all the faculties of the mind.

107 The Lord of Baikuntha behaved in this funny way, Constantly flitted about never stopping long at any place.

108 One day two thieves seeing the Lord
Took counsel together saying, "Some one's little child loiters in the town."

109 Noticing the precious ornaments on the beautiful body of the Lord
The two thieves thought on a method of stealing them,

110 Exclaiming "My dad, O my dad" one of the thieves took Him into his arms,
"O dear, where could you be so long ?" cried the other.

111 Both thieves said, "come away, let us go home, my dear."
The Lord answered smiling, "yes, go we home,"

112 The two thieves proceeded fearfully carrying the Lord,
People said, "They are taking away their own child,"

113 There were tens of thousands of people, whom could one know ?
The thieves were delighted by the sight of ornaments.

114 One thief thought within himself,
"I shall surely take the bangles made of wire,"

The two thieves were thus engaged in building castles in the air.
115 Both of them hurried towards their appointed place
God seated on their shoulders moved forward in such manner smiling.
116 One of them put sweet-meats into the hands of the Lord,
Said the other, "Very soon we shall reach home."
117 Thus pretending they went on to a long distance ;
While nearer home all the friends busily searched.
118 Some shouted, "Come away quick, Bisvambhar !"
Some cried "Nimai !" at the top of their voice.
119 All grew restless in the extreme,
As is the case of a living fish without water.
120 All besought in every way the protection of Govinda ;
While the thieves were carrying off the Lord to their home.
121 Deluded by Vishnu's illusory energy the thieves missed their way
And came to Jagannath's house thinking it was theirs.
122 Being satisfied that they had reached their appointed place
The thieves made haste to rob the ornaments.
123 Said the thief, "Get down, my dear, we have come home."
"Yes, it is true," Lord replied, "So quickly set me down."
124 Even where Jagannath Misra and all his people
Were pondering in sadness with their hands to their heads,
125 On that very same spot the deluded thief Put down the Lord from his shoulders thinking it to be their house.
126 No sooner did the Lord alight than He made haste to the father's arms
And with the greatest exultation all of them shouted "Hari, Hari."
127 All of them at the moment experienced a strange, inexpressible sensation—
As if life itself were restored to their bodies.
128 The two thieves now saw that it was not their house
Neither could make out where they were.
129 No one noticed them in the midst of the confusion,
Smitten with fear the thieves looked about and quickly left the place.
130 "Most wonderful !" the thieves thought within themselves,
"It seems we were bewitched," they said.
131 And both of them declared "Chandi saved us to-day ;"
And now restored in spirit they embraced each other.
132 Those two thieves were most fortunate in respect of the supreme object of life Whose shoulders Narayan deigned to ascend.
133 Here at Sachi's house all of them reached the decision,
Where is the man who brought the Lord?
Let us give him a piece of cloth and let it be tied round his head."
134 Some said, "We saw two men Who put the Child down from their shoulders and then left the place".
135 No one was found to claim that he had brought the Lord.
All the people were perplexed feeling it was so strange.

136 "Tell us, dear Nimai," they asked,
"Who brought you and where did they find you" ?

137 The Lord said, "I went to the side of the Ganges,
Having lost the way as I was wandering in the town.

138 "Two persons took me in their arms,
Carried me by paths that are not known to me and here put me down".

139 All cried, "The words of the scriptures hold true
"The fates themselves guard the Child, the aged and the destitute".

140 All people talked in this fashion,
Out-witted by the maya of Vishnu no one suspected the truth.

141 In such manner always sported the Lord of Baikuntha,
But who can know if He does not make Himself known ?

142 Who-ever listens to these stories hid in the Vedas
Attains firm devotion to the feet of Chaitanya.

143 Sri Krishna Chaitanya is the life of Nityananda Chand
At whose twin feet sings Brindabandas.

Here ends chapter Fourth entitled 'The narrative of Naming the Child, His infancy and His being stolen by the thieves" in Part First of Sri Chaitanya Bhagabat.

CHAPTER V.

Summary :—In this Chapter are described the hearing of the sounds of the nupur (anklet for the feet) and noticing of strange foot-prints by Sri Sachi and Jagannath Misra, the eating of the cooked-rice of the Brahmana-pilgrim by Gaur-chandra and other matters.

One day Sri Jagannath Misra asked his son to fetch a book for him from the room. Sachi and Jagannath heard the sound of nupur as the child walked into the room. After the child had left the place and gone to play having delivered the book to his father, the Brahman and his wife going inside the room saw strange foot-prints on the floor marked with the signs of the flag, bolt, goad and staff. Actuated by the nature of parental affection they did not suspect that those could be the foot-prints of their own boy. They thought that their household deity Sri Damodar Salagram unseen by them walked in the room ; and, accordingly, they reverently arranged for a special celebration of the bath, meal and worship of Sri Damodar.

On another day a certain Brahman-pilgrim, who happened to be a worshipper of Bala Gopala (Boy-Krishna in the form of cowherd), became a guest at Misra's house. After having cooked his meal as the Brahman engaged in meditation preparatory to offering the food to Sri Krishna, Gaur-Gopal to favour the Brahman appeared on the spot and ate a mouth-ful of the cooked-rice. The pilgrim observing the boy in the act of eating the offering intended for Krishna impatiently shouted out, "The restless boy has spoiled the cooked-rice to be offered to Krishna." Purandar Misra learning what had happened was about to beat the child being angry, when he was induced by the entreaties of the Brahman to desist. Thereupon Misra persuaded the Brahman to cook again for the sake of Krishna. Sachidevi took away the boy to a neighbour's house in order to keep him out of the way. But no sooner the Brahman was engaged in his meditations Gaur-sundar, un-perceived by any one, came up to him and began a second time to eat the offered meal. On the Brahman raising the cry "The offering is being spoiled," Jagannath Misra became more angry than before with Nimai. The Brahman, however, was induced by the entreaties of Bisvarup, the elder brother of Bisvambhar, to cook once again. The boy was this time clearly watched by all the family who posted themselves in a ring round the child, Jagannath Misra himself guarding the door of the room in which he was kept. When the Brahman had cooked for the third time and all the family had fallen into a deep slumber the night being far advanced, Sri Gaursundar again ate up the cooked-meal while the Brahman was in the state of meditation. This time Sri Gaur-sundar revealed His Divine Form to the Brahman and enlightened him about his real nature as servant of Himself asking him not to divulge it. From that day that blessed Brahman used to visit daily is cherished Divinity at the house of Misra at the conclusion of his begging round.

1. All glory to Lord Bisvambhar loved of His devotees,
The supreme Ruler of the greatest gods, with feet marked with the signs of banner, bolt and goad.

2. The Lord in this manner passed the days in Jagannath's house, Manifesting Himself in manifold ways unnoticed.

3. Purandar Misra called unto Him one day and said,
"Bisvambhar, Darling, fetch the book for me."

4. At these words of the father as the Lord ran into the room
On His feet rang anklets with a tinkling sound.

5. Said Misra, "whence comes the sound of anklets ?"
Whereupon both the Brahman and his wife looked about.

6. "There are no anklets on the feet of my Son,
Where do they make such sweet sound ?"

7. 'How wonderful !' both of them thought,
Their mouths were bereft of the power of speech.

8. The Lord handed the book to his father and went off to play ;
The parents beheld other wonders as they went inside the room.

9. They saw all over the room strange foot-prints.
Distinctly marked with banner, bolt, goad and staff.

10. Both were filled with gladness at the sight of those feet never seen before,
Both were thrilled and their eyes filled with tears.

11. Seeing the lotus feet both made obeisance, Both cried out, "We are saved ! there is no more birth for us !"

12. Misra said, "Hearken, Bisvarup's mother, Thyself cook sweetened rice mixing with ghee ;

13. "Damodar-Salagram Who is in the room
I shall bathe with the five gifts of the cow in the morning.

14. "I now understand it is He that walks
the room
And that is also why I heard the sound of the anklets."

15. In this manner both of them with joyful hearts
Worshipped Salagram,—the Lord laughed
within Himself.

16. Now listen to another story most wonderful,
Of the funny sport that was done by Jagannath's Son.

17. A Brahman, a dweller in holy tirthas, most virtuous,
Who in quest of Krishna frequented
the tirthas,

18. Worshipped the six-lettered mantra of Gopal
And except the offerings to Gopal accepted no other food.

19. By mere accident in course of his pilgrim journeys
Arrived at the house of the Lord.

20. The infant Gopal and Salagram adorned his neck
And there was about him the glow of the high Brahman qualities which cannot be compared with anything.

21. The Brahman incessantly uttered the Name of Krishna
With languid eyes by reason of his heart being full of the sweetness of Govinda.

22. Jagannath Misra noticing his prowess,
With great respect rising from his seat,
made obeisance,

23. What-so-ever rites were enjoined by the rules of hospitality
The large-hearted Jagannath hastened to perform.

24. Himself washing the Brahman's feet
Offered him the very best of seats he had.

25. And after the Brahman was seated at ease
The good Misra enquired of the place where he dwelt.

26. The Bipra said, "I am a recluse, homeless,
I wander about through sheer restlessness of mind."

27. Bowing to him the Misra remarked,
"The wanderings are the cause of the good fortune of the world ;

28. "And especially this day that high fortune is mine ;
So may I be permitted to arrange for the cooking of your food."

29. Said the Bipra, "Misra do as you like."
The Misra was glad and proceeded to make excellent arrangements.

30. Cleansing well the place of cooking
He provided all necessaries for the preparation of his meal.

31. The good Brahman was well pleased and having cooked the meal
Sat himself down with intent to offer the same to Krishna.

32. The Darling of holy Sachi, the Knower of all hearts,
Was desirous of revealing Himself to the Brahman.

33. The Brahman no sooner began his meditations
Than Lord Sri Gaur-sundar appeared before him.

34. His beautiful body covered with dust, perfectly naked,
With red eyes and exquisite hands and feet.

35. And, laughing, took the cooked rice of the Brahman with his beautiful hand,
And ate a mouthful : this was seen by the good Brahman.

36. "Alas !", the fortunate Brahman called out,
"The restless boy has stolen the rice !"

37. The good Misra Jagannath hastening to the spot, saw Prabhu Sri Gaur-sundar laughing and eating the rice.

38. In anger Misra ran forward to beat the Child.
The Bipra rising in great fear, caught him by the hand.

39. Said the Bipra, "Misra, are you not wise and respected by every-body ?
Does the boy understand anything ?
What is the good of beating Him ?

40. "One who has the sense of right and wrong may be properly beaten ;
Let my words prevail, do not hurt Him."

41. The Misra sat down grieved resting his head on his arms.
He neither raised his head nor could utter any word.

42. The Bipra said, "Misra, be not troubled in mind,
What will happen on any day God alone knows.

43. "What sort of fruit, roots or such like things be in the house, Give those to me, on them I shall dine to-day."

44. The Misra said, "If, indeed, you hold me as thy servant,
Be pleased to cook again, allow me to arrange the place.

45. "There is everything that is required for cooking in the house,
I shall, indeed, be very happy if you cook again".

46. All the friends and the family joined in entreaty,
"Do us the favour," they said, "of cooking again."

47. The Bipra replied, "Such being the wish of all of you
I shall by all means cook once again."

48. All were delighted at these words of the Brahman.
And together cleansed the place without delay.

49. Hastily they brought everything required for cooking,
And the good Bipra proceeded to cook
the meal.

50. All said, "The Child is extremely restless,
And, lest He spoil everything once again.

51. "Till the Brahman has cooked and eaten his meal,
Let the Child be kept in another house."

52. Where-upon Sachidevi taking the Son in her arms
Went to another house with the Lord.

53. All the women said, "Mind, Nimai, what we say,
Is it proper to eat the cooked-rice of the Brahman in this manner ?"

54. With a smile playing on His beautiful moon-like face the Lord made reply,
"How am I to blame ? The Bipra himself called."

55. All of them cried, "Nimai, how can you escape this time ?
What will you do now that you have lost your caste ?

56. "Who knows where the Brahman lives or his family ?
How will you save your caste having eaten rice cooked by him ?"

57. The Lord said laughing, "I am but a cow-boy
And ever eat the cooked-rice of Brahmanas.

58. "Is the caste of the cow-heard lost by taking the cooked-rice of Brahmanas ?
The Lord said this smiling and looked at them.

59. The Lord, as if pretending, thus declared the truth regarding Himself, Yet no one understood, such is His illusory power !

60. All laughed hearing those words of the Lord,
No one was minded to part Him from the bosom.

61. Into whose arms the Lord made His way smiling
That person seemed to move in a sea of bliss.

62. The Brahman having cooked again,
Being seated addressed himself to making the offering.

63. The good Bipra began to meditate on the Boy—Gopal,
The Lord of all minds, Gaur-chandra knew of this.

64. Deluding all the people, un-observed,
He came laughing to the place where the Brahman sat,

65. And snatching un-noticed a handful of the cooked-rice,
The Lord made off in a hurry,—this the good Brahman saw.

66. That Brahman at once sent up a wail of grief,
And God after eating his cooked-rice ran away.

67. The Misra in great alarm snatching a lathi Angrily gave chase to the Lord as He fled.

68. Greatly frightened the Lord hid Himself in a room
Misra stormed and raged as he followed in pursuit.

69. "I needs must see today how you behave", cried Misra,
"You hold me, Thy superior, to be so foolish !

70. "In whose house is to be found another child that is so great a thief ?"
The Misra said this as he ran after the Lord.

Jaipur :—A few days before the arrival of the Paramhansa Maharaj at Jaipur Swamiji Srimad Bhakti Hriday Ban, Srimad Bhakti Suranga Goswami Pravu, Professor Sj. Nishi Kanta Sanyal M A., and several others had been there preaching 'Harinam' and methods of 'Suddha Bhakti' of Sri Chaitanya Dev among the respectable citizens of the State. On the 14th October a largely attended meeting was held in the spacious hall of the Maharaja's College when many educated people consisting of the Principal, professors, and students of the College, many chiefs, high State Officials, great Pandits and many local leading men were present. The whole audience, with rapt attention, listened for two hours to the clear and interesting exposition of the difficult problems of Metaphysics by Swamiji Bhakti Hriday Ban. Next day His Holiness the Parambansa Goswami Maharaj addressed another big meeting of the chief burgesses of the State at the palatial residence of the late Kanti Chandra Mukherjee, the late reputed Prime Minister of His Highness, and dwelt at length on the excellence and advantage of 'Nambhajan' over all other means of God Realisation. This lecture produced so much effect on the audience that they expressed their desire to open a branch 'Math' there. The very learned Court poet Srimad Bijoy Chandraji gave His Holiness an address in Sanskrit and kindly admitted that never before had he met with such an eminent scholar of extraordinary learning and such a Suddda Baishnab who is a whole-hearted devotee of Gobindji and farther asserted that such a great Personage is certainly an Associated Counterpart of God Himself. An attendant of His Holiness with a neat little speech in Sanskrit thanked the Court poet for his kind appreciation and also the citizens who kindly gave such cordial reception to preachers from Bengal.

Jaipur is the richest and the greatest commercial city in Rajputana and is noted all over India for fine workmanship of Oriental art. Maharaj Mansing is said to have built this picturesque city which is named after Sabai Jai Sing who first ascended the throne in this new Capital. It is said that Raja Ramsing, an ancestor of Sabai Jaising brougt from Brindaban the Holy Images of Sri Gobindji of Srila Rupa Goswami Prabhu, Sri Gopinathji of Srila Madhu Pandit and Sri Madan Mohanji of Srila Sanatan Goswami Prabhu and installed them in Jaipur. Sri Madan Mohanji is now at Karouli, while Sri Gobindji and Sri Gopinathji are still at Jaipur.

Two miles to the east of this city is Galta, a place highly famous in Baishnab history. Galta has been a stronghold of the followers of Sri Ramananda, a descendant of the line of Srimad Ramanujacharyya. About two centuries ago in 1628 Saka Era, a large number of Ramanandi Pandits supported by other sects objected to the companionship of Sri Radhaji with Sri Gobindji as acknowledged by the Gaudiyas and denied the descent of the Gaudiya Baishnabas (who were the Sebaits of Gobindji) from any of the four accepted sects of Baishnabas. Sripad Baladeba Bidyabhusan, the last Vedantacharyya of the Gaudiyas, was invited by the reigning King, Sabai Jai Sing, to vindicate the position of the Gaudiya Baishnabas against the strong opposition of other sects. The Gaudiyas were not held in esteem as they had no separate commentary of their own of the Vedanta Sastra. Sripad Baladev Bidyabhusan while in Jaipur is said to have got a direct command in dream from Sri Gobindji to write out a commentary of the Vedanta which he did in course of a single week and this commentary is known as the Gobinda Bhashya. In this he traced the line of descent of the Gaudiyas from Brahma Madhwa sect and thus successfully met the objections of the opposing sects. By dint of his eminent scholarship Sripad Baladeva Bidyabhusan, being present at the Galta Gadi totally vanquished the other sects and this saved the critical situation and strengthened the position of the Gaudiyas.

The Sate authorities of Jaipur very kindly ordered a State Motor Car to be at the service of His Holiness Srila Paramhansa Maharaj as long as he was there. By means of this car he, together with his disciples, went about in places of importance. His Holiness, attended by about a dozen of his associates, came to Galta and was simply charmed with the scenic beauty of the valley of Galta and the highly artistic temples which added more grandure to it. Among others a water fall of about 70 or 80 feet in height was an object of special notice. The scenery of ancient Ambar, Jaipur and the neighbouring places from the top of the hills was very refreshing. However, the place is named after Galab Muni, a disciple of Sri Narada, who said to have his Ashram here.

Mahamahopadhyaya Pandit Madhusudanji, a very influential Court poet of his Highness kindly took Srila Paramhansa Maharaj and his disciples, with special honour, to the Palace Library where a large number of rich oil paintings of Baishnabas, historical persons both Hindus and Mahamadens and of famous battles etc. draw the curious attention of every visitor. His Holiness with his party next visited the Library of the Gobindji Temple where none is allowed to enter. However it was a special mark of honour to have access to this Library where thousands of old Manuscript books and all the Sastras are kept. Most of the valuable Manuscripts were found eaten up by worms. Some rare copies not published till now were also seen with great interest.

Ajmere :—Srila Paramhansa Maharaj on his way to Salimabad, the famous seat of the Nimbarka sect, ordered his disciples to preach the religion of Sri Gaur Sundar to the people of Ajmere. Srijut Harbilas Sarda M. L. A., gave a hearty reception to His Holiness. At the special care and solicitude of this leading citizen of Ajmere, Swamiji Bhakti Hriday Bon delivered a long lecture in English at a meeting held at the Sanskrit Bidyalaya where the professors of the Mayo College and of the Government College and many other respectable gentlemen were present. The audience was much pleased to hear of the glory of the religion of Sri Chaitanya Deva from the lips of Suddha Bhaktas. Mr. Maganlalji, Bar-at-law, managed for another lecture at the local High School. The people of Ajmere, who were so long in dark about the life and teachings of Mahaprabu, are highly impressed with the interpretation of Sanatan Dharma by Sri Chaitanya Deva as represented to them by the learned preachers from Bengal.

Delhi :—Owing to the earnest solicitation of an ardent devotee, Srijut Krishna Chandra Banerjee of New Delhi, His Holiness Srila Paramhansa Maharaj arrived here with a party of thirty of his associates. Srijut Banerjee sincerely tried to give the citizens of Delhi ample opportunity to know, for the first time, the extremely democratic and universal interpretation of Sanatan Dharma by Mahaprabu Sri Chaitanya as the only logical truth flowing from the eternal fountain of the Sastras. The present propaganda has been a revelation of new truths to many and a source of unbound joy to all. In a huge meeting at New Delhi attended by the public as well as the Government officers in large numbers, Srila Paramhansa Maharaj delivered a long and interesting lecture, in course of which, he analytically pointed out the comparative excellence of the sublime philosophy of Sri Chaitanya over all other schools both eastern and western. The whole audience was impressed with the profound scholarship and perfect realisation of the speaker. Tridandi Swamiji Srimad Bhakti Sarbaswa Giri was invited in many respectable houses to explain the Bhagawat, The eloquent Swamiji Srimad Bhakti Hridaya Ban delivered several Hindi and English speeches, both at the New Delhi and at Old Delhi, on the teachings of Sri Chaitanya. Tridandi Swamiji Srimad Bhakti Bibek Bharati in his usual soul-animating language explained the Bhagawat in several Bengali gentlemen's houses and inspired them all with the Love of Mahapravu. Srimad Bhakti Saranga Goswami Pravu preached in many quarters both in Hindi and in English the unique religion of Mahapravu and thus the whole atmosphere of the Imperial city is surcharged with new ideas about this great religion.

Brindaban :—The annual celebrations of the Mahotsab ceremony at the Krishna Chaitanya Math, Brindaban commenced from the second week of October and lasted for about a month. A large number of disciples of his Holiness attended the grand ceremony which was farther joined by a large number of domiciled Baishnabs, hundreds of local Brajabashis and many respectable gentlemen of the locality and numerous temporary sojourners from difference provinces of India. The preachers held several public meetings in all parts of Brindaban and spoke at length on pure Bhagawat Dharma. Everywhere they announced, without any reservation, that any sort of haphazardly or compromising manner in religious life could make our position none the better and thus recommended strict purity in mind in practices private and in association with others—just in the lines as Sri Gaur Sundar had Himself taught us. At the Sri Krishna Chaitanya Math, Tridandi Swamij Srimad Bhakti Bibek Bharati and Swamiji Srimad Bhakti Baibhab Sagar daily explained the Srimad Bhagawat both morning and evening to hundreds of eager audience; and the force and directness of appeal of the Swamijis, drew water from many eyes and left all sobbing in repentance at the end. All were daily treated to Sri Mahaprosad in profuse quantity without any discrimination. The circumambulation ceremonies of Panchacroshi, of Sridham, of Debayatan etc. were performed with great pomp and procession, attended by innumerable people with Sankirtan. The observances of Gobardhan worship and Annakut Mahotsab were participated by thousands of persons. Srila Paramhansa Maharaj arrived there on the 3rd Nov. the Anniversary day of the Math and a public meeting was held at the close of which Pandit Srijakta Madhusudan Goswmi of Brindaban moved a vote of thanks. On that day the distribution of Mahaprasad in varities was accomplished with an exceptional profuseness to numberless visitors while Srila Paramhansa Maharaj and Srimad Acharyyatrika Provu were standing near by to see it to the close.

THE HARMONIST.

We have received the June (1927) issue of Sree Sajjanatoshani which has appeared for the first time in both its English and Sanskrit garb and is named "Sree Sajjanatoshani or the Harmonist." The journal was founded by Thakur Bhaktivinode, in the year 1879 as a religious monthly in Bengali mainly discoursing on the sweet religion preached by Lord Gauranga. We are pleased to find the continued prosperity of the paper under the new editor and congratulate him on its present improved form.

The object of the 'Harmonist' can be put in a few words. A passage in the "Chaitanya Bhagabat", a book which records the life and teachings of Lord Gauranga, states as follows : "My name will be preached everywhere in all the villages and towns of the whole world." We are told, that the 'Harmonist 'will seek to carry out this desire of the Lord. For the present, She is appearing in English, Sanskrit and Hindi. But She does not by any means desire to confine herself to these languages only as we are told by the editor. The editor continues: The Lord desires His word to be preached to all living beings. The 'Harmonist' stands for this desire. She cherishes the faith that a day will come when His word will be preached everywhere all over the world through the medium of all the languages including the language of animals and plants when this will be practicable. She believes that 'Gaur Sundar' will in the fullness of time raise up fit preachers in every part of the world and in numbers amply sufficient for His purpose. This is the message of the 'Harmonist.'

We wish the journal all success. Its annual subscription is (Indian) Rs. 3-8 and (foreign) 6 shillings including postage. A specimen copy can be had for As. 5 only. All communications regarding the "Harmonist" is to be addressed to the Manager at Sree Gaudia Math, 1, Ultadingi Junction Road, P. O. Shyambazar, Calcutta.

Sree Krishna Chaitanya and How to Attain Him

(A speech delivered by the Editor at the Sachchidananda Math, Cuttack, on 10th July, 1927.)

"नमो महावदान्याय कृष्णप्रेमप्रदाय ते ।
कृष्णाय कृष्णचैतन्यनाम्ने गौरत्विषे नमः ॥

ON a certain day, at the Dasasvamedha ghat at Prayag, Sri Rupa Goswamin Prabhu worshipped the Feet of Sri Gaursundar with this sloka—'O Krishna, I make obeisance to Thee. Thy Name is Sri Krishna-Chaitanya. Thy colour is yellow. Thy quality is great magnanimity. Thy action is the bestowal of love for Krishna. Even such is Krishna. To whom I make my obeisance.' The hearer is Sri Gaursundar. The speaker is Sri Rupa Goswamin. A third person, who is arrogant like myself, happens also to hear the above. Who expresses humility ?—Sri Rupa Goswamin Prabhu. Who listens ?—Sri Chaitanyadeva. And Who is He ? May I quote Himself ? His own words are—

"तृणादपि सुनीचेन तरोरपि सहिष्णुणा ।
अमानिना मानदेन कीर्त्तनीयः सदा हरिः ॥"

If anybody coming up to Mahaprabhu happens to say "You are the Son of the Lord of Braja" He at once puts His hands to His ears and protests —"Krishna should be called 'Krishna' ; I am a tiny jiva ; you should not call Me 'Krishna'." By whom alone is the chanting of the Kirtan of Hari possible ?

—By him in whom are found the four qualities viz. (1) extreme lowliness greater than that of a blade of grass. Grass is trodden upon by cows, asses, men, by everyone. I am humbler than such grass. It would be well if all the vain people of the world knew unreservedly that they are very much lower than the blade of grass,—their mouths would then be enabled to utter the Name of Krishna. He who utters the Name of Krishna is most fortunate —

"एतन्निर्विद्यमानानामिच्छतामकुतोभयम् । योगिनां नृप निर्णीतं हरेर्नामानुकीर्तनम् ॥"

—भाः २।१।११

'O King, those who are whole-hearted devotees having attained freedom from desires of this world, those who covet paradise, salvation etc. and those who are self-pleased yogis,—for all without exception the repeated hearing, chanting and recollecting of the qualities of the Name of Hari, these three methods, have been laid down by former Acharyyas as the highest spiritual method as well as object'. (2) Another quality of the chanter or preacher of God's word is utmost patience ; (3) the third quality is want of desire for fame or honour for oneself. The preacher is without pride, without vanity. He has no worldly ambitions. (4) The fourth quality is readiness to give due honour to others. Sri Gaursundar Who exhibits the ideal of the possessor of all humility, Sri Gaursundar Who is the Teacher of the greatest humility, listens to the following from the lips of Sri Rupa—

"नमो महावदान्याय कृष्णप्रेमप्रदाय ते । कृष्णाय कृष्णचैतन्यनाम्ने गौरत्विषे नमः ॥"

—All intelligent persons, have agreed upon the four objects of human life mentioned in the shastras as being the very best that man can desire. Even those four objects are 'fit to be scorned' by love for Krishna which has been called 'the fifth object of life'— You are the Giver of that love for Krishna which is the highest object of life and which can afford to contemn the four objects most desired by mankind. You are Krishna Himself. Being Yourself Krishna You are also the bestower of the love for Krishna. You bear the Name of Krishna-Chaitanya (the conscious principle in Krishna). You are Gouranga i. e., of golden complexion. You are extremely magnanimous. How could Gaursundar Who teaches the world to be devoid of vanity, to be ready to give due honour to others, how could the same Krishna-Chaitanya listen to the edification of Himself from the lips of Rupa Goswamin ?

In to-day's assembly—

"जगाइ माधाइ हैते मुञि से पापिष्ठ ।
पुरीषेर कीट हैते मुञि से लघिष्ठ ॥
मोर नाम शुने येइ, तार पुण्यक्षय ।
मोर नाम लय येइ, तार पाप हय ॥"

[I am more sinful than Jagai and Madhai,
I am meaner than maggot bred in offal,
Who so-ever hears my name loses the merit of his virtuous acts,
My name who-so-ever utters commits sin]

—the onus of honouring this most sh meless, the basest of all base creatures, has been undertaken by no less than a person who is endowed with very high social status, a person of ripest experience, one of the very best of men. He undoubtedly possesses the highest excellence. But is there to be found one other such brute who will voluntarily listen to long-drawn eulogies of himself from this most excellent person as he undoubtedly is? It is only a very bad man, a very great sinner, who can willingly listen to such praise of himself.

We have taken upon ourselves the responsibility of welcoming this grave charge. All the audience have accepted ordinary seats, I alone have been provided with a lofty seat. All are being told in effect—'Do have a look at a big animal from the Zoo-gardens. What arrogance! So foolish! So wicked! Have you ever seen such a big brute? Garlands of flowers have been put round his neck! What laudations! What bombastic long-drawn, wordy adjectives! And how complacently too he is listening to the praise of his own achievements—how intently, and with his own ears! He also evidently feels delighted in mind! Is he not acting in plain violation of the teaching of Mahaprabhu? Can such a big brute, so selfish and insolent, be ever reclaimed from brutishness?

I happen to be one of the greatest of fools. No one offers me good advice on account of my arrogance.

In as much as nobody condescends to instruct me I placed my case before Mahaprabhu Himself. The thought occurred to me that I would make over the charge of myself to Him and see what He advises me to do. Then Sri Goursundar said to me—

Whom-so-ever thou meet'st, instruct him regarding Krishna,
By My command being guru
deliver this land;
In this thou wilt not be obstructed
by the current of the world;
Thou wilt have My company once again at this place.]*

He Whose only teaching is humility, greater than that of a blade of grass, said—"By My command being guru save this land!" In this instance Mahaprabhu Himself gives the command, His command being 'Perform the duty of the guru' even as I do it Myself.

*"यारे देख तारे कह कृष्ण उपदेश।
आमार आज्ञाय गुरु हञा तार' एइ देश॥
इहाते ना बाधिबे तोमार विषय-तरङ्ग।
पुनरपि एइ ठाञि पाबे मोर सङ्ग॥"

Also convey this command to whom-so-ever you chance to meet.' Chaitanya deva says, 'Tell them these very words viz. 'By My command being guru save this land. Deliver the people from their foolishness.' Now who so-ever happens to hear these words would naturally protest with palms joined—'But I am really a great sinner, how can I be guru? You are God-head Himself, the Teacher of the world. You can be guru'. To this Mahaprabhu replies—

"In this thou wilt not be obstructed by the current of the world.
Thou wilt have My company once again
at this place"

Therefore, in this case there is no risk of forgetting Krishna. Whenever it is less than 180 degrees or 360 degrees the result is angularity. But on the level ground or at 360 degrees there is no angular vision. If God or things that are of God can be shown to be analogous to 360 degrees there would be no angular defects in such matters.

The thing called the world troubles us; colour, taste, smell, touch, sound—dash themselves against us in mighty waves. For this reason it does not pay to be worldli-minded.

[Sri Chaitanyadeva said, "Those who wish to get across the sea of the world, for such persons, who are intent on serving God and are free from desire for all other objects, the very sight of worldly people and of females is worse than the swallowing of poison.]*

He who wants to be employed in the service of God should never cast his eye on any worldly person. By the vision of the partial appearance of the external, physical world the vision of of God is shut out. No sooner does the world, or, in other words, anything perceptible by the senses, presents itself, it at once causes forgetfulness of god;—and all those persons who are connected with God look 'small'. One who is moving forward on the path of devotion with the object of serving God should, therefore, by all means avoid the sight of worldly persons. Woman is the world and possessors of woman are all worldly persons. Do not cast your eye on the associates of females, or even on the companions of the associates of females. Gaursundar as a physician prescribes the following for us—"Do not associate with those who are addicted to the world, to women—never do it. Mahaprabhu has declared—

"By My command being guru save this land".
"In this land of Bharata being born a man,'

*"निष्किञ्चनस्य भगवद्भजनोन्मुखस्य
पारं परं जिगमिषोर्भवसागरस्य।
सन्दर्शनं विषयिणामथ योषिताञ्च हा हन्त हन्त विषभक्षणतोऽप्यसाधु॥"
—(चैतन्यचन्द्रोदय-नाटके ८।२४)

Realising the significance of such birth, do good to others."
Giving up malice be full of kindness for jivas.

Do not practise the craft of a guru for the purpose of injuring others through malice. Do not adopt the trade of a guru in order to get immersed in the slough of this world. But if you can, indeed, be My guileless servant you will be endowed with My power ;—then you need not fear.'

I have no fear. My gurudeva has heard this from his gurudeva. And it is for this reason that he (my gurudeva) has accepted even such a great sinner as myself and has told me—

"By My command being guru
save this land."

It is only those who have never heard these words of Gaursundar who say 'How odd ! to listen to one's own praise !' While the guru is instructing his disciple in the eleventh skandha of the Bhagabat what a great sin, in their opinion, is he not perpetuating ! What is the Acharyya to do when he has to explain the Sloka 'आचार्यं मां विजानीयात्, 'Never disregard the Acharyya. Never entertain the idea that the Acharyya is your equal in any sense.'—These are the words of Sri Krishna Himself by which the jiva is to be benefited. Is the guru to take himself off, to desert his seat—the seat of the Acharyya—from which these words are to be explained ? That office his gurudeva has conferred on him. If he does not act up to its requirements he is doomed to perdition by reason of his offence against the holy Name in the shape of disrespect towards the guru (गुर्व्वज्ञा). He has to do it inspite of the fact that such procedure is apparently open to the charge of egoism. When the guru imparts the mantram to the disciple should he not tell him 'By this mantram worship the guru' ? Should he. Say instead 'Give the guru a few strokes of the shoe or the horse-whip' ? 'The guru is never to be decried. The guru is the abode of all the gods.' Should the gurudeva abstain from communicating these words to his disciple while reading the Bhagabata to him ? ['यस्य देवे परा भक्तिर्यथा देवे तथा गुरौ' 'To him alone who possesses guileless spiritual devotion, similar to the transcendental devotion that is due to Krishna Himself, to the gurudeva, the holy mysteries are manifested.'—Is the gurudeva not to tell these things to his disciple ? 'आदौ गुरुपूजा' । 'The worship of the guru has precedence over all others. The guru is to be served just as Krishna is served. The guru is to be worshipped in a particular way.' Is the guru to desert his seat without telling all these things to the disciple ? In the angle there is always the defect in the shape of absence of the fulness, the [illegible] of level, of 180 degrees or of 360 degrees. But in the plain surface, in 360 degrees, there is no such defect. That in the emancipated state no defect is possible,—this simple truth ordinary foolish people entirely fail to grasp.

"Whom the entire body of the shastras has proclaimed to be as the inseparable image of Sri Hari Himself and who is meditated upon by Sadhus as such, but yet who is the best-beloved of the Lord ;—I pay my adoration to the lotus feet of Sri Gurudeva (who is the manifested image inconceivably different from, and yet identical with, God Himself)."*

You should think of the gurudeva in the same way as you think of God Himself. You should not think of him as in any way less than God. It is the duty of sadhus of the learned, of Brahmans versed in the Vedas, to know the guru as God Himself, to worship him, to serve him. If any one does not do so he will fall from the position of the disciple.

"किन्तु प्रभोर्यः प्रिय एव तस्य वन्दे गुरोः श्रीचरणारविन्दम् ॥"

If that great personage, Srignaudeva, is not spoken of as being identical with God, as being the image of God Himself, such mouth will never be able to utter the Name of God. Here is the evidence of the Sruti—

"यस्य देवे परा भक्तिर्यथा देवे तथा गुरौ । तस्यैते कथिता ह्यर्थाः प्रकाशन्ते महात्मनः ॥"

"He alone is able to understand the mystery of the Sruti who thinks of the guru as identical with God Himself."

"आमार प्रभुर प्रभु श्रीगौरसुन्दर ।"
"यद्यपि आमार गुरु चैतन्येर दास । तथापि जानिये आमि ताँहार प्रकाश ॥"

It is as it were a hand is attached to the body of God Who is all-existance, all-intelligence, all bliss. With this hand God rubs His own feet. The hand of God is his own limb. In this case God is serving Himself. God himself appears as the guru in order to teach how to serve himself. My gurudeva is also in the same way identical with God. He is one body with God. There is God who is to be served, there is also God who serves—God as Object (विषय) and God as Support (आश्रय). Mukunda is God to be served, He is Object-God. The best beloved of Mukunda—Sri Gurudeva—is serving—God, God the Support. There is no one so dearly loved by God as my gurudeva. He alone is the best beloved of the Lord. Our gurudeva has said—

[O my mind, whether it be religion that has been prescribed, or irreligion that has been forbidden by the Vedas, you need perform neither. Placed as you are in this world propagate the unstinted service of Sri Radha-Krishna

* "साक्षाद्धरित्वेन समस्तशास्त्रै- in Braja and recollect unceasingly the Darling Son of Sri Sachi, Sri Goursundar, knowing Him to be not different from the Son of Nanda, and the great gurudeva knowing him to be the best-beloved of Mukunda.]*

'In the gostha, i. e., in Nabadvip—Baikuntha—Svetadvip—Brindaban, never stint in your regard for the denizens of Nabadvip and Braja in as much as they are the Servitors of Gaur-Krishna. Do not contemn Brahmanas and Vaishnavas.'

As for example, if having sat down to meal, aparing gentle manners, we choose to take insufficient food, thereby the belly will not be filled. If we cheat the smith in the matter of steel or, if not being able to understand how to do a sum in Mathematics we feel ashamed of confessing our ignorance to the teacher, no success will be gained.

As the saying goes 'having started on the dance it is no use to draw close the veil.' I am doing the duty of the guru, but if I preach that no one should shout 'jai' to me, that is to say, 'if I say in the round about way' 'sing 'jai' to me', it would be nothing short of duplicity. Our gurudeva has not taught us such insincerity.—Mahaprabhu has not taught such insincerity. I have to serve God in the straight-forward way. The word of God has come down to the gurudeva ; I have to obey it in all sincerity. I will not disrespect the guru at the instance of any foolish or malicious sectarians. Especially as Sri Gurudeva has directed me saying, "By my command being guru save this land". This command has reached my gurudeva. My gurudeva in his turn has conveyed the command to me. I will not be guilty of any insincerity in carrying out that command. In this matter I will not accept the ideal of ignorant, insincere, pseudo-ascetic sectarianism. I will not learn insincerity. The worldli-minded, the malicious, the pseudo renunciationists, the selfish cannot understand how the devotees of God, spurning at everything of this world by command of God never, not even for a second, deviate from the service of God through all the twenty-four hours.

Hypocritical sectarians, pseudo-Vaishnava sects, those sects that cherish internally the longing for earthly fame, naturally enough think 'what a shame it is to listen to the eulogies of disciples occupying the seat of the guru !' But every Vaishnava regards everyone of the Vaishnavas as the object of his veneration. When Thakur Haridas exhibits the attitude of humility Mahaprabhu says,—'You are the greatest of the world, the crest-jewel of the world. Be agreeable, let us have our meal together.' He carries in His arms the body of Thakur Haridas which is eternally existent, self-conscious and full of spiritual bliss. In the community that follows Sri Rupa, the qualities of desiring no honour for oneself and of readiness to duly honour others are fully present. Those who detect any disparity are, like the owl, blind while the sun shines. They commit an offence by such conduct.

But one conditioned like myself—a chandal, foolish, arrogant, petty, shameless, wicked,—is by no means the subject-matter of the observations made above. With regard to this matter I declare that what I am doing is not a sample of my own good manners. This is a law of mankind. This law through the chain of preceptorial succession has come down to me. If I disobey the law the offence due to omission to carry out the command of the guru will sever me from the lotus feet of Sri Gurudeva. If in order to carry out the command of the Vaishnava guru I have to be arrogant, to be brutish, to suffer eternal perdition, I am prepared to welcome such eternal damnation and even sign a pact to that effect. I will not listen to the words of other malicious persons in lieu of the command of the gurudeva. I will dissipate, with my strong fist, the currents of thougt of all the rest of the world, relying on the on the strength derived from the lotus feet of Sri gurudeva. I confess to this arrogance. By sprinkling a particle of the pollen of the lotus feet of my Preceptor crores of people like you will be saved. There is no such learning in this world, no such sound reasoning in all the fourteen worlds, in no man-gods, that can weigh more than a solitary particle of the dust of the lotus feet of my gurudeva. Gurudeva does not spite me. I am by no means prepared to listen to the words of any one who wants to hurt me, or, to accept such a malicious person as my preceptor. This is what Sri Damodar Swarap says in the presence of Sri Chaitanya-deva—

[Thou ocean of mercy, Sri Chaitanya, on the manifestation of Thy mercy the dust in the shape of mental disquietude is easily wafted away from the heart, and, thereupon, the heart is cleansed of all impurities. Then is manifested, in the clean heart, the highest bliss born of devotion to Sri Krishna. The conflicting interpretations of the Shastras give rise in the mind to opposing speculations which join in a perpetual strife. Only by obtaining Thy mercy the favoured heart is intoxicated with the elixir of the devotion to God whereupon the wranglings of the Shastras cease to disturb. Thy mercy promotes perenniel devotion, or, in other words, directs all jivas to their respective natural functions. Thy mercy, weaning from hankering for objects other than Krishna, conducts jivas to the final limit of beatitude. Thou ocean of kindness, Sri Chaitanya, may that non-evil-producing mercy of Thine down upon me !]*

When Sri Swarup Damodar speaks these words to Sri Chaitanya-deva, Chaitanya-deva does not avoid listening to him. Yet in order to teach humility to foolish people He exhibits at times another line of conduct observing 'such words should not be addressed to Me', but not for the purpose of teaching 'duplicity'. Ignorant people naturally entertain doubts. In reply to those I have to-day offered merely a side of a part of my explanations. In course of one day I have no right to encroach longer on your time. I have learnt from gurudeva—

जगाइ माधाइ हैते मुञि से पापिष्ठ ॥"

I am certainly as contemptible as the maggot bred in offal. But when my gurudeva, by command of his guru, by command of Mahaprabhu, conducts himself in the aforesaid manner, may no one offend at his feet.

May all of you have pity on me, the most heavily handicapped of all creatures, in as much as you happen to be of a liberal disposition. You are always forgiving many persons of all sorts. May you do good to us by similarly pardoning even this most arrogant of all persons who is no other than myself.

Manifold obeisance to the Vaishnavas, the Saviours or the fallen, oceans of mercy, purpose—trees yielding all desires. *

Offering for the Worship of Sri Sri Vyasadeva

My humble offering of the heart's exclusive devotion at the holy feet of my affectionate and Divine Master.

My Master,

ON the occasion of this fifty-fourth anniversary of your advent into this world I lay at your holy feet this humble offering of my heart's pure devotion. May the affectionate and Divine Master out of His infinite mercy vouchsafe to overlook its imperfections and be pleased to accept it.

My Master,

What I owe to you I can only know and express by your Divine grace and through submission at your holy feet. The greatest of mercies that you have vouchsafed to me has been this that you have taught me to submit to your holy feet and have kept me bound to your holy feet not-with-standing my persistent efforts to run away from you. I do not know, you, alone know, how ready I have always been to wilfully misunderstand and oppose all your efforts on my behalf, and to you alone is known, and very dimly to me through your grace, to what extremities of exertion you have been driven in order to find the device for the allaying of my disloval inclinations and leading me back to the shelter of your holy feet. You know my inmost heart and, even as I confess it, I stand most in need of your mercy. In thus trying to make me submit exclusively to your holy feet what a storm of universal opposition and calumnies have you not quietly and cheerfully ignored :—that also you alone know. This exclusive submission which you are always trying to teach me I offer at your holy feet.

My Master,

You have made me aware that this exclusive submission to your holy feet is the only true freedom. The emancipation of the spirit from the thraldom of this material world is indeed a mere secondary result of such submission.

My Master,

In the spirit there is no limitation. In the spirit absolute submission is the eternal condition of the most perfect freedom. It is the eternal nature of the jiva-soul, when it is unhampered by material complications, unceasingly to serve the Guru, the Divine Master, who is identical with God Himself. Absolute submission to Hari, the Preceptor and the Vaishnavas—all of which are the one and the same thing—can alone lift the bound jiva to his own really natural level of free spiritual service of the transcendental Reality. Submission to the Divine Master is not to be compared with submission to any worldly object.

My Master,

You are the Embodiment of the Word of God. The Word of God has been imparted by Sri Narayana Himself to Sri Brahma, by Sri Brahma to Sri Narada, by Sri Narada to Sri Vyasadeva and by him embodied in the Sattvata Shastras and most unambiguously, in the Srimad Bhagabata. It is Sri Vyasadeva who always and in every age teaches the Word of God to this world.

My Master,

You are the spiritual successor of Sri Vyasadeva and therefore, identical with him. You have received the Word of God in the preceptorial succession from him and you are imparting the same to all the jivas of this world. The mighty current of the Word of God flows on eternally. You have made the bounteous current available to us. You have cleared our vision and purified our hearts and having thus made us capable of receiving it given away freely the Word of God.

My Master,

You are the Word of God. Those who do not realise that you are the Word of God naturally misunderstand our devoted worship of your holy feet.

My Master,

The worship of Sri Vyasadeva is identical with the worship of the Word of God. The Word of God is identical with God Himself. God Himself can alone give us the Word of God. In the form of Sri Vyasadeva, in the form of the Acharyya, it is God Himself who gives Himself away to those jivas who cherish eternal aversion against the Lord. Submission to Sri Gurudeva is submission to the Word of God, submission to Sri Vyasadeva who is no other than the Lord Himself in the form of the Acharyya.

My Master,

You are the living Word of God. You alone can give us the Word of God if we believe in the Word of God and, believing, submit to Him that is to your self, to Sri Vyasadeva, who declares the Truth to the bound jivas.

My Master,

We, fallen jivas, led astray by our limited, unspiritual experiences of this world, in our ignorance, make a distinction between you and the sattvata Sastras. We wrongly imagine that we can serve the Word of God without submitting to your holy feet. This is a blunder to which we are unavoidably subject so long as we happen to be in the bound state. Because in the bound state we cannot at all realise that in the spirit there are no dividing lines like those that exist in this material world. The Shastras are unanimous on this point. But in the pride of empiricism, and so-called rationalism which in its current sense is the same as empiricism,—of egoism, we cannot understand this fundamental fact of spiritual existence although we may profess to be deeply versed in the scriptures.

My Master,

It is you alone who can free us from this ignorance of our real self. You are always trying to help us. But we, in our ignorance, refuse to receive your offered help. We mistake abject slavery of the senses for freedom and freedom of the spirit for slavery. And, therefore, when you, out of your infinite mercy, offer us perfect freedom in the shape of exclusive devotion to your holy feet, that is to say, to the Word of God, to God Himself, we in the foolishness of our empiric wisdom refuse to accept the eternal and natural function of the jiva-soul viz. the unceasing and free service of the Absolute, and prefer the state of perpetual bondage in the fetters of Maya. This is so because everything in this world, including our empiric knowledge is the perverted reflection of the Absolute.

My Master,

We have no option in this worship of Sri Vyasadeva. The worship of Sri Vyasadeva is the only function of the jiva-soul in the bound as well as in the free state. In this exclusive and continuous submission to the holy feet of the Acharyya who is the Enbodiment of the Word of God lies our only hope of being restored to the state of grace while we are fallen and of continuing in it while we are free. It is not a mere complimentary ceremony performed for the nonce like the thousands of ceremonies of this world. It is on the other hand absolutely and perpetually necessary for the attainment and preservation of our very spiritual existence. It is verily a matter of life and death to us in the strictly real sense. It is not a tamasha. Neither is it an exaggeration.

My Master,

This public demonstration on such a magnificent scale of our devotion to you is a duty that is most emphatically and clearly enjoined by the scriptures. You are as merciful as the Word of God itself. And, therefore, you have graciously offered us, fallen jivas, this unique opportunity of obeying God, and, by such act of obedience, regaining the consciousness of the only eternal function of the jiva-soul viz. the exclusive devotion to your holy feet. May your grace help us to realise your unparalleled and perfect kindness in this and in every act of yours.

My Master.

Between this worship of your holy feet and the God-less activities of fallen jivas there is all the difference that separates the worship of God from the worship of the ego. All ceremonials of this world are more or less the worship of the ego. We fallen jivas, have no taste for functions that do not minister directly or indirectly to the gratification of our senses. This worship of your holy feet holds out no prospect of selfish enjoyment. To bound jivas the function must, therefore, appear to be useless or even harmful. It seems to be harmful because such exclusive submission to your holy feet completely takes away the freedom for all sensuous activities. It is in fact diametrically opposed to the current of this world; and this world is the limit of the vision of us, fallen jivas. This world provides ample gratification, in every gross and refined form, to our senses. We consider it unprofitable to forego completely this excellent opportunity of selfish enjoyment. Anything that comes in its way appears to us to be opposed to our happiness and, therefore, harmful.

My Master,

As soon as we submit to your holy feet we are immediately and completely freed from this fatal delusion. The scales fall from our eyes. We live again in the spirit. With your own hands you wash off every impurity that clogs our vision. And, lo! the spells of Maya are broken for ever! We are taken out of the dark dungeon and breathe again the pure and bracing air of freedom.

My Master,

In proportion as our submission is complete and sincere this new vision that we receive from you becomes clearer. And, thereupon, you reveal yourself to us in an infinite variety of ways that are truely most wonderful. We meet you everywhere and in every act of our new life and on every occasion you wear a new form.

My Master,

As soon as we submit to your holy feet we regain the consciousness of our eternal life. And thus we are at once and for ever freed from all fear of death. We realise our true relationship to God and the night-mare of this limited existence ceases to trouble us any further.

My Master,

As soon as you are pleased to accept us as your servants we at once realise it is identical with the service of God. We also realise that in our true nature we are the eternal servants of God and that the service of God is eternally conditional on submission and obedience to you. You alone can give us the service of God and we can have it in no other way and can have it only just so long as we continue to be really obedient to you. We, therefore, owe to you not mere external and temporary obedience but exclusive and eternal obedience with mind, body and speech in return for the eternal service of God.

My Master,

As soon as we submit to you we are freed from all worldly, all transitory and impure hankerings. The heart is thoroughly cleansed of all impurities and becomes a fit abode for the transcendental Lord. You are revealed to us by this absolute purity of the heart that results from submission to your holy feet.

My Master,

You are not content with merely freeing your servant from the boudage of the world. You lead him by degrees towards the direct service, under yourself, of Sri Krishna Himself.

My Master,

As soon as we submit to your holy feet you impart to us the spiritual understanding and all our doubts are cleared up. The Word of God is then understood by us. We find ourselves face to face with the Absolute Truth. The Scriptures no longer appear to be full of contradictions. Their true meaning is revealed to us and they present to us the infinite Absolute Truth through every word in them.

My Master,

We are then enabled to realise, however dimly, the infinite mercy of Sri Krishna in sending you, His best beloved, into this world to save us, fallen jivas, from the clutches of Maya and restore us to our natural state of loving and free service of himself, relying on your help. The perfect wisdom of this Divine Dispensation is manifest in this that you enable us to serve the Lord by associating us in your service of Him. You make use of us as instruments in serving the Lord and you leave out none of us. We are purified by being thus used in the service of the Lord and as the crust of impurities is gradually softened and finally washed off the spiritual nature is laid bare and we are enabled consciously to serve the Lord. There could be no better method of carrying out the wish of the Lord to restore fallen jivas to the state of grace. The unconscious service of the Lord thus provided by you is the only method open to the bound jivas for regaining their lost spiritual freedom and the conscious service of the Lord.

My Master,

In fact, God Himself stretches out His own right hand to lift us from the abysmal depths of this mundane existence. The Absolute Truth is ever coming down to us in this way as we are unable, unaided by God Himself, to attain to it. Sri Vyasadeva tells us of this descent of the Absolute Truth in the Brahmasutra, in the Geeta and most unambiguously of all, in the Srimad Bhagabata. He tells us to believe in the Acharyya, to believe in Himself, to believe in the spiritual preceptional succession, as the channel provided by God Himself for the descent of the Word of God to the bound jiva. This is the Srauta method.

My Master,

Those who pretend to think that the Word of God,—the Brahmasutra, the Geeta, the Srimad Bhagabata,—can be understood without complete submission to your holy feet, disbelieve the clear injunctions of those very spiritual scriptures. To those who are devoid of reverence for the scriptures the Word of God is not revealed.

My Master,

There is no injustice or irrationality or whimsicality in this. The word of God is identical with God Himself. How can those who really profess the desire to serve God refuse to believe in the Word of God ? It is this duplicity that clouds their understanding and shuts it out from the vision of the Truth.

My Master,

The jiva is part and parcel of God Himself. The will of the jiva is allowed as perfect freedom as that enjoyed by the will of God Himself. The nature of the jiva is spiritual like that of God Himself. The difference between the two is that God is great and all-powerful whereas the jiva is a tiny part of God and powerless, and also liable to succumb to the fatal and deceptive allurements of the illusory energy of God which is nothing but prostitution of the free will in souls. The jiva is a tiny particle of spirit exposed to the opposing influences of the spiritual and non-spiritual powers of God. It cannot stand on its own legs but must place itself under the protection of one or other of these two powers. The spiritual power is the Divine power proper. The illusory power, Maya, is the correlative of the real power. The spiritual power is superior to the illusory power which stands in much the same relation to the former as darkness does to light. The jiva-soul is free to choose to serve the spiritual or the illusory power of God. As it possesses no power of its own, it can never be itself the master. The spiritual power of God offers the jiva the direct service of the Lord which is the natural function of the jiva. But Maya offers to serve the jiva and promises it the enjoyment of all her treasures.

My Master,

Those jivas who prefer their own selfish enjoyment to the service of God fall into the meshes of Maya. For the fall of those jivas God is not responsible. The jivas are tiny and powerless particles of Spirit. They can properly function in the Kingdom of God only, so long as they behave in accordance with their eternal nature as servants of the Lord upheld by the spiritual power of God in the performance of the service of the Lord under your direction. But if being tempted by Maya they forget their relationship to God and their own real nature and become averse to the service of God under His own direction, they are at once endowed with limited material bodies and minds which obscure their vision of the Kingdom of God and substitute in its place this material world and make them think that they do ever belong to this material world of which they supposed themselves to be masters,—a pseudo-notion and creation of Maya by the will of the Lord. The belief induced by Maya that the jiva is the lord, is utter delusion. As a matter of fact, the bound jivas are not the masters but the slaves of their material senses, the gift of Maya to her victims.

My Master,

But we are so enchanted by Maya that we never cease to hope for acquiring some day the real mastery over her and becoming like God, by our own effort. These fancies give rise to two rival schools of thought. The duller people expect, as the sequel, unlimited material enjoyment of both gross and refined varieties. But those who are more logical find that the enjoyments provided by Maya are always of a limited character and more than balanced by positive misery and disappointments. They discover that the pursuit of such enjoyment is more a disease to be got rid of than a blessing to be cherished. They accordingly endeavour to attain a state in which they will be free from both pleasure and pain, and from all hankerings after worldly enjoyment. To the first group belong all communities of utilitarians. The second group is made up of all emancipationists who work up to their position by following the chain of negative reasoning described above. Both agree in their desire for an ideal existence for themselves built up by their constructive imaginations on the experience of this world. Both are really worshippers of the ego. Both regard the jiva in his present condition as the centre of all existence and everything is valued by reference to its present, selfish and temporary needs. The idea of God is necessarily secondary or even superfluous or the jiva himself is actually identified with God.

My Master,

This indifference or aversion to God, aversion to the service of God, aversion to submission to God, which the Almighty Father out of His infinite mercy is pleased to permit because He has ordained the eternal freedom of the choice of function for the jiva, is however, in the nature of things, necessarily and rightly overtaken by the terrible nemesis of his incarceration in the prison house of Maya. This disaster cannot be really prevented without taking away from the jiva all freedom in the choice of function.

(To be continued.)

Thakur Haridas.

WHEN the Divine Gaur Hari arrived at Advaita's house at Santipur after acceptance of Sannyas Thakur Haridas came to learn that the Lord would in future reside at Nilachal. He gave vent to his feeling of despair lamenting his own evil lot being then under the impression that it would not be possible for him to be in the close proximity of the Lotus Feet of Sri Gaursundar if He chose to stay at Nilachal. Prabhu Haridas at the time supposed that the Divine Sri Chaitanyadeva would take up His residence within the holy Temple at Sri Kshetra where his entry would not be allowed as it would be against the rules of the place; and it would, therefore, be impossible for him to stay in the close proximity of the Lord. But when he heard from the mouths of devotees that the Lord lived at the house of Kasi Misra and that there was no objection to his staying outside the Temple he made his way to Nilachal in the company of the other devotees.

The love of Sri Chaitanyachandra knows no bounds. Overjoyed at the arrival of Haridas at Nilachal Sri Gaursundar persisted in repeatedly inviting him to honour the mahaprasadam in the company of the Vaishnavas. But the great Thakur actuated by his innate sense of humility without agreeing to the proposal fulfilled the will of the Lord by keeping at a distance from the devotees.

Thenceforward Sri Thakur Haridas spent his days in the bliss of secluded devotional practices in a solitary hut inside a garden close to the house of Kasi Misra. In recent years that devotional site has become very well-known under the name of 'Siddha-Bokul-Math An ancient bokul tree on the spot still indicates the place of devotion of Thakur Mahasaya. The servitors of Jagannathdeva are orthodox Brahmans. For this reason knowing that it would be an offence if he touched them by accident Thakur Haridas went along the highways with the greatest circumspection and served Sri Hari by watching and making obeisances to the disc that crowns the holy shrine standing in some narrow by-lane purposely avoiding the more open roads.

The quota of the holy Name repeated daily by Thakur Haridas was ever duly completed every day. Srila Rupa and Sanatan Goswamins, in pursuance of the humility of the great Thakur, during their stay with Sri Gaursundar, lived in huts closed to the revered Thakur. The Lord on listening, from the mouth of Sri Rupa, to the sloka 'तुण्डे ताण्डविनी' etc. danced with ecstacy and Himself preached the glories of the holy Name.

The utterance of the Name of God free from guile but without understanding one's true relationship with God is called Namabhasa or 'the dim reflection of the Name'. All jivas are freed from the bondage of Maya by the 'dim reflection of the Name.' All creatures moving as well as motionless are emancipated by listening to the holy Name when it is chanted aloud. Sriman Mahaprabhu judged both Haridas and Sanatan to be the most highly versed in the mellow quality (रसः) of devotion. Sri Haridas Thakur told Sri Sanatan, 'It is not possible to fully describe your good fortune. The Lord Himself calls your body His own treasure. There is no one who is so fortunate as yourself. The work that He is unable to do at Mathura by means of His own body He will make you perform at that place. Sri Sanatan thereupon made this reply to Sri Haridas. 'You are the most fortunate of the entourage of Mahaprabhu. There is none like yourself. The preaching of the holy Name is the special work of this manifestation of the Lord. That work the Lord performs by your means. You chant daily three lacs of the holy Name. You preach the glories of the holy Name to all. You perform the twin functions of preaching and practising. You are the teacher of all,—you are the best of the world.'

To attribute sinfulness to a Vaishnava on account of his appearance in a family belongs to a low social grade or for his diseases of the body, does not stand to reason. Sri Gaursundar made Prabhu Haridas understand the truth of this. The devotee of Krishna is eternally engaged in the service of Hari. He is a being situated wholly beyond the limits of this physical nature. The grossness of the diversities of material nature cannot touch him. The body of the Vaishnava is eternally existent, self-conscious, and full of Divine bliss. Although ever liable to ignorance in the shape of aversion to Hari the Vaishnava who is the eternal servant of Krishna is, in his proper self, a particle of pure Intelligence. The state of bondage and aversion to Hari is due to the abuse of freedom of will by the jiva. Such bound jiva by the force of un-consciously performed spiritual work attains the association of the great spiritual preceptor who is exclusively devoted to the service of Krishna. By continuing under the shelter of the holy feet of the preceptor the Krishna-ward faculties of his nature manifest themselves. Thereupon he attains the transcendental knowledge that is located wholly beyond physical nature and is replete with service of Krishna. When it can be affirmed that the knowledge inducing the service of Krishna has been gained—at such stage there remains in the jiva absolutely no ignorance or aversion to Hari. He is then exclusively occupied in the service of Hari having made an offering of his all to Krishna. At the stage the jiva having no worldly predilections or desire for selfish enjoyment is himself turned into a thing of Baikuntha (i.e., the Absolute sphere). His body being ever ready to serve Krishna is no longer polluted by any earthly taint. He is eternally immersed in the transcendental service of the Lord by means of the transcendental body and senses; having crossed the physical universe which is permeated with selfish enjoyment. At such time the physical body and the physical mind fail to assert their powers and are rendered wholly quiescent. Sriman Mahaprabhu said to Sri Thakur Haridas,—"The body of the Vaishnava is never mundane. The transcendental body of the devotee is eternally existent, self-conscious and full of Divine bliss. The devotee makes complete surrender of himself at the time of initiation. At that time Krishna makes him like Himself. He makes that body of his eternal, self-conscious and full of spiritual bliss. With his transcendental body the devotee serves the feet of the Lord.' Those jivas that are averse to Hari are unable to understand the nature of the Vaishnava and the nature of the Name of Krishna by means of their materialistic understanding which is addicted to the pleasures of this world. As aversion to Hari decreases the absence of difference between the holy Name and the Bearer of the Name, the transcendental and eternal nature of the Vaishnava who takes the holy Name, are gradually realised.

71 All of them held back Misra with anxious care,
But the Misra said, 'Leave me, I must beat him to-day.'

72 All joined in protest, 'Misra, you are truly generous,— What goodness is there to beat him ?

73 In his body and mind there is no such thing as right and wrong ;
He is most foolish who beats such a child.

74 'Neither is it likely that he will learn if beaten ;
The child's mind is restless by nature.

75 The pilgrim Brahman coming up in a hurry,
Taking the Misra by the hand said these words—

76 'Listen, great Misra, the Boy is not to blame,
What-ever is ordained for the day needs must happen.

77 'Krishna has not provided cooked rice for me to-day,
This is the root of all I tell you."

78 Jagannath Misra did not lift his face for grief,
Holding down his head he thought on the sad occurrence.

79 Just then thither came the Divine Biswarup,
His figure resplendent with a great radiance.

80 All his limbs exhibited the limit of wondrous loveliness,
Beyod compare in all the fourteen worlds.

81 With the sacrificial thread over the shoulder, the living image of Brahman prowess.—
Nityananda's own self born in a different form.

82 The meaning of all the Scriptures always manifested on his tongue.
Ever solely employed in expounding devotion to Krishna.

83 The pilgrim Brahman on beholding his wonderful appearance, Completely lost in admiration surveyed him closely with a fixed stare.

84 'Whose son is this great soul ?' Asked the Brahman,
They replied, 'He is Misra's son'.

85 On hearing this the Bipra with great pleasure embraced Him—
'Blessed are the parents of such a son.'

86 Biswarup, having made his obeisance to the Bipra,
Being seated, thus spoke and his words flowed in a stream of nectar,— 87 'Auspicious the day and great, indeed, the fortune of him,

In whose house one like yourself chances to be guest.

88 'You travel in order to purify the world ;
You go from place to place full of spiritual ecstacy.

89 'It is high fortune that one illustrious like yourself happens to be my guest,
My misfortune is un-speakable that you are compelled to fast !

90 'In whose house even such as you being guest have to fast,
Such a person reaps the bitter fruit of misfortune in every shape.

91 'Very great, indeed, is the pleasure that I experience beholding you,
Heavy is the grief with which I am afflicted on learning this.'

92 'Be not sorry in the least', said the Bipra,
'I may be given some fruits and roots for my repast.

93 'From where is it possible for me, a dweller of the forest to procure cooked-rice ?
In the forest ordinarily I eat only fruits and roots.

94 'It is seldom that I have cooked-rice
as my food on any day.
As it can be rarely obtained without much difficulty.

95 'The satisfaction that I feel on seeing you Has appeased my hunger millions of times over.

96 'Any fruits, roots, dedicated offerings that may be in the house, Go and bring those, I shall dine on them to-day'.

97 Jagannath Misra made no answer ;
The Misra was pensive, he did not take his hand off his head.

98 'I am afraid to speak,' said Biswarup,
'Your kindness, sir, is easily aroused and is boundless as the sea.

99 'It is the nature of a sadhu to be afflicted by the grief of others,—
He ever augments the joys of others.

100 'For this reason if you would actively bestir yourself
And agree to cook the offering for Krishna.

101 'All the sorrows of my family of this day would be assuaged
And I would experience transcendental bliss.'

102 The Brahman said, 'Twice did I cook
And yet Krishna did not allow me to eat ;

103 'Whence I understand that He does not provide food for me to-day.
It is not the will of Krishna,—what is the use of making all this effort ?

104 'If crores of variety of eatables be in the house
One may have any food only by Krishna's command.

105 That day for which the provision is not made by Krishna
With no amount of effort it is possible to succeed.

106 'One prahara and a half of the night is already past and the second prahara is drawing to a close,
Is it worth the trouble to think of cooking
at this late hour ?

107 'Therefore, cease all further effort for this day ;
I shall eat a little of fruits and roots.'

108 'There is no harm,' rejoined Biswarup,
'All would be happy if you do cook.'

109 With these words Biswarup clasped his feet
And all the family importuned him for cooking again.

110 The good Brahman had been fascinated by the sight of Biswarup
'I shall cook,' the Bipra made reply.

111 In their delight all uttered the Name of Hari
And applied themselves to cleanse the place of cooking

112 The place was quickly made ready for cooking
And all things necessary for the purpose were duly brought.

113 As the illustrious Brahman engaged in cooking
All of them mounted guard over the Child.

114 At the door of the room whence the Lord was in hiding
The Misra seated himself.

115 They agreed that the door be bound fast on the outside
That the Boy may by no means come out again.'

116 'Well thought,' said the Misra, 'this would be the proper thing to do.'
Thus all of them watched outside having bound fast the door

117 The ladies from inside the room said 'there is no cause for anxiety ;
Nimai is fast asleep and cannot know anything.'

118 All of them were thus occupied in carefully guarding the Child.
The cooking of the Brahman was finished soon after.

119 Having prepared the meal that fortunate Brahman
Wrapt in meditation he offered the rice to Krishna.

120 Knower of all hearts, the Darling of Sri Sachi, became aware of this,
It was His will to afford the Bipra the sight of Himself.

121 The goddess of slumber by the will of the Lord.
Cast her spells over everybody and they slept without stirring 122 And now on the spot where the Bipra was offering the rice,

The Darling of holy Sachi appeared.

123 'Alas, Alas !' shouted the Bipra at sight of the Boy,—
But no one could hear him, all being fast asleep.

124 The Lord said,—'Bipra, you are so kind ;
It is you who call upon Me to come, how then am I to blame ?

125 'Mentally repeating My mantra you invoke Me ;
So to you I come unable to stay away.

126 'You constantly meditate to have the sight of Me,
Wherefore I have thus showed Myself to you'—

127 The instant, most woudrous to behold, the Bipra saw Conch, disc, club, lotus—the Eight-handed Form :—

128 With one hand He ate the butter that was held in the other
And played on the flute holding it with two other hands ;

129 Sribatsa, the gem Koustuva, garlands of jewels adorned His bosom,
He saw the most precious ornaments on every part of His body.

130 The tail of the peacock set in the midst of new twigs of the gunja plant adorned His head
And ruddy lips lent their charm to the beauties of his moon-like face.

131 He laughed, the twin lotus eyes ever danced
The baijayanti garland and the makara pendants waved to and fro.

132 The delicate jewelled nupurs decked His lotus feet, Darkness was flung back to a distance by the sheen of His finger-nails.

133 On that spot the Brahman saw the wondrous Kadamba tree,
Saw the wood of Brinda enlivened by the notes of birds.

134 Saw cowherds, milk-maids and kine on all sides :
That on which he meditated he found fully displayed to his view.

135 At sight of those wondrous manifestations the Brahman of good deeds
Presently fell into a swoon for excessive joy.

136 Lord Sri Gaursundar, the Ocean of mercy,
Then gently placed His own Divine hand on his body.

137 At the touch of God's hand the Brahman was restored to consciousness.
But, rendered listless with joy, could utter no words.

138 The Brahman repeatedly fainted away falling on the ground.
But with great eagerness rose up as often as he fell.

139 His body could not be composed, convulsed by tremour, sweat, horripilation ;
The torrent of tears was like the flow of the Ganges.

140 And now the Bipra clasping the feet of the Lord,
Began to cry aloud all un-restrained.

141 Beholding the anguish of the Brahman Sri Gaursundar
Smiling made the following brief reply—

142 The Lord said, 'Listen, good Brahman,
You have been My servant through many a birth ;

143 'You constantly meditate to have the sight of Me ;
Wherefore have I thus shown Myself to you.

144 In another birth at the house of Nanda
I appeared to your view, you donot remember it.

145 'In that birth also, when I appeared in Gokul,
You were as eagerly bent on pilgrimage.

126 'You happened to be a chance-guest at the house of Nanda,
You offered cooked-rice to Me in this very manner.

147 'On that occasion also by this kind of pastime,
Eating your rice, I showed you this Form of Mine.

148 'Thus you are My servant at every birth :
No one save My servant may see My Form.

149 'I have told you all these hidden things,
Never in any way disclose them to any one.

150 'If you talk of them to any one as long as this manifestation of Mine endures
I will assuredly destroy you.

151 'I manifest Myself with the appearance of samkirtan.
To every land will I cause the kirtan to be spread.

152 'The relationship of loving devotion to Me that even Brahma and the other gods covet
I shall freely give away to every household.

153 'Remaining here for sometime you will see many things,
You must not disclose to anyone what I have told you,'

154 Having in this manner bestowed His mercy on that Brahman, Bidding him to have no fear, Sri Gour-sundar returned to His own apartment.

155 And there lay down as here-to-fore in the manner of a child.
No one awoke, overborne by the power of Yoga-maya.

156 At the sight of the wonderful manifestation the whole frame,
Of that good Brahman was filled with ecstatic bliss.

157 Having besmeared his entire body with the cooked-rice,
The Bipra cried all the time he ate his food.

158 The Bipra danced, sang, laughed and thundered with a mighty voice,
And repeatedly cried out 'Victory to Boy-Gopal !'

159 The thunderings of the Brahman waked up everybody,
When, restraining himself, the Bipra finished his meal and performed Achman.

160 Finding that the Brahman had eaten his food without mishap
All the family was highly gratified.

161 The Brahman thought within his mind of telling all things to everybody,—
'So by recognising God all will be delivered.'

162 'The Lord for whose sight even Brahma and Siva cherish eternal desire,
Is Incarnate in the Brahman's house.'

163 'All the people look upon the Lord as a mere mortal child.
If I speak out all will be saved.'

164 The Bipra durst tell nobody through fear,
As the Lord had forbidden, afraid to break God's command.

165 Thus knowing the Lord the Bipra lived on in Nabadvip,
In the proximity of God, unknown to anyone.

166 After finishing his begging in different parts,
The good Brahman used to come daily to obtain the sight of the Lord.

167 All these narratives are most wonderful and are the hidden mysteries of the Vedas,
By listening to these, verily Krishna is attained.

168 This narrative of the First Part is like the flow of nectar, Wherein the Lord Himself sports in the form of a child.

169 The crest-jewel of all the worlds, Lord of Paikuntha,
The Beloved of Lakshmi, the Consort of Seeta, Sri Gaursundar.

170 The same Who as Sri Rama—Lakshmana in the treta Age, Manifesting diverse activities, killed Ravana ;

171 In dvapara as Krishna—Sankarsana cut away in many ways,
The load that threatened to crush the Earth ;

172 Whom all the Vedas call Mukunda and Ananta, Verily Sri Chaitanya-Nityananda is the self-same Lord.

173 Sri Krishna-Chaitanya the life of Nityananda
At Whose twin feet sings Brindabandas,

Transmigration of Souls.

(By Nimananda Das Adhicary B. Ag., B. T.)

THE theory of transmigration of soul is the special feature of Hinduism and it distinguishes it from the other two religions—Christianity and Mahomedanism. In explanation of the diversities of the world this theory is propounded. The current idea about it is incomplete and, in many respects, erroneous. To remove this wrong idea we propose to discuss it in the light of the teachings of Sri Gaur Sundar.

As the knowledge of the subject is hinged on the knowledge of the soul that is supposed to migrate, we would first endeavour to find out what this soul is.

This is the subject upon which the philosophers of the world are racking their brains. And the result of this racking of brains is confusion. Every body tries to interpret it in his own way, in the light of knowledge he has gathered by means of his senses, without caring at all for the श्रौतवाणी or revelation as recorded in scriptures. Then we try to bring our intellect to bear upon a region where our intellect cannot go, such a confusion is but inevitable. The result of this confusion is obvious. We have lost the substance and are running after the shadow. In German folk-lore a story is narrated about a man who lost his shadow. Ah ! the man was in a bad plight. He lost all, and was deserted by his friends and relatives. Now what are we to think of men who have lost, not the shadow, but the substance? There may be some hope for a man who has lost the shadow and has retained the substance. But what hope can there be for a man who has lost the substance and has retained the shadow? Quite an overwhelming majority of us, consciously or unconsciously, are running after the shadow, and are suffering all the more for that. We identify ourselves with this body, and madly run after the gratification of material senses. We look upon worldly enjoyment as the only object of our life, and care to live only for it. Herein we mistake. Instead of rendering dues of Cæser unto Cæser and dues of God unto God, we are rendering dues of one to the other who has no claim over them. We are mistaking the pleasure of the body and the mind for that of the soul. The latter is different from and far above the former. It has pleasures of its own, and they cannot be obtained and should not be sought for in this material plane of existence. All our material quests bring untold miseries on us, and the highest good (?) that they propose to achieve defeat its own purpose. Hence in the Bible it is written, "For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he who doeth the will of God abideth for ever,"—Jhoa, Chap 2.

What is the revealed truth about our real self then? Vaisnavism has shown from our scriptures that our real self or the soul (आत्मा) is a differentiation of the esoteric super-prakriti and as such it is, in constitution, the same as his Lord Vishnu, whereas the not-self—the body, the mind etc. as they are at present, is a differentiation of the a-chit prakriti which is the perverted reflection of the chit prakriti. The former,—the real self—is ever spiritual and the latter, the not-self—is ever material. The difference between these two kinds of manifestations is such as admits of no mutual partnership under any law of human conception. Yet under Providential dispensation the impossible has been made possible. Chit and a-chit now function together as a single whole. But none the less the difference is there. Though ignored, it has not been obliterated so as to end in material triumph, in negation of any spiritual necessity.

The real self coming of its own accord to manifest in this a-chit world, has been compelled to put on two mortal garments—one physical and the other subtle; and thus crippled by Maya, it ceases to function in the chit world and roams in this a-chit one as a helpless entity in various forms. Forgetful of its celestial character, it now runs after material achievements that constantly allure it but fail to bring it permanent relief when obtained.

Now does the soul migrate ? The answer is in the negative. It does not migrate, and it cannot migrate. 'स्वरूपेते सवार हय गोलोकेते स्थिति।'—In self all exist in the chit world, goloke. As real self, the soul is ever unchangeable and cannot admit of such changes as deaths and births. The latter cannot work out any change in the spiritual character of the soul. For instance, a man in the running train is said to perform a journey from one place to another. But the man does not actually move himself to go the way. It is the train to which is due the locomotion, and the journey that it makes is simply ascribed to him. So is the case with our soul, the real self. The changes wrought by deaths and births are ascribed to the soul although it has itself nothing to do with them. And the cause of this ascription is our ignorance. Duped by Maya we forget our own self ; and, in ignorance thus imposed on us, we say "I am migrating, he is migrating, the cat is migrating, the tree is migrating and so on."

But at the same time we cannot deny the existence of such phenomena as deaths and births ; we cannot say we are not migrating. If our real self does not migrate, it must be something else. And what can this something else be ! It is our apparent self. Our apparent self is responsible for this function, and we wrongly hold our real self responsible for its doings. All that we do as this man and as that woman, as a Hindu and as a Mahomedan, as a cat and as a dog, as a tree and as a stone, are the doings of our apparent self, our real self having nothing to do with them.

Now what is our apparent self ? It has been made clear that Maya, although she has extended her sway over the real self of a बद्धजीव (Jiva in bondage of Maya), has in no way entered into its composition. But the apparent self or rather its component factors, the present body and the mind are entirely composed of Maya or the matter. How, then, the body and the mind which are जड़ or a-chit, devoid of any animation, have come to be animated. Whence is their animation ? In fact they are inanimate ; and their animation comes from their being in close proximity to the real self. So long as the real self inhabits them, it animates them with its own animation. For instance, if a crystal be placed near a rose it will be tinged with the colour of the rose. But as soon as it is removed away from the rose it assumes its own colour. In the same way the body and the mind are animated with the animation of the soul or the real self and appear as a distinct entity with an ego.

As soon as the soul is set free from them, they return to their own nature. A further scrutiny will disclose a fact, that, of the body and the mind, the body is merely a tool in hands of the mind and enables the latter to function in this gross material world. The mind with the soul's animation is then the apparent self that migrates.

What does make it migrate? It is jiva's own karma or action. The apparent self being the handi-work of Maya, falls an easy prey to her temptations, and acting up to these temptations it does certain things the resultant force of which propels it for fresh, and very often entirely new actions which necessitate new births for their accomplishment. Thus action begets action and birth begets birth, and the jiva is kept perpetually moving on the wheel of births and deaths. The jiva, who is a man now, may, by his own action, be born again as a cat, and vice versa. One birth controls another; and they are just in measure with one's own karma. This is the law of Nature that governs our births in this world. There is no modification of it, and there is no flying away from it. It is irrevocable and irresistible. From the highest man to the meanest protoplasm, nay, the most trifling sand grain are all bound by this law.

Now, one question that may naturally arise in our mind is—what ka ma did the soul do in its pre-mundane existence, and what bad deed could it do then that made it fall into this unhappy realm? The existence in the soul itself, of an innate tendency to do wrong is quite incompatible with the absolute purity of the soul itself. But the cause must be there in the soul itself. There lies in the soul some constitutional defect, and not any material external circumstance that is responsible for its worldly migration made up exclusively of chit element or atmic principle, the soul is free from all material impurity. But being anu-chit or a minute particle of chit it must, like the spark of a fire, have the defect due to quantitative smallness. Owing to this permanent defect the soul may, in exercise of its own free will, come to be tempted by Maya or the a-chit world. It may, if it like, as well enter into chit world or the 'Kingdom of God' and remain there forever in the service of its Lord, Krishna, without any fear of being tempted to journey world-ward. Hence in the scriptures the jiva has been described as tatastha (तटस्थ), capable of functioning in both the chit and the a-chit worlds, and as such, its original place of abode has been located in the meeting line of these two worlds where it gets the option of deciding for one or the other of them. When it decides for enjoyment it becomes enslaved by Maya. Its decision for enjoyment of the material world is the first crime committed by jiva against Krishna that earns for it as punishment this perpetual bondage of Maya.

How does the apparent self migrate ? It is clear from what has been discussed hereto that the apparent self propelled by motives commensurate with its perverted ego, establishes, as enjoyer, wrong connection with matter, which results in certain actions, on its part, to the fruit of which it is inextricably bound. It must reap as it has sown. The karma or action of one birth shapes and controls that of another. The subtle body or the mind stores up the seeds of actions of one birth in a subtle form and carries them over to another. These seeds of actions not only decide what sort of body the apparent self is to have in its next birth, but chalks out a new line of action to be followed by it in that birth. Thus action begets birth and birth begets actions ; and there is a never ending succession of births and deaths as waves in the continuous stream of actions. This is the inexorable and inflexible law of karma. This apparently never-ending line of actions is arrested when the jiva returns to itself and takes to the service of his Lord, Krishna. Such a returning is possible only by devotion to Krishna (कृष्णभक्ति) and by no other means. On the strength of devotion he ceases to be allured by the material pleasures of the world, and follows a new line of action which, being divine in character (कृष्णप्रीत्यर्थे कर्म) does not only not become the cause of further births but automatically overcomes the intensity of actions of past births. This is called salvation (मुक्ति). It means, on one hand, the complete dissociation of the soul from its material deflections resulting in a complete cessation from the pursuit of worldly enjoyments, and on the other, the attainment of the service of Lord Krishna eternally existing with Him as His associate in His eternal abode, Baikuntha.

Now, what becomes of the other people who follow religious practices other than कृष्णभक्ति ? In the Geeta Lord Krishna says that the devotees of gods and goddesses attain the region where gods and goddesses live (देवलोक) the devotees of the manes (पितृ) attain the region inhabited by them (पितृलोक) the devotees of genii (भूत) attain the region inhabited by genii (भूतलोक), and His devotees attain the region where He lives (वैकुण्ठ)*. Of these four regions, the first three, the devaloka, the pitriloka and the bhutaloka are the subtle manifestations of matter where the denizens reside and enjoy for a time pleasures proportionate to their virtues acquired in their mundane existence. At the end of this time, however they come again to be born in this physical world.* The other Krishnaloka is a Ohit manifestation situated beyond these material regions where from no return to these material regions is possible.† With the attainment of this region all our pain and sorrow that naturally accompany our mundane lives come to a close.

भूतानि यान्ति भूतेज्या यान्ति मद्याजिनोऽपि मां ॥ गीता

About the followers of jnana cult who call themselves Brahma Srimadbhagabat says that they, with great pains, soar up to a very high region (ब्रह्मलोक) where they, for want of Krishnabhakti cannot get a footing but there from they fall headlong down again to be born in this world. This time they are made to be born as apparently inanimate objects like a stone or a tree on account of the fact that they, in their endeavour to attain extinction (निर्वाण), assayed to obliterate the three eternal principles of soul-manifestation, namely, knowledge (ज्ञान), the knower (ज्ञाता) and the knowable. (ज्ञेय). The punishment thus inflicted is just commensurate with their foolish deeds.*

About the yogins mention is made in scriptures that one class of them, by their attachment to Paramatma, go to regions like Maha (महः) Jnan (जनः), Tapa (तपः) and Satya (सत्यः), enjoy there for a time pleasures proportionate to the degree of their devotion, and then return to this physical world to be born again in higher circles of men;† and that a misguided class of them, aiming like the misguided class of jnanins at extinction (निर्वाण), go to Brahmaloke and fall therefrom on this physical world and begin their life a new from the so called inanimate object (स्थावर) like a stone or a tree.

The popular belief current among the Christians and the Mahomedans is against such a doctrine. They commonly believe that this world has been created by God once for all. The diversities, that are visible here, are all of His making. Jivas take and can take initiative in any action only after they are born in this world. They will be made to gather the fruits of their actions done only in this life. On the day of judgment they will be called upon by God to answer for their actions in this mundane existence. They will be rewarded or punished according as they did good or bad while on earth.

If this be the fact, then there is much room to talk of divine injustice. The law of equity demands that all souls ought to have been afforded, at the start of their respective mundane careers, equal opportunities to carry out the orders of God before they are called upon to answer, in common, for their violation or partial execution of them.

Again the Mahomedan rhoo and the Christian soul are not the true equivalents of the Hindu jiva. The jiva as has been said before, is a distinct and specialised part of God and is completely free from matter which, under no condition, not even when it seemed to be bound down to this physical world by the shackles of Maya, can enter into its composition, and once elevated to that eternal region, the Baikuntha, it ceases to respond to the impacts of Nature (प्रकृति). The rhoo or the soul, on the other hand,—the rhoo and the soul are the samething—although a distinct entity, differs from God, its Creator, not only in quantity but also in quality ; and carrrying, as it does, the impressions of its mundane existence as a human being even after resurrection, it must be said to have, in its composition, the element of matter which only can receive and carry such impressions. The hold of matter on the rhoo or the soul is distinct up to the behest and the dajak or the heaven and the hell where the latter is made to enjoy or suffer according as it did good or bad actions in this physical plane. And beyond these regions there being no other region of pure consciousness, an existence of a pure, unalloyed soul is out of question. And if so, a soul can never be expected to approach and meet God in His plane of pure existence and render Him pure and unalloyed service as His eternal associate and servant.

We must, therefore, look for either imperfect revelation or wrong interpretation or for both. In fact, both are possible. The first ; because the revelation of God's wisdom is made according to the spiritual fitness of those to whom it is made. Hence Christ and Mahommed are known to have told their respective followers that there remained much more than what they were made to know. The second ; because only those, who are sufficiently spiritualised to be in direct communion with God, know the ways of God, and can correctly interpret scriptures that embody His injunctions.

Of every religion the followers are divided into two classes, esoteric and exoteric. The esoteric section are sufficiently spiritualised to understand the prophet or the guru ; and their number is very small. As time rolls on, their number becomes still smaller and smaller till it comes to nil. And as the number decreases spiritual adulteration increases till at last the truth is entirely lost sight of, and the religion becomes irreligious. The followers now fight more for the sake of the name of the religion than for the truth it teaches ; they fight more for the shadow than for the substance. They begin to twist and torture the sacred injunctions laid down in the holy scriptures and to serve their selfish ends, try to bring out a meaning that these do not and cannot mean.

The most astounding and inappropriate rites that are now associated with our own religion are but results of flagrant violation of sastric injunctions ; and for this none but the present so called gurus or rather the spiritual babblers are mostly responsible.

My Master,

But notwithstanding all this, God never for a moment abandons the jiva to sufferings that are brought down most deservedly upon himself by his aversion to the service of the Absolute. The sufferings themselves are a further proof of His infinite mercy and have really been ordained with the purpose of enabling the fallen jiva to realise once again his real nature by this experience of the logical consequences of his egoism and consequent unwillingness to recognise the superiorty of the Supreme Lord in the scheme of existence formulated by himself. By such sufferings he is mercifully reminded of his utter helplessness and insignificance in the presence of the Absolute.

My Master,

God is not so cruel as to wish to end our sufferings by depriving us of our freedom and thereby transforming us into the pampered hangers-on or the slaves of despotism.

My Master,

God is infinitely merciful. He is not a mere abstraction. Neither is He an object of our selfish enjoyment, that is to say, subordinate to our pleasures. Both of these views err in postulating a strictly limited existence for the unlimited. As a matter of fact, by no process of reasoning that is open to our limited understanding in the fallen state, can we attain to the Real and Absolute Truth. All fallen jivas are necessarily idolaters or worshippers of the materialistic, limited, everchanging, creations of their erring, material minds. And, therefore, we should discard once for all those inconclusive speculations that represent God as a mere abstraction or, even as a mere tool for the furtherance of our sensuous enjoyments. We are sure to fail in realising His infinite mercy if we adopt either of the above views.

My Master,

God has a real Personality, a real specific form of His Own, and at the same time, He is always present in us as the All-pervading Over-soul. But He is always unlimited and, therefore, His real face is in no case visible to our limited vision. Our limited fallen state and this material world are related to God and the Kingdom of God as darkness to light. Our knowledge in the bound state is not only ignorance of the Truth, but a positive hindrance to its realisation.

My Master,

God does not wish to abandon us to our self-elected sufferings. Neither does He wish to curtail our freedom. He has, therefore, desired that this limited universe itself, our prison-house, should help us in regaining our lost and forgotten natural state of pure spiritual existence. But He has not been content with providing only this negative help. He has also provided positive and direct assistance in the shape of the scriptures and the exponents of those scriptures in the shape of His devotees who come down to us and preach as well as live the scriptures.

My Master,

The Scriptures themselves fall into two distinct and mutually exclusive classes viz. the spiritual and the non-spiritual, corresponding to the divisions of transcendental and material worlds. In the matter of the scriptures also we are, therefore, free to choose between the true and the false. The Scriptures therefore, appear to those, who cannot grasp this distinction between the spiritual and the non-spiritual, as being self-contradictory.

My Master,

But the scriptures proper, the spiritual scriptures, have come down from God through Sri Brahma the first of jivas to receive them and Sri Narada to Sri Vyasadeva who sifted the spiritual from the non-spiritual scriptures, with which they had become mixed up.

My Master,

Sri Vyasadeva teaches us to follow the श्रौतपन्था the method of submissive acceptance of the spiritual enlightenment from the Guru if we want to really understand the spiritual scriptures. We are directed by him to receive the Word of God from the Acharyya in the regular chain of preceptorial succession, to which he himself also belongs, by absolute submission to the preceptor. We cannot serve both God and Mammon.

My Master,

The first step to be taken on the path of spiritual discipleship is to believe in these declarations of Sri Vyasadeva. It is by no means blind faith that is demanded. The alternative methods and their rationale are placed clearly before us. The two methods are (1) the method of submission, the श्रौतपन्था, and (2) the method of empiricism, the method of working up with the help of our present limited intellect from the known to the unknown and now inaccessible from the material and limited to the spiritual and unlimited. Sri Vyasadeva recommends and expounds the former of these two methods.

My Master,

As a matter of fact the Acharyya is really the God-head manifesting Himself to bound jivas in order to teach them the Truth. God Himself is the only Teacher of the Truth. God teaches us the Truth in two distinct roles, viz., as Sri Krishna, the Supreme Lord Himself, Who is to be served by us, and as Sri Baladeva, the Embodiment of this service of Himself. Sri Krishna Himself is the Teacher of the Word as Supreme Lord Whom we all should serve. Sri Baladev prabhu is the Teacher of the Word as Embodiment of the service itself. Sri Ananta is the manifestation of Sri Baladeva Prabhu eternally employed in singing the praise of the Lord. The Word of God manifested by Sri Brahma, Sri Narada and specially by Sri Vyasadeva to us, bound jivas, is a tiny offshoot of the mighty stream that is ever issuing out of the thousand mouths of Sri Anantadeva. Sri Nityananda Prabhu is identical with Sri Baladeva. The Acharyya is the manifestation of Sri Nityananda Prabhu; of Sri Baladeva, who is the Embodiment of the creative energy of Sri Krishna the Supreme Lord, and the Supporter of all existence.

My Master,

You are the Acharyya in the preceptorial succession of the Srauta School. You are the manifestation of Sri Nityananda Prabhu Who is the same as Sri Baladeva, employing yourself in carrying out the wish of Sri Gaursundar.

My Master,

They are utterly mistaken who suppose that the Acharyya is not under the necessity of strictly following the rules that are laid down in the scriptures for the guidance of all jivas, that he may in fact even transgress against them at his sweet pleasure. This error is due to the fact that we bound jivas have absolutely no idea of the nature of the free and directly loving, service of the Lord which is the only eternal function of the Acharyya. The free service of Sri Krishna is in fact the perfect fulfilment of the Law. The Acharyya follows the letter as well as the spirit of the Law. He never transgresses against the Law.

My Master,

There are, indeed, pseuda-acharyyas who under the pretence of the free service of the Lord actually transgress against the rules of the Scriptures.

My Master,

Your life is a continuous and strict fulfilment of the spiritual scriptures. The spiritual scriptures themselves, are indeed, the best testimony of the truth of your office as the undoubted Acharyya of the Srauta School.

My Master,

We, therefore, truly worship in you Sri Vyasadeva who manifests to this world the spiritual scriptures separating them from the non-spiritual scriptures.

My Master,

Mahaprabhu Himself holds the worship of the Acharyya as identical with the worship of Sri Vyasadeva. But you are greater than Sri Vyasadeva.

My Master,

We realise in you the Sri Gurudeva of Sripad Biswanath Chakravarti Thakur's famous octade addressed to the Guru, who is the same as Sri Nityananda Prabhu engaged in the direct service of the Lord.

My Master,

But all this, although conclusive, is but external testimony regarding your transcendental nature for the purpose of convincing bound jivas ; and this indirect method is necessary because no bound jiva is privileged to see you as you really are. Those alone who by the grace of Sri Krishna submit to your holy feet are thereby enabled to know truly a little, although only very little, of your real nature. The little they are enabled to know is, however, amply sufficient to clear up all their doubts. They are enabled to know that you are the manifestation of God Himself exactly as we find it laid down in the scriptures ; that by serving you they serve God ; and that by submitting to you they only submit to God. They are enabled to recognise that such service is the eternal function of their true selves. All this is revealed to them in such manner as to leave no doubts in their minds regarding their absolute Truth.

My Master,

May we continue eternally to worship your holy feet and proclaim the constant and absolute necessity of such worship of you for all jivas, bound as well as free. It is the only means whereby the bound jiva can be freed from the fetters af Maya and so made conscious of his natural and eternal function viz. the service of God. The worship of your holy feet is no less necessary for free jivas in as much as the neglect of it is sure to hurl them at once into the clutches of Maya.

MY AFFECTIONATE AND DIVINE MASTER,

It is so because you are the Associated Counterpart of the Lord Himself. You are the Embodiment of the service of the Lord. You are Sri Nityananda Prabhu, Sri Baladeva, Sri Krishna Himself in the Form of His own servitor. The Lord serves Himself in order to teach us how to serve Him. We have no power of our own wherewith we can serve God. We can only have the inclination. As soon as we are inclined to serve the Lord, the Lord at once confers His service on us by directing us to the shelter of your holy feet. We obtain the power to serve the Lord and the service itself from you because it is only you who can directly serve the Lord. You are our only Support whether we are conscious of it or not. The ignorance of this relationship is the cause of our bondage. If we want to serve the Lord without His help, is not such foolish arrogance a proof of our ignorance of the real nature of the Absolute ?

MY MASTER,

We know that you have come into this world in order to carry out the wish of Sri Gaursundar who is no other than Sri Krishna Himself, It is the wish of Sri Goursundar to re-establish the Divine Varnasrama Dharma as distinguished from the system of caste in order to restore real harmony to this world. The whole world is sick at heart and has lost all confidence in itself and has been looking forward to the coming of the Peace-Maker

MY MASTER,

The spiritual Varnasrama Dharma has nothing to do with any system, social or political, of this world. The Sanatan Varnasrama Dharma is the Divine institution established by Sri Krishna Himself for the spiritual benefit of the unslaved jiva. It is the theme of all the scriptures and is embodied by Sri Sanatan Goswamin under the direction of Mahāprabhu Himself in his great work treating of the rules for the guidance of the spiritual community of the Vaishnavas. The study of the works of Sri Sanatan Goswamin and Sri Rupa Goswamin Prabhus have been utterly neglected for too long a period and the so-called followers of Sriman Mahaprabhu have everywhere acquired an unenviable reputation for this utter and profane disregard of all shastric rules.

MY MASTER,

It was Thakur Bhaktivinode, entered into eternal lila, who, as the pioneer of the present movement for the purification of the Sanatan Dharma and making it conform to the teachings of Mahaprabhu Sri Chaitanya Deva, for the first time in the present age, drew the pointed attention of all persons to this cause of the degeneracy of the Vaishnava communities that professed to be the followers of Sri Goursundar. Thakur Bhaktivinode gave his life to the publication of a very large number of remarkable works, in which he has described the Sanatan Dharma, both its doctrines and practices, as it is found in the writings of the associates of Mahaprabhu Sri Chaitanya and their strict followers. Thakur Bhaktivinode made the remarkable prediction that the Divine Varnasrama Dharma would be re-established in the near future by a great personage endowed for the purpose with the power of God Himself.

My Master,

This prophecy is being fulfilled before our very eyes by yourself and your associates acting under your direction. It is not possible to go into further details of this great subject at this place. But we have no doubt that the institution is bound to be recognised as Divine and as offering a complete solution of all the troubles of the world, by all impartial persons who give it a patient hearing and are prepared to recognise and accept the Truth when it actually makes its appearance, undeterred by considerations of caste, creed or colour, or by any considerations of profit and loss in the worldly sense.

My Master,

The re-establishment of the Divine Varnasrama Dharma which is inevitable and is even now making rapid progress will make real spiritual society again possible in the world. There can be no real harmony except on the spiritual plane. I, therefore, lay myself completely at your holy feet to be employed in the way that is pleasing to you for the furtherance of the wish of Sri Gaursundar.

I am, most affectionate and Divine Master,
Your eternal and humble servant,
Narayandas Adhikari.

The Special Characteristics of the Acharyya.

[By Prof. Nishi Kanta Sanyal M. A.]

THE practices and utterances of this truely transcendental teacher of religion are so strikingly unlike and so emphatically opposed to the spirit of all the current notions and activities of the world of today, but are withal so cautiously and so reverently broad-based on the highest teachings of the whole body of the scriptures of this country, that they have already most powerfully agitated religious opinion all over India and are bound to compel even the most thoughtless to pause and reflect. Sri Paramahansa Thakur has astounded everybody by the declaration that his practices and teachings are identical with those of the Vaishnava teachers of old and strictly in conformity with the teachings of Mahaprabhu Sri Chaitanya. Or, in other words, what appears to us to be so profoundly and aggressively original as he tells us, is nothing but the old, eternal and universal religion in its pure form.

The distinctiveness of Srila Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur's teachings and practices is all-pervasive and may be illustrated by a few concrete examples. This is, for instance, what Paramhansa Thakur says regarding 'Truth'. 'Donot try to discover the nature of 'Truth' by the exercise of your imagination. Donot endeavour to attain to the 'Truth' through experience of this world. Donot manufacture 'Truth' in order to satisfy your erring inclinations, nor hastily accept as the truth anything for the reason that it satisfies such inclination. Do not regard as 'Truth' anything that has been 'built up' by, or has the 'support' of, a majority of people like yourself,—nor as un-Truth anything that is 'rejected' by the overwhelming majority. According to the scriptures there is to be found hardly one in a crore of human beings who really worships the Truth. That which is proclaimed by the united voices of all the people of this world as Truth may turn out to be false. Therefore, cease to confront the Truth in a challenging mood. The Truth is not brought into existence by such arrogance. One has to approach the Truth in the spirit of absolute submission. It is necessary to listen to Truth. Truth is self-revealing and it is only when It is pleased to reveal Itself that the real nature of the Truth can be known to us, and not otherwise'.

The conduct of this great teacher of religion corresponds to his teaching in all its minutest details. In his personal conduct he never deviates by the breadth of an hair from the Truth of Srimad Bhagabat to please any individual or body of individuals. He always tries to please only God in the manner that is laid down in the Srimad Bhagabat. It is in this sense that his conduct is super-human. He also never countenances the slightest deviation from the Truth in the most eminent, or dearest and nearest, persons ; and holds every single word of the Bhagabat to out-weigh the opinion of all the people of the world. He does not admit that all thinkers or religionists are approaching the Truth by diverse ways. On the contrary he holds that all so-called truths that pass current in the world point only to a limited ideal formulated by the imagination and are really un-truths and, as such, positive obstacles in the way of the realisation of the Truth. This would most certainly seem to be opposed to the judgment of the modern world.

Srila Paramahansa Thakur's teaching and practice regarding right and wrong are opposed to all accepted ethical conclusions. He says that the so-called ethics of those who are averse to God stop dead before the transcendental conduct of the devotee of God. The ethical law of the devotee is exclusive devotion to God. The moral codes of utilitarianism or idealism are made by man whereas the holy feet of the Lord are the eternal fountain-head of the law of the devotee. Our empiric knowledge judges of right and wrong by the measure of the highest point of view that is attained by its ascending effort. That which is regarded by it as right or wrong from that distant point of elevation is accepted as the ethical code of this world. Such a code is liable to modification in accordance with the length of vision of the legislater. All worldly morality is confined within the four corners of human knowledge and moves up and down with the varying height of such knowledge. Too often we confuse this man-made ethics with spiritual religion. But religion is not general knowledge or mere morality. Under the impression that this morality is identical with religion we are led to regard as religions such activities as yoga, vowed-observances, asceticism, fruitive works, empiric knowledge service of the poor—of society—of country—of brutes—of the body—of parents, etc. But every one of these is an instance of the moral law concocted by the imagination of man. This concocted ethical religion (?) bears the name of Smartavada (स्मार्त्तवाद) 'canonical creed' in this country. But the law of the devotee possesses such wonderful power that these improvised ethical rules are completely neutralized in its presence. The devotee knows the feet of the Lord as higher than all other things. The law of the devotee may be compared to the downward rush of a mighty river that sweeps away in its irresistible progress all the ethical speculations of this world like bits of flimsy straw lying athwart its course relegating them to their proper insignificance to an obscure corner of the vast expanse of its vivifying current. Those speculations are no longer able to assume a lofty attitude and exercise a dominating power even in their respective, limited spheres. The propounders of all changing creeds of this world have proclaimed the law of devotion as being only one among a multitude of such a miscellaneous body of rules of conduct. A few may have assigned to devotion even a slightly higher place than the rest. There are those among them who say that devotion to parents or to one's country belongs to the same category as devotion to God and are a constituent part of spiritual devotion. There are some preachers of religion who have declared that it is permissible to disregard devotion to God for the purpose of serving one's parents. Some have gone further holding that there can be no devotion to God by causing pain to the minds of parents or wife,—that the service of Krishna is not valid if it stands in the way of the service of parents or the maintenance of wife. But such is the transcendental power of the sacred stream of the super-human, non-evil-producing kindness of Sree Krishna Chaitanya-Chandra that it is able to build up a stratum of the most un-flinching firmness in the hearts of all jivas to which He proclaims, with a deep reverberating sound like unto the blessed peal of the conch Panchjanya, this sublime Truth that 'there is no other rule, there can be no other land, for the jiva than the service of Krishna.' The only severe Truth, although it may not pass current amidst the orgy of perverted notions of a perverted world, is enshrined in such texts as 'seek only My shelter' (मामेकं शरणं व्रज) 'contemplate the Absolute Truth' (सत्यं परं धीमहि), 'Man is liberated by devotion to God' (भक्त्या विमुच्येन्नरः) etc.

This transcendental teacher of the spiritual religion, this great follower of Sri Rupa Goswmin, has so thoroughly laid bare the utter triviality of the current conception regarding 'renunciation that it has administered a rude shock to the entire body of the purveyers of pseudo-asceticism. Naturally enough, therefore, these latter affect to regard his discourses as 'perverse' and 'un-scriptural'. The discriminative renunciation (युक्तवैराग्य) enunciated by Sri Rupa Goswamin Prabhu by command of Sri Gourasundar in his great devotional work,the Bhaktirasamrita-sindhu, has been set forth, decked out in such diverse and beautiful decorations, by this great Acharyya in his practices and discourses that to one who may have the good fortune of making its acquaintance the trivial renunciation that prevails in the world is bound to disclose its real face as that of the accursed goddess of destitution (अलक्ष्मी). Only those who are averse to God deceive themselves by worshipping at her shrine. It is because we cannot keep on our legs without our three meals a day that we suppose, as 'unattached to the world, one who can go without food for three days. It is because we ourselves are so much addicted to material enjoyment that we regard as 'un-worldly' anyone who practises abstinence from such enjoyment. To the doer of evil deeds the doer of good works appears to be un-selfish. The epicurean considers the pervert ascetic as one who has truly renounced the pleasures of the world. To the ignorant the learned may seem to be devoid of earthly passions. But such one-sided judgment is not the impartial verdict of the Kingdom where everything is perfect. The ideal of this sort of renunciation has a very good superficial look resembling the consistency of level, dry land. But if one looks two inches underneath the surface of this sundy film of renunciation he is sure to find the foul water, stagnant and muddy, of selfish enjoyment or the realisation of selfish desire. Our Acharyya, this great follower of Sri Rupa Goswamin, never gives the place of honour to this pervert asceticism, this embodiment of the goddess of destitution and misfortune. He says that the constant and single-minded employment of oneself and of all things of the world for the gratification of the senses of God is the only true asceticism.

Take again the all important subject of universal concord of which the world undoubtedly stands in need. The solution offered by the non-evil-producing mercy of Sri Chaitanya Chandra is so diametrically opposed to all current ideas of comprehension as to have necessitated the addition of two most important chapters to the science of Logic entitled 'pervert interpretation' (विपरीत रूढ़ि) and 'enlightened interpretation' (विद्वद्रूढ़ि) of the etymology of words. Not to destroy the peace of any body, not to cause annoyance to anybody over any matter, to patch up a compromise or seeming absence of opposition between the weak points of individuals or aggregates, is the denotation of the term 'concord' in the current usage of the Age. The fear of ourselves being attacked by those whose weaknesses we are to point out recommends to our prudence the adoption of this convenient principle of 'I am silent if you are also dumb' (तुम्भि चुप् हामभि चुप्). The so-called 'concord' of the age is only another name for drifting according to one's individual tastes with the current of laws concocted by the mind and not in any way to oppose the similar efforts of others. But the power of the mercy of Sri Chaitanya Deva does not tolerate such sort of deception. The great spiritual concord declared by Him is a wonderful instrument yielding most delightfully harmonious music charming the ears of Sri Krishna Himself. In that music there is no tendency, like that to be found in all so-called efforts at comprehension, towards the ultimate destruction of all diversity. In that harmony there is present eternal diversity but no mutual conflict ; there is variety of tune and cadence but no want of agreement. The objective of that harmony is not abstraction or neutralisation. Its goal is the Absolute Truth. This Divine instrument of harmonious music although, it may fail to gratify the senses of the jiva, serves nevertheless to perfectly gratify all the senses of the Absolute Truth. This spiritual concord although it may not build in the empty air enchanting gardens of imaginery flowers, never-theless admits to the boundless treasures of the real Truth the knowledge of which is our highest realization. This concord is not the fictitious temporary absence of conflict brought about by law concocted by the human mind ; it is the eternal spiritual harmony. 'Samkirtanam is that kritanam of Hari which is performed by many in company'. These words make an offering of such concord as was never known before. In this argumentative and querulous age it provides the only never-failing weapon for imposing universal spiritual harmony. The 'rational' and 'absence of self-contradiction' of all the conclusions of the Vedas is to be found in this great spiritual synthesis. Sarbanjna sukta, Parijat shourabha, Sri Bhasya and Sarbasambadini which establishes the spiritual and scientific validity of Purna-prajna-darsan,—by lighting up the lotus feet of the Absolute Truth in the act of adoration,—scatter the fragrance of this universal spiritual concord across the infinity of worlds. The great Acharyya is proclaiming through the medium of the Harmonist this message of universal spiritual concord for the delight of the votaries of the Absolute Truth in all parts of the civilized world. The Gaudiya founded by this great religious teacher is pointing the way to spiritual agreement by demonstrating the futility of the endeavours for non-spiritual harmony.

The Supreme Lord Sri Krishna-Chaitanya

THE Supreme Lord Sri Krishna-Chaitanya manifested the lila of of His birth in Sridham Mayapur on the 23rd day of the month of Falgun in tbe year 1407 of the Saka Era corresponding to February 1486 A. D. The Lord was born in the evening with the rise of the full-moon which was then in eclipse. Mayapur is situated in the heart of old Navadwip on the eastern bank of the Ganges.* It is now represented by a few isolated mounds that have escaped the destruction that overlook this part of the old town by the shifting of the bed of the river. The summits of these mounds are now crowned by a number of beautiful shrines and other edifices that have been erected within the last fifty years by the piety of the followers of Mahaprabhu. Sridham Mayapur undoubtedly constitutes one of the holiest of tirthas. Thither flock at all time of the year thousands of pilgrims from all parts for a sight of the birth-site of Mahaprabhu Sri Chaitanya. An ever-growing multitude of devotees join in the devotional functions on the day of the anniversary of the advent of the Lord. Those who have had the good fortune of once visiting the place can never shake off the profound impression that is made on the spirit by the palpable transcendence of this holiest of the holy tirthas.

But the eastern part of old Navadwip, although it is now so solitary and rural, was at the time of Mahaprabhu's advent the greatest centre of our ancient culture. It was a vast University town full of the chatuspathis of a very large number of the most eminent pundits versed in all branches of Sanskrit learning. The schools of these learned Professors were thronged by an eager crowd of inquisitive students from all parts of the country who found shelter and instruction under their roofs in return for loyal submission to their teachers. These Professors were all of them orthodox Brahmans who were universally respected for their learning, piety and high birth. These particulars are found in contemporory

*The topography of the town of Navadwip of the time of Mahaprabhu is minutely described in several old authentic works of Vaishnava authors. The site is at present identified with the help of the tomb of Chand Kazi, still existing, who was a contemporary of Mahaprabhu and the fouzdar of Navadwip under Alauddin Syyed Hussain Shah, independent King of Bengal. A big mound and a spacious tank, neither of them being far from the tomb of Chand Kazi, still bear the historical name of Ballal Sen, the most famous of the Sen Kings of Bengal who removed their capital from Maldah to old Gaudpur Navadwip. The modern town of Navadwip occupying the site of the island of Kulia which was one of the nine islands comprised within 'the city of the nine islands' is situated on the west bank of the river. The name Navadwip came to be applied exclusively to this part of the old city after the latter was practically washed away by the Ganges which in this place has a particularly irregular and shifting course consisting of several different channels.

The Supreme Lord Sri Krishna-Chaitanya made His appearance in a cultured Brahman family of Sri Mayapur. His father Jagannath Misra was a Brahman in the real sense being a gifted scholar deeply versed in the Shastras, profoundly religious in conduct and extremely poor. Mahaprabhu's mother, Sri Sachidevi, was the daughter of Nilambar Chakravarty who was a great astronomer. Jagannath Misra bore the scholar's title of 'Purandar" Sachidevi gave birth to eight daughters all of whom died in their infancy. Feeling the want of a male child Jagannath Misra worshipped Vishnu to be blessed with a son. Mahasamkarsan of Vaikuntha was thereby drawn into this world being born as the ninth issue of Purandar Misra and bore the name of Viswarup, the elder brother of Sri Chaitanya.

At Sridham Mayapur in the heart of old Nabadwip—the city of nine islands, on the full moon eve of the month of Falgun—the glorious eve of new spring immemorially consecrated to the swing-pastimes of Sri Krishna—was born Sri Chaitanya Chandra, the spotless Moon of Nabadvip, at Whose advent the spotted moon hid her face in shame under the veil of eclipse. The birth of the Supreme Lord was ushered in by a universal chant of the samkirtan of the Name of Hari uttered by all the people of the great city as is the custom at the time of an eclipse. The Lord was born at the most auspicious moment and in the first ascendant of Leo. His maternal grand father, the great astronomer Nilambar Chakravarti, on calculation discovered all the signs of the mahapurusha in the newly born child. The yellow complexion of the infant joined to the extraordinary circumstance that He could be quieted while crying only by the chanting of the Name of Hari led the matrons to name the Boy 'Gaur-Hari,'—and also 'Nimai' for the reason that He was born under a nim tree and after the pre-mature end of eight successive daughters.

The minutest details of the incidents of the infancy of the Lord have been preserved with the most loving care by His early biographers. By all accounts Sri Gaur Sundar proved to be a more than ordinarily restless child. His precocity was not less marked. At the ceremony of naming the Baby when diverse objects were held out to Him to ascertain His predilection the Boy astonished everybody by grasping the Srimad Bhagabatam. When He could crawl on His knees the Lord horrified everybody by catching hold of a snake and lying quietly on its coils. As He learnt to walk the Boy by begging from passers-by procured plaintain, sweet-meats, etc. and offered them to those ladies who chanted the Name of Hari. He systematically raided the houses of friends and neighbours and ate up their curd, milk, cooked food etc. behind their backs. On one occasion He began to eat earth preferring it to fried rice and sweet-meats brought for Him by Sachi Devi, arguing that there could be no difference between the two as the last were also transformations of the earth but desisted on being convinced by His mother that the difference was nevertheless real.

[XIV]

1 In truth all things belong to Thee, the jiva is not their master ;
Wandering by reason of his error of 'I' and 'Mine' he suffers sorrow and fear.

2 The vanity of 'I' and 'Mine' the bound jiva thinks in his heart of hearts
To be the only treasure that is his own.

3 By reason of such vanity hurled into this worldly course
I suffer the pangs of a drowning man swimming about in the ocean of the world.

4 Taking refuge at Thy feet that save from all fear
This day I dedicate myself to Thee.

5 The vanity of 'I' and 'Mine' has left me now :
May it never find a place in my heart again.

6 This strength alone, O Lord, on me bestow
That may enable me to keep at a distance all egoistic pride.

7 May the spirit of renunciation be firmly rooted in the heart
And not prove to be momentary like the cleanliness of the elephant after bath.

8 Bhaktivinode at the feet of Prabhu Nityananda
Begs for the grace that delivers from all vanity.

CHAPTER VI.

Summary :—In this Chapter are narrated the beginning of the studies of Nimai, His eating of the offerings prepared for Vishnu on the eleventh lunar day at the house of Jagadish and Hiranya Pandits and various wayward childish pastimes.

Sri Jagannath Misra duly performed the ceremonies of lustration (Samskar) of his Boy viz. placing of a piece of chalk in His hand (i.e. to write with auspicious beginning of studies—Hathekhari), perforation of the ears (Karnavedha) and making the tuft of hair (Chudakarana).

Nimai wrote all the letters of the alphabet at first sight, finished compound letters and spelling within two or three days and was constantly engaged in writing and reading aloud the series of the Names of Krishna. The Boy was unusually extravagant in His demands for impossible objects and cried persistantly if He did not get them. Chanting of the Name of Hari was the only means of quieting Him. On a certain day even this sovereign remedy failed to stop His cries. On being asked the reason the Boy gave out that He would never cease till He ate the offerings for Vishnu that had been prepared by Jagadish and Hiranya Pandits at their house, two miles away, on that day which happened to be the eleventh lunar day especially dedicated to Sri Hari (Sri Ekadashi). Those two Brahmans were persuaded to give the offerings prepared for Vishnu to Nimai believing Him to be more than a mortal. Whereupon Nimai was pacified.

At the head of His boy-companions Gaursundar delighted in placing mischievous pranks indiscriminately on all, from adult males to little girls, while they bathed in the Ganges. One day the aggrieved parties made a formal complaint to Jagannath Misra and Sachi Devi respectively against the conduct of this Boy. Sachi Devi succeeded in pacifying the offended girls by presents of sweetmeats. But Jagannath Misra went down to the bathing place of the Ganges with intent to punish his Son. Nimai, informed timely of the aproach of His angry parent, having instructed His associates to tell him that He had not come to bathe at all, returned to the house by a different way. Misra did not find Nimai at the bathing place and also returned home. There he found Nimai un-bathed and besmeared with drops of writing-ink. Misra was naturally surprised. After the Boy went out for His bath in the river giving out His intention of being avenged on His false accusers, the parents had a strong suspicion that Krishna Himself might have appeared in that hidden form in their house.

1 Thus played Gauranga-Gopal Till the time arrived of the ceremony of placing chalk in the hand to write with,
(i. e. Hathekhari)

2 On an auspicious day and in an auspicious moment Purandra Misra ;
The revered Brahman, duly celebrated the holy rite of inauguration of the studies of his Son.

3 And shortly all the friends assembling together
Performed the perforation of the ears (Karnavedha) and the caremony of making the tuft (Chudakarana)

4 The Child transcribed all the letters of the alphabet at first sight ;
Seeing this all the people were filled with astonishment.

5 Within two or three days He read the compound letters
And constanly wrote out the entire series of the Names of Krishna—

6 Rama, Krishna, Murari, Mukunda, Banamali
Night and day He wrote those Names and read them aloud with the greatest eagerness.

7 The people of pious deeds dwelling in all parts of Nadia
Saw the Lord of Baikuntha read and write in the company of children.

8 With what sweetness the Lord pronounced the letters of the alphabet—
All jivas forget everything else so soon as they chance to hear that accent.

9 Most strange, indeed, were the pastimes of Sri Gaur-sundar ;
He demanded whatever was most difficult to procure.

10 He asked to have the bird that flew across the sky,
And rolled in the dust crying if He did not get what He wanted.

11 He asked to have the moon and the stars of heaven
And cried throwing about violently His hands and feet.

12 All of them tried to console Him taking Him into their arms.
Bisvambhar would not stop and kept shouting 'Give it to Me.'

13 There was one supreme remedy.
The Lord cries no more if He but hears the Name of Hari.

14 Clapping their hands all chant the Name of Hari ;
Whereupon the Lord forgoes all His waywardness and can be controlled.

15 To please the Boy all constantly chant the Name of Hari ;
The house of Jagannath was turned into the realm of Baikuntha.

16 One day, however, although they kept chanting the Name of Hari
Yet the Lord cried again.

17 They said 'Hark, Darling Nimai,
Dance well, we shall sing the Name of Hari.'

18 The Lord did not mind but went on crying.
Then all of them asked, 'Tell us, dear, why you cry.'

19 All pressed to know saying, 'What do you want, Dear ?
I shall get whatever you may ask for so do not cry again.

20 The Lord said, 'If you want to save My life
Hasten to the house of two Brahmans.

21 'Jagadish Pandit and Hiranya are devotees of Vishnu,
Those two alone may give what I desire.

22 'This day both will observe fast as it is ekadasi day,
They have prepared a great variety of offerings for Vishnu.

23 'If only I could eat those offerings
I would be reliived and go about.'

24 The mother moaned on hearing this absured demand.
'He always asks for that which neither men nor the Vedas know.'

25 All of them laughed on hearing these words of the Child.
They said, "We shall give it to You, do stop crying, Dear.'

26 These two Brahmans were great Vaishnavas
They were great friends of Jagannath Misra and seemed to share with Him a joint life.

27 The whole frame of those good Brahmans
Was filled with joy on hearing the words of the Child.

28 The two Brahmans said, 'It is most wonderful story !
We have never before heard of such pre-science in a child.

29 'How did He know that to-day is Sri Hari's day ?
How also could He be aware of the great variety of offerings that have been prepared by us ?

30 'We now understand as the Child is most beautiful Therefore Gopal Himself dwells in His body.

31 'It is Narayana Who sports in the body of this Child,
And, from His seat in His heart, it is God who makes Him speak !

32 Thinking thus the two Brahmans with unbounded joy
Fetching all the offerings gave them to Nimai.

33 Both Brahmans said, 'Eat the offerings, Darling ;
Now at last all our endeavour for Krishna is fulfilled.'

34 Such disposition can only be the result of the grace of Krishna ;
Such perfect judgment exists in none but the servants of the Lord.

35 Without devotion for God we cannot know the Lord Chaitanya Within Whose hair-cavity is located worlds without number.

36 It is the Lord Himself who thus sports in the guise of a Brahman Boy,
This is beheld only by those who are servants of the Lord in every birth.

37 The Lord was pleased having the offerings
And ate a little of everything that was prepared.

38 With pleasure God ate the offerings of His devotees,
And all ill humour was cleared, such being the will of the Lord.

39 All the people joyously chanted the Name of Hari
The Lord danced, while He ate the offerings, in the midst of the kirtan of Hifself.

40 He scattered the morsels on the ground and over their bodies ;
In this manner played the supreme Ruler of the gods.

41 The Lord sported in the yard of Sachi
Whom all the Vedas and the Puranas acclaim.

42 Lord Bisvambhar thus gave Himself up to childish pastimes
And all the restless Brahman boys kept Him company ;

43 He raided all different places in company of all His associates ;
No one could restrain Him.

44 When He chanced to come across other boys He poked fun at them
And they in their turn becoming jokose a quarrel would ensue.

45 The boys of the Lord's party won by the strength of the Lord
All other boys retired discomfitted.

46 The Lord, Sri Gaursundar, gray with dust,
Charmingly bespotted with drops of ink,

47 Having finished reading and writing, in the company of all the children,
With great glee, made His way to the Ganges for bath.

48 Immersing His body under the water of the Ganges the eager Bisvambhar, Throwing water at one another, played in the company of the boys.

49 Who can describe the opulence of Nadia ?
Countless bathers crowded each and every bathing place.

50 Among them were quiet and self-controlled house-holders and sannyasins.
No one could count the great number of the children that gathered there.

51 The Lord swam in the stream of the Ganges taking all the children with Him,
Now sank, now floated and played in many diverse ways.

ALL GLORY TO THE DIVINE MASTER AND
THE SUPREME LORD SREE KRISHNA-CHAITANYA

SREE
SAJJANA-TOSHANI OR
THE HARMONIST

VOL. XXV. | APRIL, 1928, 442 Chaitanya-Era. | NO. 11.

Sree Radhica

THE acme of Divine conception is centered in the all loving Krishna along with Sree Radhica. Radhica is the highest transcendental embodiment of grace, softness and selfless love. She is all love, all sweetness, and all sacrifice and she lives entirely for and in Her Divine Lover—Sree Krishna. Earth or heaven cannot find her equal nor impersonal region. She is the unique being fit only for Krishna's love attended by her eternal paraphernalia.

Yet Sree Radhica is not an abstract Deity of the phenomenal world—a mere poetic conception, or a philosophical idea, but a spiritual concrete entity, having her permanent abode in the highest of spiritual realms yet manifesting her identity of serving counterpart of Krishna through every face or phenomenon of nature. Both Sree Radhica and Sree Krishna are the very fountain-head of all ever-existing, all-pervading real and concrete beings and are inseparable from all that is infinitely noble, sublime and beautiful. Our material eyes which are meant for accruing transitory selfish enjoyments cannot, therefore, see them, nor can we conceive them intellectually. One must immensely develop one's Spiritual sight before one can possibly come up to the range of their beatific vision. Such vision is possible only when we have wholly purged off our sensuous element and have attained the highest stage of spiritual development, by our natural unceasing practice of selfless loving and devotional service.

Sree Radhica is something so subtle and transcendental that she cannot at all be conceived by any man or woman of the material plane nor can she at all be described by human language or by sensuous images. Yet her super-sensuous eternal love is often attempted to be made conceivable to frail and gross human beings when they prove themselves free from fetters of mundane senses arriving at the region of devotional love, otherwise the huge misconception about her true nature and essence prevent to have an access to her eternal services.

Sree Radhica may, however, be considered from at least four different aspects. Let me first of all view her from psychic aspect.

Psychically Sree Radhica is identical with the counterpart of Krishna. The yearnings of love, the joys of unions, the pangs of seperation, which are the characteristics of love are all vividly discernible in Sree Radhica for Krishna only whereas we have got a distorted reflection in the human soul. Sree Radhica is indentically the Divine Soul proving herself as the Divine Consort of her lover—the Divine or Universal Soul Krishna.

From the intellectual aspect, Sree Radhica is the centre of all devotional manifestations towards Krishna. Sree Krishna is often described as singing the name of Sree Radhica through His lute to show His spontaneous affinity towards His Counterpart.

I may also see Sree Radhica from her moral aspect. Morally she is the personification of all tender virtues and super-human attributes. The love, bliss and mercy of Sree Krishna are represented by Sree Radhica. Without Sree Radhica Sree Krishna is a dry, cold, philosophic Deity, devoid of accepting services from devotees. As all finite souls are parts of this fountain-head of love, bliss and peace, we, therefore, owe all our serving faculties to Sree Radhica.

Again I may view Sree Radhica from Her physical aspect. Whatever is beautiful in nature is from Sree Radhica. The soft and silvery rays of the autumnal moon, the "sweet south that breathes upon a bank of violets, stealing and giving odour," the fresh and green foliage of the trees and plants clad in the loveliest attire of vernal beauty, the gurgling music of the flowing river, the snow-clad summits of cloud-cleaving mountains, all represent one or other of the several physical emanations of Sree Radhica to interrupt the devotional activities of the enslaved souls.

Sree Radhica is pervertedly represented in our homelife and amidst our domestic scenes. The lovely countenance of the smiling bride, the beauty and blush of youthful love, the loving tenderness of the affectionate mother, the warmth and zeal of the sincere friend, the charity and kindness of the generous patron all represent the different manifestations of Maya to prevent us from offering service to Krishna.

"Thus the true devotees with their soul's eyes can realise the presence of Sree Radhica here, there, and everywhere. Wherever there is love, grace or sweetness in connection with Sree Krishna ignoring all sensuous adventures there is Sree Radhica—wherever there is any manifestation of bliss or joy arising from Krishna's love there is Sree Radhica. Indeed, Sree Radhica is love or bliss incarnate of Krishna. She truly represents the loving and blissful aspects of Sree Krishna.

By the constant offering of true services to Sree Radhica, the devotee rises above the sordid atmosphere of this sinful and sorrowful world and lives in a region "where all liberated souls serve Krishna incessently and uninterruptedly"

Sing, therefore, the glory of Sree Radhica night and day, and if you are ambitious enough to be blessed with the lotus feet of Sree Krishna, try to approach that Lord, only through His beloved Sree Radhica's grace for she is the path, way and end of all aspiration of a devotee.

ON a certain day He ate up several times the cooked rice of a pilgrim Brahman who happened to be a guest at the house while the latter was absorbed in meditation in the act of offering it to Sri Krishna. On another day the Lord was stolen by two thieves who attempted to rob the ornaments worn by the Child but was brought back to His father's house by those very thieves through a curious mistake on their part. He induced His father to fetch the offering to Sri Krishna prepared on the Ekadasi day at the house of Pundits Jagadish and Hiranya which was two miles distant from the house of Misra, although, by reason of the distance, a boy of His tender age could have ordinarily no means of knowing what was going on at the Pundits' house.

He played many a prank on little girls. He would forcibly take away their flowers, garlands, sandal-paste and offerings accepting those Himself He used to tell them that Ganga and Durga were His maid-servants and Siva His servant.

He was often angry, broke everything in the house and beat His mother. When one day Sachi Devi had fainted away He procured cocoanuts, scarce in that season, to aid her recovery. Viswarup, the elder brother of Goursundar, who was deeply versed in all the shastras cultivated constant association with the Vaishnavas whose meeting-place was the house of Advaita and was so unmindful of everything else that he had to be fetched home for his meals. Sri Gaursundar often went up to the tol of Advaitacharyya on this errand when all present would be invariably struck with His extraordinary beauty. After Viswarup renounced the world and became a sannyasin Nimai became restrained in His conduct and devoted Himself wholly to His studies. Deeply shocked by the sannyas of Viswarup Jagannath Misra was frightened by this sudden change in Nimai and altogether stopped His studies. This made the Boy more turbulent than ever. One day He seated Himself on the top of a pile of discarded, used up, cooking pots which are regarded as unclean by the smarta Brahmans, and, when his mother asked Him to come away from that foul place, maintained that the earthen pots having been used in cooking offerings for Vishnu can never be unclean and the spot where God Himself is seated is the meeting place of all the holy tirthas.

The upanayana ceremony of Nimai was duly performed and the Boy was sent to the chatuspathi of the great teacher Gangadas Pundit of Gangnagar very close to Sri Mayapur quarters to study Sanskrit Grammar. The extraordinary intelligence of the Boy astonished and baffled everybody. Nimai persuaded His mother, by falling at her feet, to give up eating cooked rice on the Ekadashi day. Jagannath Misra was upset by being apprized in a dream of the future sannyas of Nimai and shortly afterwards left the world. Nimai consoled His mother with great tenderness. But He continued to be unreasonable in His demands to His mother and was often angry. One day on learning that there was no money in the house He procured from some-where two tolas of gold and gave it to her.

Sri Gaur Narayan now entered upon the lila of a house-holder's life. Sri Banamali Ghatak proposed to Sachi Devi the marriage of Sri Gaursundar with Lakshmi Devi, the daughter of Ballavacharyya. On an auspicious day and in an auspicious moment the nuptial ceremony, laden with every blessing of Gaur and Lakshmi was duly consummated.

Sri Isvara-puri, the disciple of Sri Madhabendra-puri at this time arrived at Navadwip and stayed as guest at the house of Advaita Prabhu. Meeting him on the way Gaursundar invited him to meal at His house. One day Sri Isvara-puri asked Mahaprabhu to correct the errors of 'Sri Krishna-lila-mrita' a work composed by Puri himself. Mahaprabhu declined to do this giving as His reason that there can be no defect in the inspired writings or utterances of the Gurudeva and the Vaishnavas belonging to the srauta school and that those persons who, actuated by pride of worldly knowledge point out any defects in their words or writings undoubtedly belong to the class of 'pasandis'.

It was at this time that Sri Gaursundar manifested the love of God in the guise of nervous malady.

Mahaprabhu showered His mercy on all by accepting the offerings of weavers, cow-herds, grocers, garland-makers, betel sellers, conch dealers and the other people resident in the town, presenting Himself at their houses. Mahaprabhu in this manner visited an astrologer in the latter's house and asked him to calculate His previous birth. Where-upon as the latter, having repeated the mantra of Gopal, engaged in the calculation he had forthwith the beatific vision of the four-armed and two-armed Forms of the Divinity. Mahaprabhu also visited the house of Sridhar who sold small pieces of the plantain-bark being called 'plantain-bark seller Sridhar.' On this occasion Mahaprabhu made Sridhar promise Him a free supply of the core, bark and fruit of the plantain, radishes etc. from his garden.

During this period Mahaprabhu became renowned as the leading Professor of Navadwip. He defeated in controversy a certain famous Pundit who had acquired the title of 'Conqueror of all quarters' (दिग्विजयी) by his victories in learned contests over the scholars of all parts. The goddess of worldly learning whom the vanquished conquering Pundit worshipped, disclosing in a dream the cause of his discomfiture on this occasion, told her votary that she herself has not the power of confronting Narayana and advised him to make his submission to Gaur-Narayana without delay. Thus enlightened the defeated Pundit in the early dawn next day hastened to Mahaprabhu and having made his submission informed Him of what had happened. Mahaprabhu instructed the fortunate Pundit in the service of Krishna and enabled him to realise that the service of Vishnu and Vaishnavas is the goal of all learning. The disciple of this defeated savant Ganguly Bhatta had a disciple afterwards named Keshab Bhatta of Kashmere who is alleged to have figured well and revived the Modern Nimbarka school according to Mahaprabhu's views of worship.

The great professor Nimai Pundit now went out on a peripatetic tour in Eastern Bengal ostensibly for the purpose of earning money by teaching pupils, and established everywhere the samkirtan of the holy Name. The fame of His great learning soon attracted hundreds of scholars to His feet. At this time a Brahman named Tapan Misra, directed by a dream, came to Mahaprabhu to obtain from Him the solution of his doubts regarding spiritual method and object having become perplexed by the conflicting interpretations of different munis (mentalists). The Lord told him that the samkirtan of the Name of Hari is the only method as well as the object and also commanded him to proceed to Benares.

On His return from East Bengal He was informed of the departure of Lakshmi Devi to Baikuntha Dhama. The manifested grief after the manner of mortals suited to the occasion and instructed His mother about the transitoriness of the worldly sojourn.

Whenever Mahaprabhu detected any of His pupils without the tilaka mark the very first thing He did was to send the student back to his home to attend to tilaka observing that the forehead unmarked with the tilaka sign is like the charnel ground.

The lila of the marriage of Mahaprabhu with Sri Vishnupriya Devi, the Daughter of the Rajpundit Sri Sanatan Misra who also resided at Navadwip, was celebrated on an auspicious day and in an auspicious moment. A most fortunate person, Buddhimanta Khan, as the fruit of many good deeds performed by him, undertook voluntarily to bear all the expenses of this lila of the marriage of Lakshmi and Narayana.

Gaursundar drank the washing of the feet of Brahmans during His illness after the manner of elevationists who are the seekers of the fruits of their works. He made His way to Gaya where He offered pinda and visited the the lotus feet of Gadadhar. It was here that He met Sri Isvara-puri and submitted to be his disciple receiving from him the ten-lettered mantram. Everyone of these acts have a deep significance.

At last the time of manifesting Himself arrived. After His return from Gaya Mahaprabhu's mood underwent a complete change. The restlessness, the arrogance and pride of the great scholar, the turbulence, of the past suddenly disappeared. Attempting to communicate in strictest privacy to a few select devotees the happenings at Gaya He was drenched in a torrent of tears continuing to repeat the Name of Krishna. He was found frequently to shiver, to sigh incessantly and utter no words except those about Krishna. He explained to His pupils, as the meaning of every passage of text, commentary and annotation, the Name of Krishna telling all persons that in the whole of the shastras there is no other word except the Name of Krishna. Once, after the manner of Kapila, He described to Sachi Devi the sorrows of the jiva during confinement within the mother's womb and instructed her as to the advisability of constantly taking the Name of Krishna in the company of sadhus. When His pupils ask Him the meaning of 'dhatu' (धातु) 'the verbal root' the Lord explains that the verbal root is the power of Krishna. The Lord commands His pupils to listen to and chant constantly the Name of Krishna giving up all other endeavours and Himself teaches them samkirtan.

In order to teach people to serve the Vaishnavas He performs with His own hands humble menial work for the Vaishnavas. Sometimes He receives on His head the dust of the feet of the devotees and their blessings proclaiming that the service of Krishna can only be gained through the mercy of of the Vaishnavas.

One day, seated on the couch of Vishnu, the Lord declared that Sachi Devi had offended against Sri Advaita Acharyya, and, for that reason not till her offence against a Vaishnava was pardoned would she attain the loving devotion of God. Sri Sachi Devi, under the influence of pure maternal affection, had attributed the sannayas of Visvarup to the prompting of Advaitacharyya. Thereupon, as the devotees fetched Advaita Prabhu to the spot the latter began to dilate on the great qualities of the 'Mother' (आइ) and soon lapsed into the exclusive mood of loving devotion. Availing of this opportunity Sachi Devi begged for and obtained his pardon receiving on her head the dust of the feet of Sri Advaitacharyya. By this act Mahaprabhu made it perfectly clear that no one can attain loving devotion to God if his offence against the Vaishnavas remains un-pardoned.

Being entreated by Advaitacharyya Mahaprabhu showed him the Cosmic Form of the Krishna-lila in the courtyard of Sribash's house. On another occasion the devotees met together in the house of Sribash and performed the installation ceremony of Mahaprabhu. The Lord, seated on the couch of Vishnu, made manifest His majesty as Supreme Ruler. Mahaprabhu, on this occasion, freely gave away whatever boon was desired by any supplicants.

Mahaprabhu sent for Nityananda who was at this time staying in seclusion at the house of Nandan Acharyya. Sri Nityananda, the prime representative of the Supreme Lord, the same as the son of Rohini, made his appearance at the house of Hadai Pandit from the womb of Padmavati at the village of Ekchaka in the District of Birbhum A Vaishnava sannyasin Lakshmipati Tirtha begged for Nityananda from his father and took him away when he was a child. From that time Nityananda travelled to many countries in the company of the sannyasin and resided for a long time in the region of Mathura from where he was drawn to Navadwip by Mahaprabhu. Mahaprabhu now employed Thakur Haridas and Prabhu Nityananda in preaching the Name of Krishna to each and every household over the whole of Navadwip.

One day as Prabhu Nityananda having preached the Name from door to door was returning at night-fall to Mahaprabhu's residence he fell in with two drunkards, Jagai and Madhai. These two persons, born in a heriditary Brahman family, were engaged in all possible forms of sinful acts in the shape of drinking, eating beef, robbery, adultary etc. But as they spent their whole time in the society of drunkards these two worthless Brahmans had yet had no opportunity of committing the offence of maligning the Vaishnavas. Nityananda, full of boundless sympathy for the sufferings of others, the Saviour of the fallen, and Thakur Haridas made up their minds to bestow their grace on Jagai and Madhai. It was as if for the purpose of showing them his favour that Prabhu Nityananda was out that night. Jagai and Madhai met Prabhu Nityananda. No sooner did he hear the name 'abadhuta' 'super-ascetic', maddened with anger, Madhai struck a blow with his strong fist on the head of Prabhu Nityananda. Noticing this Jagai tried to prevent Madhai from persisting in such offence. At this moment Mahaprabhu Himself with His associates and followers appeared on the spot and in His anger summoned the Sudarsan chakra whereupon Nityananda said to Mahaprabhu that Jagai defended him, and therefore, it was necessary to pardon him. Mahaprabhu was propitiated towards Jagai. At this the mind of Madhai also was changed. Nityananda Prabhu pardoned Madhai. Both of them being deeply repentent and having promised never again in life to do any other thing except service of Krishna, Mahaprabhu and the devotees were moved to be merciful to them. By the mercy of Mahapraphu even those two robbers become eminent Vaishnavas. Mahaprabhu commanded His followers not to show any disrespect for them in future remembering their past sinful deeds. (To be continued).

[XV]

1 Lord, this I lay at Thy feet :
I am fallen and most vile, this the three worlds know.

2 There is no sinner so base as myself in the whole world ;
In the universe there is no one whose offence equals mine.

3 Those sins and offences as Thou know'st
I feel ashamed even to disown.

4 Whither shall I betake myself for shelter except to Thee ?
Thou art the Ruler of all the powers that be, Darling of the Lord of Braja.

5 This world is Thine, Thou permeatest all things,
Thou wear'st out the offence that is committed towards Thyself.

6 Thou, indeed, art the Refuge of those whose steps have gone astray.
What else is there beside Thyself ?

7 Even so all who offend against Thee
Will ever seek Thy Refuge.

8 Bhaktivinode seeking the shelter of Thy feet
At Thy feet surrenders himself this day.

[XVI]

1 Having surrendered Myself at Thy feet
I feel supremely happy.
Sorrow has departed, There are no cares,
I find joy on all sides.

2 Free from all sorrows and fears, Ever the seat of un-alloyed bliss,
Are those twin feet of Thine.
In them even now Resting in repose
I give up all worldly fear.

3 Thy household I shall serve,
I shall not enjoy the fruit.
For what-so-ever pleases Thee I shall endeavour
Being enamoured of Thy feet.

4 In Thy service The sorrows that befall
Verily are the highest bliss.
The sorrows and joys of Thy service Are the best of estates,
They destroy the misery of ignorance.

5 My past history I have completely forgot
In my mind experiencing the joy of Thy service.
I am, indeed, Thine Thou art truly my own,
What other treasure I need ?

6 Bhakti vinode, Unto Thy service
Immersed in joy,
Devotes all his efforts, In pursuance of Thy will,
Living in Thy house.

IN order to effect the boundless good of jivas Sri Gaursundar has promulgated specific doctrines by the agencies of particular devotees. He employed Sri Sanatan Goswamin to expound the logic of devotion and also to make known the transcendental realm of Brindaban etc.; caused Sri Ramananda Rai to explain the nature of the mellowing quality (रसः) of devotion and to define the obligations of the Vaishnava; Sri Rupa Goswamin was authorized to unfold the mystery of devotion; Gopal Bhatta Goswamin was commanded to formulate the rules for regulating the conduct (आचार) of the Vaishnavas; and Prabhu Haridas was empowered to proclaim the glory of the holy Name.

It was only after the great Thakur had made known the glories of the Name that the bound jivas of this world became aware of the fact that the object of which they stood in need was not virtue, wealth, enjoyment or freedom from misery ; that Krishna is not served by the physical body and mind or by words that have a reference to the physical mind and body ; that, on the contrary, the Divine Logos or the holy Name manifests itself only when such words are prompted by the spiritual body and mind in the act of serving Krishna.

The holy Name, which is identical with Krishna, does not manifest itself through the physical organs of sense. The Divine Logos is generated by the vibration of the tongue and the lips when such vibration is caused by the mind that has been liberated from all inclination to physical enjoyment. Such activity of the mind is due to the spiritual impulse that transcends all selfish enjoyment. This impulse comes from the immaculate soul as soon as it begins to function untrammelled by the physical mind and body. As soon as the Divine Logos is generated it dispels the darkness of the state of bondage of the hearers and brings about the rise of the Sun of the holy Name. The domination of the physical body and mind is strengthened if the Sun of the holy Name is shut out by the intervening screen of the mirage of the physical body, earthly treasures, great assemblies of men, greed for material objects, the erroneous notion that the Name of Krishna is on a level with names of objects other than Krishna due to the belief that Krishna or the Divinity can be equalled by objects other than Krishna, etc. But as soon as this interval is eliminated the self-refulgent Sun of the holy Name stands manifest as the object of the perennial devotion of the jiva who is in his true nature the eternal servant of Krishna.

The holy Name and the dim reflection of the Name, although they are in essence the same thing, are nevertheless different in manifestation. The holy Name gives rise to love for Kirshna ; the dim glow of the Name removes aversion to Krishna. The realised form of the holy Name is Sri Krishna ; the realisation of the dim glow of the Name is the Incarnation of the Omnipotent imperfectly manifest delivering from aversion to Hari.

In like manner the Name in association with offence is also different from the holy Name. If the holy Name appears in association with offence it makes the jiva serve the physical body and mind cutting him off from love for Krishna. By the Name associated with offence only trivial fruits are obtained, but the eternal object is never realised.

The holy Name is Krishna Himself, the fundamental Reality underlying Divinity. Due to ignorance of our relationship with Krishna we are liable to commit ten different varieties of offence at the feet of Divinity in the from of the holy Name. The following extract from the pen of Sri Thakur Haridas may help one in guarding against the ten offences.

'The first offence is slandering sadhus. The holy Name has to be taken without committing this grave offence. The second offence is committed if we suppose that the other goods exist independently of Sri Krishna. The third offence arises if Sri Gurudeva who knows Sri Krishna is disregarded in any way. The fourth offence is the fatal consequence of decrying the holy Scriptures. The fifth offence is caused if one supposes that the glories of the holy Name are merely eulogistic and also by incredulity in regard to the infinite results, mentioned in the Scriptures, that flow from the holy Name. The sixth offence occurs if sin is committed through confidence in the power of the holy Name to save from the consequences of sinful acts. The seventh offence is committed by instructing a disbeliever in the mystery of the holy Name. The holy Name should never be considered as being on a level with other good deeds. Such attitude is held by experienced devotees to constitute the eighth offence. The ninth offence is in-attentiveness. It is a very great obstacle and effectively prevents the attainment of loving devotion with the mighty obstructive force of an infuriated elephant. The tenth offence is very difficult to get rid of. It prevents the very beginnings of the love for the Name. The apostle of the holy Name, Brahma Haridas, calls it the offence of "I" and "Mine". By serving the holy Name avoiding carefully these ten offences the dim glow of the Name manifests itself. The dim glow of the Name removes all sinfullness whereupon the un-alloyed Name makes its appearance and bestows love for God.'

The Name associated with offence and the dim glow of the Name are both adulterated with this difference that the latter is free from offence. The holy Name is not a thing that can be associated with offence neither is it liable to any obscuration like the dim glow which is free from offence. In service performed with the knowledge of one's relationship with God it is the holy Name that is the object of adoration. In worship devoid of the knowledge of such relationship the object worshipped is either the dim glow of the Name or the Name associated with offence. In Name associated with offence there is deception and the consequent attainment of the material in place of the spiritual. In the dim glow of the Name which frees from offence there is no deception and there is consequent realisation of the Pure Intelligence as an abstraction. In the holy Name is present love for Krishna or the mellowing quality resulting from the concrete play of the Pure Intelligence. Those alone in whom the desire for the attainment of the material is strong offend through ignorance of the spiritual. Thus offending they are liable to be confirmed in their aversion against Hari being able to secure those trivial objects that are the rewards of un-Godliness. Those, however, whose sole object is to serve Hari should carefully abstain from all offence. It is only when the offence against the Name is fully given up that the dim glow of the Name makes its appearance. The dim glow may lead the jiva even to Baikuntha

The great Thakur exhibited to the world the glory of the holy Name up to the very last day of his manifest existence. When on that day Sriman Mahaprabhu enquired about the nature of his illness the Thakur, the Acharyya of the holy Name, attributed his distemper to failure in telling the full number of the Name. Noticing his eagerness to finish the full number Sri Gaursundar besought him to reduce the number as he had already realised his spiritual body.

Thereupon having seated Mahaprabhu in front of himself Sri Haridas said, 'With my hands I shall hold Thy lotus feet to my bosom, with my eyes behold Thy moon-like face, utter Thy holy Name Krishna-Chaitanya with my tongue and in this manner I shall give up my life. May this base body of mine fall before Thee. Be Thou pleased to fulfil this desire of mine.'

'Haridas then seated the Lord in front of himself, fixed his two eyes bee-like on His lotus face, clasping the Lord's feet to his bosom, wearing on his head the ornament of the dust of the feet of all the devotees, in the very act of uttering the Name, Sri Krishna-Chaitanya, with the holy Name gave up his life.'

On the departure of Sri Thakur Haridas, who quitted his paramahansya body on the fourteenth lunar day of the dark fortnight of the month of Bhadra, Mahaprabhu lifted up the body and holding it in His arms began to dance. Then He placed the body on a conveyance and took it to the sea-shore singing kirtan. Having washed the body lay immersing it into the sea He deposited it inside the sand and with His own hand covered the body with sand. That bathing place of the sea has become famous since then and bears the name of Mahatirtha ghat. On the site of the grave has been established, since more than a hundred years the eternal service of Sri Gauranga. Mahaprabhu then perambulated the great Thakur and commanded maha-prasadam to be brought from the Lion Gate and Himself Distributed it to the devotees.

Regarding the disappearance of Haridas Srimam Mahaprabhu said, 'Let all sing the Name of Hari with the words 'All glory to Haridas.' Haridas was the crest-jewel of the world. By his departure the earth is bereft of her treasure. Let all sing 'All glory to Haridas.' Glory to Haridas who made manifest the glories of the holy Name. Krishna out of mercy had given Me his company. The will of Krishna prevails ; it has now severed the bond of that companionship. When Haridas wished to leave this world My power failed to hold him back. He gave up his life at his own will just as we hear Bhishma did of old'.

Birth of Sree Krishna

Sri Suka said—

20. Then finding the signs of the great being in that Child born from herself
Devaki, transported with wonder, afraid of Kamsa, addressed Him with this hymn of praise :

Sri Devaki said—

21. Thou—Whose form has been spoken of as the Inexpressible, Primeval, Radiance that is the Brahman, transcending all quality—all change,
The pure Essence, Immaterial, Free from effort—art even Vishnu Himself, the Light of the soul.

22. At the end of the period of two parardhas, all the worlds being destroyed, as the different elements are re-absorbed into the one primary element,
And the manifest re-enters the non-manifest by the power of time, Thou alone exist, whence Thou art called Ananta, the Endless.

23. Thou art the Lord of Nature ; yea even Time which moulds the world, in all its divisions from the minute to the complete year,
Is called Thy agent ; Supreme Lord, with Thee, the Abode of safety from all fear, I seek refuge.

24. Mortals fleeing for fear of the serpent Death through all the worlds find no place of safety,
But if by chance they attain Thy lotus feet that scare away death they repose in perfect security,

25. Destroyer of the fears of Thy servants, save us, living in great fear, from the terrible son of Ugrasena.
Oh, let not fleshy eyes look upon this Divine form seen only in meditation !

26. May that great scoundrel never know of Thy birth from me, Slayer of the demon Madhu!
Distracted by anxieties on Thy account I am, indeed greatly afraid of Kamsa!
Soul of the Universe, with-hold this transcendental Form—four-armed and ado rned with the beautiful conch, disc, club and lotus.

27. The Supreme Being, Who after the great Cataclysm easily accommodates this world in His own body,
Has been born from my womb: this, alas, must also be a matter of ridicule to mortal men!

The Lord said—

28. In your former birth, during the regime of Sayambhuba manu, thou wert called Prisni, good lady,
And this sin-less Vasudeva was then the prajapati, Sutapa.

29. Commanded by Brahma to procreate offspring both of you restraining all your senses, practised the highest asceticism, and enduring patiently the inclemencies of the seasons rain, storm, scorching rays of the sun, cold, summer heat,—
Being fully cleansed of all impurities of the mind by controlling the breath, feeding on withered leaves of trees and the air,—with a mind be calmed ye engaged in worshipping Me with the object of obtaining from Me the fulfilment of your desires.

30. Lady, in this manner, both of you practised the severest tapas, Thinking only on Me, for the space of twelve thousand years of heavenly measure.

31. Thereupon having been thus meditated upon with self-restraint, reverence and constant devotion of heart, being pleased with both of you, in this very Form, sinless one,
I, Who am truly royal in bestowing boons, appeared before you, wishing to grant the desire of both and said, 'Ask from Me whatever boon you desire': when both of you asked for the boon of having a son like Myself,

32. Although you had eschewed all vulgar pleasures—but, as husband and wife, being childless
You did not ask from Me the boon of emancipation overpowered by My illusory power.

33. After I was gone, thus obtaining the boon of a son like Myself, having gained what you longed for, you betook yourselves to youthful enjoyments.
Finding no other persons in all the world equal to you in virtue and nobility of character I chose to be born as your son known as Prisni-garbha (i.e born in the womb of Prisni).

34. It was also from you, as Aditi and Kasyapa, that I was born again, when I became known as Upendra and also as Bamana being of dwarfish stature;
Then in this third birth also I am thus born of you again and in the same Form; My words, virtuous lady, are true.

35. I have shown you this Form in order to remind you to My first appearance at birth,
As I can never be recognised by My human likeness.

36. Thinking of Me as the Brahman or loving Me as your son, only for once, both will attain the supreme goal which is Myself.

Sri Suka said—

Having spoken thus Hari became silent, and the Supreme Lord in the view of the parents forthwith became a human child.

37. Thereupon as Shauri by command of God taking up his Son prepared to go out of the lying-in chamber,
That very moment yoga-maya who has no birth was born of the wife of Nanda ;

38. And the guards at the gates and the citizens being asleep, robbed by her of all powers of understanding,
All the impassable gates whose massive folds were strongly secured by bolts and chains of iron

39. Opened wide of themselves, as darkness before the sun, on the approach of Vasudeva carrying Krishna ;
Rained the slow-muttering clouds, Shesha followed with his hoods sheltering Him from the rain-water.

40. The god of rain sending down incessant showers, the river, younger sister of Yama,—frothy with the violence of the waves of her deep waters, Agitated by hundreds of fearful whirl-pools,—made way, as did the ocean for the Lord of Sree.

41. Reaching the cow-herd settlement of Nanda, aware that the cow-herds of the place were all sleep,
He placed the Boy in the bed of Yasoda and taking away her daughter returned to his room.

42. Then Vasudeva laying down the girl in the bed of Devaki,
Having bound his own feet with iron-chains, remained fettered as before.

43. Yasoda the wife of Nanda was aware only of the birth of her Child
But not its sex, rendered oblivious of everything by sleep due to exhaustion, that came upon her immediately after delivery.

Here ends the third chapter, entitled 'The Appearance of Sree Krishna', in the tenth skandha of the Mahapuranam paramahansya samhita Sree Bhagabat by Baiasiki.

To Love God

(Reprinted from a journal of Tajpur, dated Friday, 25th August, 1871.)

IT was Christ Jesus who first said "Love God with all thy heart, with all thy mind, with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and love man as thy brother." This is an absolute truth indeed; but different men put different interpretations to this noble expression. The expressions of all great men are nice but somewhat mysterious—when understood, they bring the truth nearest to the heart otherwise they remain mere letters that "kill." The reason of the mystery is that men, advanced in their inward approach to the Deity, are in the habit of receiving revelations which are but mysteries to those that are behind them. The stages of progress are very much the same as the circles of spiritualism which, though not true themselves, explain a great deal about the gradual developement of the soul. We have understood some spiritualists to maintain that matter when sublimated converts itself to spirit. This theory is indeed against any inward conviction. Matter is matter, and Spirit is Spirit; one of them cannot form the other. Spirit is certainly of a superior existence; though we cannot fully understand in our present state of material imprisonment, what relation Spirit does exactly bear to matter, space and time. Metaphysics apart, we decide that the human soul rises higher and higher and can understand things of which we have no idea at present. Subject to this important rule, Christ Jesus of Nazareth received and uttered the words quoted above. To readers who are a little above the scale of ordinary men, these expressions of Jesus teach, that man should love God with all his heart, (meaning the affections of the heart perceiveable in all children as opposed to hate, with all his mind, (meaning the intellect which knows as opposed to ignorance of good things) with all his soul, (meaning that principle of the human constitution which worships the Almighty and feels its own immortality) and with all his strength, (meaning all active work). To the inspired, however, more things and better and sublimer meanings appear beneath these holy words of the Inspired Jesus. He teaches man to love God and not to know, infer, hate, or think of God. He tells us that man in his absolute state is not the intellect or the body but is the pure Soul itself. The essence of the soul is wisdom and its action is love absolute. The absolute condition of man is his absolute relation to the Deity in pure love. Love then alone is the religion of the Soul and consequently of the whole man. The pupil asks here "What have I to do with the heart?—my heart loves to see the 'sun to smile', 'to eat the sweetest dish and to see a dance'. Jesus profoundly replies "yes, you must love God with all thy heart, your heart now runs to other things than God, but you must, as you train a bad horse, make your feelings run to the loving God." This is one of the four principles of worship or what they call in Vaishnava Literature, Shanta Rasa. Then the pupil says "my Lord, the intellect takes me elsewhere from God, i. e., it wants to take me to Positivism; please instruct me what am I to do?" "Yes", replies Jesus "you must love God with all your mind, i. e. when you perceive, conceive, remember, imagine and reason, you must not allow yourself to be a dry thinker but must love. Love alone can soften the dryness of the intellect, you must develop the intellect on all good and holy things by means of love of truth, spiritual beauty and harmony." This is the second phase of Vaishnava developement which passes by the name of Dashya Rasa. The pupil then enquires whether the developement of the affections and the intellect is quite enough for him. Then says the Lord "you must love God with thy soul also, i. e., you must perceive yourself in spiritual communication with the Deity and receive holy revelations in your sublimest hours of worship." This is called the Sakhya Rasa of the Vaishnavas,—the Soul approaching the Deity in holy and fearless service. The disciple apprehends that he will be lost in such a position and will be unable to act. Then the Saviour tells him these words "you must love God with all thy strength or will,—you are wrong in concluding that you will loose your active existence—you will get it the more. Work for God and work to God, proceeding from no interested views but from a holy free will (which is alone the strength of man) and identifying itself with pure love, will fully engross your attention." This description is of Bhakti in general. Then Jesus proceeds to tell us "You must love man as thy brother." From this is inferred the fourth phase of love which is a feeling that all men are brothers and God is their common Father. This is Batshalya Rasa in its first stage of developement.

Bhakti (love) is thus perceived in the very first developement of the man in the shape of heart, then in the shape of mind, then in the shape of soul and lastly in the shape of will. These shapes do not destroy each other but beautifully harmonize themselves into a pure construction of what we call the spiritual man or the Ekanta of Vaishnava Literature But there is another sublimer truth behind this fact which is revealed to a few that are prepared for it. We mean the spiritual conversion of the Soul into a woman. It is in that sublime and lofty state in which the soul can taste the sweets of an indissoluble marriage with God of Love. The fifth or the highest stage of Vaishnava developement is this, which we call Madhura Rasa, and on this alone the most beautiful portion of the Vaishnava Literature so ably expatiates. This phase of human life, mysterious as it is, is not attainable by all, nay, we should say, by any but "God's own." It is so very beyond the reach of common men that the rationalists and even the ordinary theists cannot understand it, nay, they go so far as to sneer a tit as something unnatural. Oh God ! Reveal Thy most valuable truths to all so that Your own may not be numbered with the fanatics and the crazed and that the whole of mankind may be admitted as "Your own."

SRI RAMANANDA GAUDIYA MATH * KOVUR, M.S.D. * DIVINE LIBRARY ESTD. 1961

52 Thus sported in the water the beautiful figure of Gaur,
The water from His feet sprinkled the bodies of all the bathers.

53 Though all forbade He paid no heed to them
But nowhere could any of them catch Him.

54 The Lord made all the people bathe over and over again,
Touched the bodies of some after their bath, with His mouth sprouted the water at others.

55 Unable to catch hold of the Lord the Brahmans in a body
Presented themselves before the father.

56 'Misra, best of friends, listen well,
We want to tell you all the vagaries of your Boy.

57 'It is impossible to bathe in the Ganges in the proper manner.'
One of them said, 'He interrupts my meditations by throwing water at me.

58 'And says further, 'Behold Him on Whom you meditate ;
In the kali age I am Narayana manifest.'

59 Some one said, 'He steals my symbol of Siva';
Said another, 'He bolts with my upper cloth'.

60 And yet another complained, 'Flowers, durba grass, offerings, sandal-paste,
All requisites arranged for the worship of Vishnu, the seat of Vishnu,— 61 'As I perform my bath, He there sits on the asana,

And having eaten and worn all things, makes off,—

62 'Saying, 'Why do you feel sorry in mind ?
He has eaten for whom you prepared.'

63 Some said, 'As I perform my sandhya standing up in the water, Making His way under water, pulls me away by the feet'.

64 Some said, 'My flower-basket and clothes are never to be found.'
Some said, 'He steals my puthi, the Geeta.'

65 Some complained, 'My son is a mere baby
He makes him cry violently by putting water into his ear.'

66 Some informed, 'He climbs by the back to my shoulders,
And leaping down cries 'I am Mahesha'.

67 Some said, 'He places Himself on my seat made for worship,
Having eaten the offerings, Himself worships Vishnu'.

68 'After I have bathed He throws sand at me
With all the turbulent boys at His heels ;

69 'Puts the clothes of females in the place of those of males ;
All go mad with shame as they put on wrong cloths ;

70 'You are the best of friends, Misra Jagannath,
I tell you He does this every day.

71 He does not get out of the water even when it is past mid-day,
So how will His body keep its health ?'

72 Just at that moment all the girls of the neighbour-hood
With angry minds, came to the presence of Sachi Devi.

73 With great respect they spoke to her—
'Lady, be pleased to listen to the deeds of your Son ;

74 'He steals our clothes, abuses us,
He gets up a quarrel and throws water at us if we protest.

75 'All the flowers and fruits that we bring with us for performing brata
He forcibly takes away and scatters in all directions.

76 'As we come out of the water after bath
He throws sand at us,
And with Him are all the wayward boys.'

77 'Coming up un-noticed shouts loudly into our ears'
One said, 'With His mouth He sprouted water into my face.'

78 'Puts the seed of okhra into my hair.'
'He wants to wed me,' said another.

79 'What is He ?—to behave like this every day ?
Is your Nimai the King's Son ?'

80 'Your Nimai behaves exactly like what We hear the Son of Nanda did formerly.'

81 'Being sorely grieved when we shall inform our parents
That day they will have a sure quarrel with you.'

82 'So be pleased to restrain your Son at once.
Such behaviour is not at all proper at Nadia.'

83 On hearing this the mother of Mahaprabhu laughed
And taking all of them on her lap said sweet words—

84 'When Nimai comes back to-day I shall bind and beat Him
That He may not trouble you again.'

85 Taking the dust of Sachi's feet on their heads
They went back to the Ganges to bathe again.

86 Notwithstanding any frolics that the Lord played toward any one,
All were inwardly pleased in their souls.

87 They came to Misra to complain for pure fun
On hearing which the Misra sterned and threatened violence—

88 'Thus does He behave constantly to all,—
He does not allow them even to bathe properly !

89 'I must go at once and punish Him severely.'
Not all their efforts could hold him back.

90 As the Misra hastened towards the spot in great anger,
The Supreme Lord of all beings was aware of it.

91 In the stream of the Ganges sported
Sri Gaursunder,
The most charming figure amidst all the boys

92 All the girls said, 'Hear Bisvambhar,
Fly at once, the Misra is coming just now.'

93 Whereupon as the Lord ran after them with His companions
The Brahman girls scattered in a fright.

94 He now instructed every one to say to Misra,
'Your Son has not come to bathe.'

95 'He went home the other way after school was over ;
All of us are also waiting for Him.'

96 Having thus coached them the Lord returned home by a different road
Just as the Misra appeared at the bathing place of the Ganges.

97 Arrived there Misra looked about in
all directions,
But did not find his Son in the midst of the children.

98 The Misra asked them, 'Whither has Bisvambhar gone ?'
The children replied, 'He has not come to bathe to-day ;

99 'He went the other way after school
was over ;
We are all waiting for Him.'

100 The Misra looked about with stick in hand, Stormed and raged violently not being able to catch Him.

101 Those Brahmans who for fun had complained
Now arrived and said once again,—

102 'Afraid of you Bisvambhar has left and gone back home ;
So return to your house but do not say anything to Him.

103 'If He does any mischief again
Ourselves will catch and take Him to you.'

104 'Those words that we spoke to you were said in fun ;
There is no one in all the three worlds so fortunate as thyself.

105 'In whose house there is such a Darling.'
What can hunger, thirst and grief do to such a one ?

106 'You indeed served truly the feet of the Lord
He is most fortunate who has such a Son.—

107 'If Bisvambhar commits crores of offences
Yet is He ever the Darling of our hearts.'

108 All these persons are verily the devotees of Krishna at each birth ;
Therefore they have such excellent judgment.

109 Thus in the company of His own servants
The Lord ever sports in many diverse ways, but no one can know.

110 The Misra said, 'He is the Son of you all ;
Do not take any offence for my sake.'

111 Having embraced all of them the Misra
Came home with a light heart.

112 Lord Bisvambhar had returned by another road
With the beautiful puthi in His hand resembling the Moon ;

113 Drops of ink adorned the body of Gaur,
As if black bees clung to all sides of the champaka flower.

114 The Lord called shouting 'Mother !'
'Give Me oil, I shall go to bathe.'

115 Sachi was delighted hearing the voice of her Son ;
She did not find on His body any sign of bath.

116 Sachi Devi was filled with doubts and reflected in her mind,
'What is this that the girls say and the Brahmans ?'

117 'Dots of ink are still all over His body,
He is wearing the same cloth and has the same puthi.'

118 In another moment arrived the great Misra Jagannath,
Catching sight of the Misra Bisvambhar climbed into his arms.

119 By that embrace Misra forgot everything
of the world ;
He was completely filled with joy on beholding his Son.

120 Misra noticed that His whole body was covered with dust,
And was astonished discovering no sign of bath.

121 The Misra said, 'Bisvambhar, how is this reasonable ?
Why dost thou prevent the bath of the people ?

122 'Why dost thou spoil the things for the worship of Vishnu ?
Art thou not afraid even of Vishnu ?'

123 The Lord said, 'I did not go to bathe to-day.
My companions have gone in advance.

124 'They mis-behave to all persons.
But those people blame Me even when I am not there.

125 'If they thus accuse Me for what happens in My absence
I say truly I will certainly treat them ill.'

126 So saying the Lord went off laughing to bathe in the Ganges
And merrily once more joined the band of children.

127 On seeing Bisvambhar all of them embraced Him ;
And all the children burst into laughter on hearing of His trick.

128 All praised ; 'Well done, clever Nimai !
Thou hast very well escaped very sound beating to-day.'

129 Thus the Lord sported in the stream of the Ganges in the company of all the children.
Here Sachi and Jagannath thus thought in their minds,—

130 'Those things that they have said cannot be false,—
But how is it that we found no sign of bath on His body ?

131 'There was the same dust all over His body, the same unbathed appearance,
The very same puthi, the same cloth, hair.

132 'The Divine Bisvambhar is no mortal ;
By His own eternal power Krishna Himself may have been born in our house ;

133 'Or some other great Being,—it passes my understanding'—
Thus thought the best of the twice-born.

134 These thoughts were banished by joy at the sight of the face of their Son, Both were filled with great happiness and there remained no trace of other thought.

135 Those two praharas while the Lord was away to school
Were even as two ages to those two.

136 Even if the Vedas declare in crores of ways and with crores of mouths
The good fortune of these two cannot be fully expressed.

137 Mani-fold obeisance at the feet of Sachi and Jagannath
In the form of whose Son appeared the Supreme Lord of all the countless worlds !

138 In this manner played the Lord of Baikuntha
No one understood deluded by His illusive energy.

The Harmonist or Sree Sajjanatoshani

(Reprinted from "Lakpaty's Fort-nightly" Bombay, Dated 1-1-28.)

FOR years and years the Hindus, Vaishnavites as well as Sivaites, preferred to remain with their folded hands merely as spectators of the revolutionary propoganda work carried on in matters religious by Christian Missionaries, who had come down to this country from foreign lands such as England, Germany and America. They were so much confused at the activities of the foreign religious agents that they knew not how to end them. They knew they were a subject race and had no weapons with which they could fight the growing evil out. Before their very eyes their brethren were being dragged out of their religious fold they saw their own sisters were made aliens to them ; they saw their Krishna and Siva were displaced by Christ and others. They saw Christian Churches and other foreign houses of worship forcing themselves into existence side by side by their temples in Baranasi and Rameswar, and yet they could not, they would not, do anything to save themselves and their religion. They were as they are to-day a philosophical lot and they conveniently resigned themselves to their karma. As time went on a wave of a religious revival rose up producing many an avatharpurusha, to save the Hindu religion from its impending grave.

During the present day as in the past Hinduism has produced great many religious men each doing his selfless work, in the cause of the hoary-headed Hinduism. Among such men Sreemad Bhakti-Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaja, who is the Editor of the journal under review, occupies a place which is admittedly the highest place a real Bhakta can ever aspire to. Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati is a living exponent of Vaishnavism Suppose some asks Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati what is a Vaishnava ? Possibly he may refer him to the following stanza which in a way explains what a Vaishnava is or should be :

Naham vipra nacha narapatirnapi Vaishyo na shudro, Naham varnee nacha grihapatirna banastho yatirva,
Kintu prodynnikhila paramananda
poornamritabdher-Gopibharthu padakamalayordasa dasanudhasaha.

Thakur Bhaktivinode as the head of the devotees of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya is an ocean of love and his magazine the Harmonist containing as it does very many learned thesis on the religion of Bhakti is an ocean of Bhakti literature. We have before us Nos. 1 to 5, Vol. 25 of the Harmonist. They contain a serial translation of Sri Chaitannya's doctrines, a Study of Bhakti-vinode, history of the birth of Bhagawan Sri Krishna and so many other interesting items which every Hindu would do well to make a careful study of as much for the elevation of his own soul as for the elevation of the soul of India Under the management of Mr. M. S. G. Aiyar, a young Brahmin of the South the magazine is issued punctually and is made up in a manner to reflect great credit to him. The annual subscription of the magazine is only Rs. 3-8 the cost of specimen copy being annas 5. The printing is good and so is the get up. A few pages in every issue are set apart for the publication of contributions in Sanskrit, a portion known as "Sajjanatoshani. The contributions appearing under "Vritta-brahmanata", "Vaishnavamata", "Sikshad_sakmulam", Sriman Madhwacharya" and others show an amount of scholarship of their authors. They are well worth a perusal as such serious articles on serious subjects can hardly be found elsewhere. We wish the journal a glorious career in its noble mission which is to make Vaishnavism the universal religion of India.

Sri Chaitanya Anniversary at Sri Mayapur

(Forward, Thursday, 15th March, 1928)

The advent anniversary of Sri Chaitanya Deva is being celebrated from the 6th instant at the house of Srila Jagannath Misra at Sri Mayapur near the historical lake-like Ballaldighi. Pilgrims are highly interested to see the remaining off-shoot of the Nim-tree under which Sriman Mahaprabhu was born. Many highly respectable gentlemen, both officials and public, from every part of Bengal, U. P. Bihar and Orissa. Madras and the Punjab joined in large numbers. Not less than six to seven thousand people were treated with Sri Mahaprosad each mealtime every day. It is roughly estimated that about sixty thousand people visited this holy place in course of the last four days. The members of the Sridham Procharini Sabha, with the help of a large number of volunteers prevented rush and managed the crowd tactfully and politely so that no pilgrim had to suffer any trouble whatsoever. The Mela around the Gourkunda is still continuing.

The Annual General Meeting of the Sridham Procharini Sabha was held on the 7th inst. with Paramahansa Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Thakur in the chair. His Highness the present Maharajadhiraj Bir Bikram Manikya Bahadur of Tipperah was elected the President of the Sridham Pracharini Sabha in place of the late Maharaja. Many new members were enlisted and office bearers were elected. Amongst others a resolution for the expenditure of up to one lac of rupees for the purpose of accommodation of pilgrims was passed.

The bad condition of roads and the irregularity of the Ferry Service at Swarupganj were keenly felt by pilgrims. The members of the Local Board and the District Board of Krishnagar should be well advised to take proper care.

Birth-place of Sri Gauranga

(Quoted from Forward and a leader in the Basumati Daily English Edition, of 7th April, 1928)

A special meeting of the Viswa-Vaishnaba-Raj-Sabha was held at the Calcutta Gaudiya Math on Thursday last at 6-30 P.M. Many respectable gentlemen of Calcutta and a large number of Suddha Bhaktas were present there. The following resolutions were passed :

1. In view of the fact that 40 years ago the site of the birth-place of Sri Chaitanya Dev was definitely ascertained to be Sri Mayapur near Ballal Dighi (on the eastern bank of the Ganges opposite to the present Nabadwip town), and accepted by Government records, and persons like the late Sir Guru Das Banerjee, Mahatma Sishir Kumar Ghose, M. M. Dr. Satish Chandra Vidyabhusan, and many other respectable persons and antiquarians leaving no reasonable ground of doubt, this Sabha condemns the activities of some interested parties of the town of Nabadwip who being prompted by malice and selfishness are trying to dupe the public by raising a new plea of ascertaining over again another birth-place of Mahaprabhu wherewith to discredit the activities of the Gaudiya Math and thereby lending support to the various forms of perversions and distortions of the sublime religion of Sri Chaitanya Dev against which a systematic attempt of wholesale purification is adumbrated by the preachers of this organisation.

2. This Sabha further urges on all true followers of Mahaprabhu to dissociate themselves with all such activities.

Idolatry

[By Sj. Nimananda Das Adhicary, B. Ag., B. T.]

GOD has been proclaimed as the highest unchallengeable truth by all the three great religions of the world,—Hinduism, Mahomedanism and Christianity. The followers of these religions believe in the existence of a personal God, and look upon Him as the creator, the maintainer and the destroyer of the world. The difference between Hinduism and the other religions—Christianity and Mahomedanism, lies in the fact that the former preaches worship of God under a definite form, whereas the latter do not. But nevertheless it is not right to say that the scriptures of these religions, namely the Bible and the Koran entertain an idea of a formless God. It is fallacious to think that because God is not worshipped under a perishable form that therefore He must be formless. It is a matter of great regret that generally the followers of these two religions show a lamentable lack of information revealed in their own scriptures when they taunt Hindus, for their conception of a definite form of God and their worship of Him in that form, as idolaters and their religion as idolatry. Insinuations of this nature are but the natural outcome of a dogmatic mind, that is addicted more to the form than to the spirit of a religion. Such execrable adherence to form so dwarfs the vision that it totally incapacitates one to appreciate the comparative beauty of religions. The minds of such people are ever impercious to education. The well-known maxim 'strike but hear,' bears no weight with them. Now the people who have made it their business to attack, to vilify, to insinuate, it is no use to argue with them. Let them remain alone. Approach must be made to a less dogmatic section of the people who lend ears, and refer them to a comparative study of the philosophies of the different religions, which will certainly, if they happen to be unbiased, enable them to discern one sublime truth that pervades all these religions, that are fundamentally not different, ıt are the different phases of the one and ıe same religion that governs the universe. here will then be no room for these acri- onious assertions hitherto so lavishly made ıout a most important religion, namely, induism.

There is however no denying of the fact at among the Hindus there are certain sects at do practise idolatry. Their profession s however no locus standi as a revealed ligion. And the less we take notice of it e better. It is not to be mistaken for Vaisna- ısm that the Vedas and the Puranas unequi- cally preach. Vaisnavism is a soul's religion, be grasped and practised by the soul only. ental speculation has no room in it. It is ove the body, and above the mind. It is votion to One Supreme Being, Who is One thout a second. Hindus know Him as ishna or Vishnu. The worshipper of Vishnu generally known as a Vaisnava. Lord ishna eternally reigns in Vaikuntha ; but sometimes manifests Himself on this earth, ıen all see Him, but none knows Him, save s devotees to whom however He ever re- ains manifested. The vision of the worldly ople, accustomed to view things through ıe, space and causality, is obstructed, but ıt of His devotees, who have been favoured h the transcedental knowledge of Him, is er obstructed. Vaisnavism is not Sectaria- m as it is generally regarded by the people ose minds are not sufficiently trained so as penetrate into the depth of its subtle philo- hy. It is the Universal Religion. All other gions, that preach God in one form or ther, are part and parcel of it. The nearer y approach towards the attainment of the ice to one God-head, the more akin do y become to Vaisnavism Vaisnavism re- ciles them all, and all are reconciled in snavism. All our Scriptures that, at first ıt, appear to strike discordant notes, do but ord the different view-points of the same truth that Vaisnavism reveals in full. Sri Gour Sundar, the greatest and undisputed exponent if our Sastras, has made such a clear exposition of them as can admit of no secondary meaning. Any one who is fortunate enough to associate himself with His real followers and discuss with them His teachings, is sure to be drawn to think with Him, to feel with Him, and hail Vaisnavism, as preached by Him, as the only acceptable form of faith. It is being revealed to devotees from time to time, and the flow has thus been kept untainted by the realisation of the never-ending line of the successive devotees.

All other faiths that also go by the name of Hinduism, and that can hardly venture to cross the narrow limits of Sectarianism, are but doctrines of the Elevationists who, in the matter of investigation after truth, rely more on their intellect than on the grace of God. It has been discussed in these pages that the speculations even of a giant mind can hardly reach God. He defies all our intellectual achievements, and ever remains unexplainable. A mind, however trained it may be, cannot assert anything positively about the Absolute Truth, which it is entirely the soul's duty to do. The scriptures of all these three religions are one in condemning such doctrines of the non-conformists. Truth is transcendental, eternal and unchangeable. All, that these people have to say about it cannot claim a higher place than the prattlings of a child. God cannot be what they want to make Him ; but He is what He is. He is His own explanation ; and only he, to whom He wants to be known, knows what He is. These doctrines of the different schools of elevationists are the same in the different religions.

The elevationists do practise idolatry. Anything concocted by the mind is idolatry, and nothing but idolatry. But the Vaisnavism is not idolatry. And why? A peep into the history of idolatry as it obtained in Arabia and Palestine before the advent of Muhammad and Christ will enable any one to see the difference between it and Vaisnavism, and convince him at once of the injustice of calling the latter idolatry. In Kaba at Mecca there were originally three idols named Lat, Monat and Gora worshipped as gods. These three soon grew into three hundred and sixty. Muhammad had to wage war against these three hundred and sixty gods. They were entirely of human making, and their worship was not based on any revelation recorded in scriptures then existing. These idols were looked upon as national gods by the people of whole Arabia, and were held in such a high esteem by them that damage to any part of any of these idols used to send the whole nation into mourning. The particular idol, thus damaged, was not replaced, but was allowed to continue its existence with the deformed body. Matter was thus being deified as spirit. Things continued in this way for a very long time, when Muhammad appeared on the scene, and his preaching against the worship of the idols so enraged the people of Arabia that they arrayed themselves against him, and Muhammad had to fight many a deadly battle with them. They were at last vanquished and compelled to bow before the superior strength of Muhammad. With the breaking of their physical power their age-long superslition also broke. Truth triumphed over fiction ; and Muhammad soon succeeded in mustering a strong army of believers who were ready to live by his faith and die for his faith. The aversion for idol worship ran so strong in the minds of his followers, that they, soon after his ascension, began to enforce conversion by means of the sword ; and slaughtering of men, instead of being looked upon as a crime, came to be regarded by his followers as a pious act that immediately earned for the slaughterer a place in the Behest. They extended this indiscriminate slaughtering even to the door of Hinduism, which to them appeared as nothing but idolatry. Roughly th history of idolatry in the neighbouring distri of Palestine had been the same. And Chri attempted to obtain its eradication by lov and not hatred of its followers.

But Vaisnavism does not deify matte Neither does it deny form to the spirit. On th contrary it holds that the spirit is identical wit and inseparable from, its form. In this physic world there is a difference between the spirit ar the matter with which the former is clad. B in the spiritual world there is no material bod There the entity is not made up of differe elements like spirit and matter as it is her The spirit and its form are but differentiatio of the same element called Chit. A careful stu of the problem will make clear the distincti between the soul in its natural condition in V kuntha and encaged in a material body.

First let us take God. Is He personal impersonal ? None of the three religions c Him impersonal. When a Mahomedan chan "La ila illillaho Muhammed rasul allaho," speaks of a personal God. When Christ to h disciples said "He that receiveth me receive Him that sent me," he spoke of a personal G When Sri Gaur Sundar preaches "जीवेर स्वर हय कृष्णेर नित्यदास," He speaks of a perso God, Whose eternal servant is the jiva.

The next question is "Has God any defin form ?" The answer is in the positive. But t issue is controversial. Some among the emp cists maintain that God cannot have any defin form. He however can assume any form wh there is a need for Him to be manifest in t physical world. The form or forms that thus assumes are as material and transitory ours. In support of their view they too qu Scriptures. Even devils quote Scriptures and one need deprive them of the right of doing But they twist and torture the Scriptures make them mean a thing which they do and cannot mean. This class of thinkers not wanting among the Mahomedans and Ch tians. Nay, they go a degree a-head of their Hindu compeers, and maintain that God can neither have a form, nor can He assume any. They thus put limitation upon the Unlimited, and deny a certain power to the Almighty. God, is what He is, and not what we want Him to be. We cannot give Him a form, if He has it not, and we cannot deny Him one if He have it.

Now let us see what the Scriptures have to say. We shall take up the Bible first. What does Christ say about the form of God? His teachings disclose a definite form of God. In his conference with Nicodemus he said "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God". Being asked what he meant by man being born again, he said "Except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." What part of a man is then born of the flesh, and what part of the Spirit? Obviously our body is born of the flesh and is flesh, and our soul is born of the Spirit and is spirit. Spirit has the right to see Spirit and feel Him; and so long as the man does not return to the Spirit, he must remain blind to the splendours of the Kingdom of God. This returning to the spirit to the spiritual realm has been called the second birth by Christ. This is exactly what we also say. Our Scriptures reveal that man is an infinitessimally small fraction of the Supreme Spirit encaged in a physical body. So long as the man whose real nature is pure spiritual goes on identifying himself with his physical body, he is evidently ignorant of his true self, and consequently of God, his Father. But as soon as he realises his self, he realises God, and he is then said to be born again. This does not, however, mean that a man, after this spiritual birth, ceases to live in the body and take cognisance of things of this phenomenal world. He may live in this body, and may take cognisance of earthly things. His physical senses now being completly subject to his spiritual ones although he happens to live in the body and perceive things of the earth he neither lives nor perceives in the way he did formerly. His spiritual or angelic life begins even while he walks in this material plane, and his physical death does not in any way, affect the continuity of his actual life. He is an angel on the earth while he lives, and is the same angel in Vaikuntha after he ceases to live in the body. These angels are separate souls and have definite spiritual forms to distinguish one from another, and all from God, their Lord in Heaven. A definite spiritual form likewise, belongs to God. Had there been no specific form of God, His fractional parts could have no existence distinguishable from His, in which case the idea of differentiation of the Sipirit as the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost and the host of angels would have been absolutely meaningless. So these denizens of heaven must have each his own definite spiritual form. The only difference between the forms of these heaven-born and these of the earth-born is that while the external forms of the latter are material and transitory, those of the former are purely spiritual and eternal.

But what about the forms visible to us of those Pure Spirits that appear on the earth?—Do they retain their own spiritual forms, or put on transitory forms of flesh and blood like the earth-born? Certainly not the latter. In the same conference Christ said to Nicodemus "If I have told you earthly things, and you believe not, how shall you believe, if I tell you of heavenly things? And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." Here Christ makes reference to his own self saying that he existed in heaven as the Son of man, and that as the Son of God he had not a different form from what he has now as the Son of David. In one and the same form he exists in the heaven as well as on the earth.

In one place of the Bible it has been written that when the people talked of Christ as the Son of David, Christ said, "How then doth David in spirit call him Lord saying,—The Lord said unto my Lord (Christ), sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy foot stool" ?—St. Matthew. In fact he, being of heaven-born, cannot be born of flesh as the son of this man and that woman. To designate him as the son of such and such a man is to ignore his heavenly nature that suffers neither deflection nor suppression on account of his working on a material plane. He was unearthly throughout even when he appeard earthly. He looked earthly to those who did not develop spiritual eyes to witness the spirit. Once Christ went to Jerusalem where the Jews said to him "What sign showest thou unto us, seeing that thou doest these things ?" To this Christ answered saying. "Destroy this temple (his own body), and in three days I will raise it up." Accordingly on the third day Jesus rose from the dead, and appeared before Magdalene who was weeping when she could not find his body in the sepulchre. He likewise appeared before his eleven apostles. Thomas having been absent. When informed, Thomas doubted their report, and said that he would not believe unless he felt him. One day when all the twelve disciples assembled to confer in a house with doors shut, Christ stood in the midst of them and said to Thomas "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands ; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side ; and be not faithless, but believing" ; when Thomas felt him and believed. Jesus said to him, "Thomas because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed ; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet believed." One thing that needs mentioning here is that the disciples of Christ were not to be much credited with this vision of Christ. It is only by believing and doing the will of God under the direction of the Prophet or the Guru that a disciple can develop spiritual eyes by which not Christ alone but God with all the splendours of heaven are seen. Not endowed with such eyes the body of Christ was to them still material, and they were, after they had seen him the same as they had been before they saw him. They saw him and believed him,—that is all, and, nothing more. But one thing that concerns us the most is that his disciples saw him, felt him and recognised him. He was evidently recognised by the same form in which he had been known to them while living. Now if his form after his death exactly resembles his form before it, if his form before his birth is the same as that after it, then it must be supposed that he was neither born nor dead. He was one thing throughout, unaffected by so called birth and death. He is eternal and changeless. This is the nature of every heaven-born. Birth and death that affect the material form of an ordinary mortal cannot reach him. He is capa-pie immaterial : he is spirit, body and soul. That he appears to us to be born and to die, is due to the defect of matter, through which we see him, and, which cannot present things to us without giving them its own colour. One way it is however greatly advantageous to us, the bound jivas. It is by appearing as a man that a divine teacher can infuse into the heart of his followers a noble zeal to love God, which, in the full, characterises his own. His followers, attracted by his wonderful human career at once be-take themselves to his practices, and endeavour to emulate them in their own lives. Without this co-operation, on the basis of equality, the mission of divine messenger is foredoomed to failure. Unable to gauge his own spiritual depth, a mortal is sure to look upon the spiritual endeavours of a divine entity as wholly impracticable for him. He may altogether give up the pursuit as a hopeless job.

The earth-born have, like-wise, angelic forms in the kingdom of heaven, though these forms are at present actually covered up with flesh and blood. Hence Christ advised his disciples not to offend the people who believe in him saying "Despise not one of these little ones ; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven"—St. Matthew.

Koran, that acknowledges Isa or Christ as one of the Nabis, must necessarily agree with the teachings of the Bible. Muhammad, on the day of his meraj or ascension, told his disciples that all, that do the will of God expressed through the mouth of His prophet, will see Him. At the close of his earthly career he at once went to Behest without having to wait, along with these of flesh and blood, till the day of judgment. On the day of judgment Muhammad will have to plead before God for those who blieved in him. Muhammad, then, like Christ is a distinct heavenly entity, and has a definite form to distinguish him from God That sent him. Nay, the host of 'ferestas' that reside in Behest must have each a form to distinguish one from another, and all from God.

Now the question is—What does the form of God resemble ? Does it resemble that of a man ? Yes it does. "God has created man after His own image says the Bible, God's form then must be accepted as the prototype of the human form. In fact He can assume any form He likes. But the human form is His own real form.

If this our interpretation of the Christian and the Mahomedan scriptures is correct,—in fact it cannot be otherwise—then the followers of these religions cannot have any quarrel with their Hindu brothers when the latter conceive a a form of God. If the former glorify God for His sending His Son and a prophet to proclaim Him in this world, the latter glorify Him for His own manifestation. God's manifestation in His own form is equally reasonable. If it is possible for the Son to come down into this world, it is still more possible for his Father to do so. If it is possible for the prophet to be visible to us, it is still more possible for God That sends him to be so. His manifestation is necessary when His devotees want to see Him and love Him—a boon which it is not in the power of His Son or of the prophet to confer.

People are very often heard to say that God cannot be visible to mortal eyes. These people at once forget that He is all-powerful. To say He can do this and not that, is to put His power under a certain limitations. Certainly God, thus reduced to the position of a constitutional monarch, will not be very proud of exercising these powers that the members of His constitution are pleased to empower Him with. Such a conception of God is merely a mockery of Him. The people of this mentality do not deify Him but defy Him. Their homage, their offerings, their prayers are all directed to Him only to make Him pander to their tastes. Worship of such a God manufactured in one's own factory can hardly work out one's salvation.

God can make Himself visible to us ; He does manifest Himself. He did and, will again and again appear in world. Our Lord Krishna is God who manifested Himself in this world. He is the Supreme Lord. There are none equal to Him and there are none superior to Him. Him all our Sastras directly or indirectly refer to. Him Christ calls Father and Muhammad calls Allah. If they saw God, they saw Krishna, and if they heard God, they heard Krishna. If they did not describe Him, it was because the people, to whom they preached, were not in a stage of spiritual evolution to understand the subtle philosophy of such preaching. Preaching of a form would have been to these people an addition to the number of idols, already existing, at least, in their mind, and their mission would have been then a complete failure. Again descriptions are always defective. They are more so, when transcendental things become their subjects. This defect is due to the fact that human language is ever imperfect and material and hence cannot act as a medium of expression for spiritual things. Thus any attempt to interpret God in human language is to give Him human colour, is to bring the Unlimited under limitation. This is the danger of description. It becomes still more dangerous when people attempt to understand Him in the measure of the language employed to describe Him. It is therefore found in Scripture that a description of God is invariably concluded with an apology, that He pardons the humble describer for his inordinate attempt to describe Him Who is indescribable. Sri Gaur Sundar has repeatedly warned His disciples against the danger, and, exhorted them not to study Scripture without the assistance of the Guru, Who only knows the meaning of Scripture, and, can enlighten His disciple on It. It is the duty of every man, that wants to knock at the door of heaven, to find out such a man first who, having in his possession the key, can open it and admit him into the kingdom of heaven. This is the way, and the only way out of the danger, Christ and Muhammad avoided the danger by not describing Him at all. And they, whose mission was to inculcate into the heart of their disciples a belief in one God,—merely a belief and nothing more, could do without a description of Him. But the Hindu Sages or the Mahajans, whose mission was to enkindle in the mind of their followers a fire of passionate love for God, could not avoid describing Him. The mind of such people, who are bent on loving Him, caressing Him and serving Him, could not have been captivated by anything short of the most beautiful, ever-smiling ever-young Krishna with a flute in His hand. While the followers of the teachers of Arabia and Palestine are required to prostrate before God at a respectable distance, and beg Him to be merciful to forgive their sins ; those of the Hindu Sages are required to run to Him to embrace Him, to kiss Him, and, to curse their own lot that hitherto kept them away from their Beloved. These minds then necessitate His description which encourages them, allures them and, in the long run, satisfies them. Revelation is made in just proportion to the spiritual fitness of the people or it is sure to produce, in their mind, a degree of spiritual languor that will soon drive them into the fold of atheists. This is the only reason for the differences between two scriptures. God knows how to deal with us, and whatever He does He does for our spiritual welfare. Going to understand His ways in our own light, we sometimes find fault with these, and sometimes our faith so degenerates into rank bigotry that it renders our heart impervious to education, and reduces it to a breeding ground of the spirit of intolerance to the faiths and customs of other people. Lord Krishna is not the creation of any body but He is the creator of all. All the wild vituperations, that we direct against Him, while they do not bring about any change in His eternal nature, bring us to woe all the more for these. "God reveals Himself as Krishna" says our Scripture. Krishna calls Himself God, and shows Himself as such. He was Krishna before He appeared on the Earth, He is Krishna in His visible earthly manifestation, and He will be Krishna after He ceased to be visible. Manifestation does not bring Him under limitation. His mundane existence is but a part of His one continuous, eternal existence. Or in, other words time, space and causality are in Him and not above Him. He is above all and beyond all : He is End-All and Be-All. He is the Eternal Truth : He is the Absolute Truth.

In Brahmasanghita He has been described as the Supreme Lord having an Aprakrita or transcendental form made up of Sat, Chit and Ananda.

ईश्वरः परमः कृष्ण सच्चिदानन्दविग्रहः ।
अनादिरादि गोविन्दः सर्व्व-कारण-कारणम् ॥

About the reason of His being manifested it has been stated in Srimat Bhagabat that when His devotees such as Vasudev and others are oppressed by Asuras like Kansa and others, He, the Lord of the physical and spiritual worlds, although birthless, out of mercy, becomes manifest, in the same manner as fire manifests from wood.

स्वशान्तरूपेष्वितरैः स्वरूपै- रभ्यर्द्यमानेष्वनुकम्पितात्मा ।
परावरेशो महदंशयुक्तो
ह्यजोऽपि जातो भगवान् यथाग्निः ॥

This however does not mean, as some people understand, that He was at first formless and now has assumed this form which is as material and transitory as theirs. In the Geeta Krishna cautions Arjuna not to entertain such an idea. He tells him, "the people who think that I am in reality impersonal and formless, but have, for some purpose, manifested Myself in this, forms are fools. They do not know that I am, in this form, ever unchangeable and the most excellent."

अव्यक्तं व्यक्तिमापन्नं मन्यन्ते मामबुद्धयः ।
परं भावमजानन्तो ममाव्ययमनुत्तमम् ॥ गीता

One may reasonably ask, if Krishna, in that form, is ever existent, then why it is that we do not see "Him always. To this Krishna replies saying, I am, in this form, ever existent and ever visible. But I have a power called Yogamaya which so blindfolds the eyes of the ordinary mortal that I do not become visible to them, and hence the latter cannot know that I am, in this form, birthless and eternal."

नाहं प्रकाशः सर्व्वस्य योगमाया समावृतः ।
मूढ़ोऽयं नाभिजानाति लोकोमामजमव्ययम् ॥ गीता

It may be illustrated by a clouded sun. The sun is ever there in the sky. It is made invisible by a patch of cloud coming between it and ourselves. We must not however understand that the cloud has hid the sun. In fact it is not possible for a small patch of cloud to cover so huge a thing as the sun. The cloud has covered our eyes and thereby made the sun invisible to us. This cloud is the Maya. Remove the cloud and there is the sun. In the same way overcome the Maya and there you see Krishna ever existing. How to overcome this Maya? Krishna says, "My Maya is imbued with the properties of matter, and it is very difficult to overcome her. It is only those who take shelter in Me that are set free by Maya."

दैवी ह्येषा गुणमयी मम माया दुरत्यया ।
मामेव ये प्रपद्यन्ते मायामेतां तरन्ति ते ॥ गीता

People, labouring under the influence of this Maya, think, Krishna is a man; and can He be God? Krishna tells Arjuna "These people are awfully ignorant. They do not know that I have the power to manifest My form in this physical world as well, and that I am, in this form, the Lord of all My created beings."

अवजानन्ति मां मूढ़ा मानुषीं तनुमाश्रितम् ।
परम्भावमजानन्तो ममभुतमहेश्वरम् ॥ गीता

In Geeta when Arjuna wants to see Krishna in His divine glory, Krishna tells him that he will not see Him with his present eyes. He will give him spiritual eyes, wherewith he will see Him and understand Him.

न तु मां शक्यसे द्रष्टुमनेनैव स्वचक्षुषा ।
दिव्यं ददामि ते चक्षुः पश्य मे योगमैश्वरम् ॥ गीता

Endowed with spiritual vision Arjuna saw in Krishna first Rudrarupa, then Viswarupa, next, Chaturbhuja Narayanarupa, and last of all, Krishnarupa which has been called by Him, His own Rupa. Appearing before him again in Kriishnarupa, He tells Arjuna, Even the Devas, O, Arjuna always long to see My this beautiful form which you see now.

इत्यर्जुनं वासुदेवस्तथोक्त्वा
स्वकं रूपं दर्शयामास भूयः ।
आश्वासयामास च भीतमेनं
भूत्वा पुनः सौम्यवपुर्महात्मा ॥

सुदर्शनमिदं रूपं दृष्टवानसि यन्मम ।
देवा अप्यस्य रूपस्य नित्यं दर्शन काङ्क्षिणः ॥ गीता

Now the Question is, did not Arjuna see this form before? Yes he did. Not he alone, even His worst enemies like Kansa and Jarasanda saw Him in that very form. If so, then what makes Him say that even the Devas long to see Him in this form but do not see. The reason, as has been advanced before, is the same here also. To the material eyes of Arjuna and all He appeared as one of flesh and blood. But now endowed as he is with spiritual eyes, Krishna appears to him as one of heaven.

Among the educated mass there is a class of people who think that God, when He appears in flesh and blood is also subject to the influence of matter, and shares the frailties of the mortal. Srimat Bhagabat tells them, Godliness of God lies in the fact that He, although manifested in matter, is not however influenced by it.

एतदीशनमीशस्य प्रकृतिस्थोऽपि तद्गुणैः ।
न युज्यते * * * * * * ॥

About the birth and death of Krishna Srimat Bhagabat says, "They, like the tricks of a magician, play deception upon the mortal."

राजन परस्य तनुभृज्जननाप्ययेहा
मायाविड़म्बनमवेहि यथा नटस्य । भाः

Skandapurana says, "By death of Hari His leaving of this world is meant. He is Eternal Bliss; His death means nothing else. His form is transcendental and is made up of Chit and hence cannot be subject to death. But that He dies is nothing but a trick, which, He, like a magician, plays for the deception of the ordinary mortals."

Sri Gaur Sundar, in a controversy with the Mayabadi Sanyasins who do not allow Brahma to have any form, says Krishna has a form made up of Sat, Chit and Ananda. The people who do not believe this, and think that His body, as manifested in this world, is material, a handwork of Satwaguna, are heretic, and are, therefore, ever subject to death.

There are innumerable statements of the like in our Scriptures to which reference may be made on the subject. They are one in declaring Krishna as Parabrahma. Brahma is idea and Krishna its expression : it is not that. The people, who think so, are wrong, terribly wrong. He is Brahma, and albeit Brahma, nothing but Brahma, and nothing short of Him. Him Upanishads call Brahma, Yogins call Paramatma, and Bhaktas call Bhagaban. He is one, but appears in three aspects to three classes of His devotees. Sadhus, who have realised Him, corroborate the scriptural evidence, and accept Him as the Supreme Lord, and make obeisance before Him.

Krishna, as has been said above, is cap-a-pie God. The body of Krishna and Krishna are one and the same thing. The distinction between the body and the soul, as obtains in us, does not exist in Him. He has nothing to die, but every thing to live, when He left this world, He left it body and soul. Sri Gaur Sundar, likewise, left nothing behind Him, when He left this world. Like God His angles have forms which are like His eternal and ever celestial. They cannot be thought of without these forms ; and when they come to this world they do so with their forms. A rigid adherence to formworship then does not constitute any fault on the part of its votaries. On the contrary, those, who are angry to be called a form-worshipper, are all the more unhappy for their belief that is neither warranted by Scriptures nor corroborated by other sages. They will reap as they sow. If they deny God any form, God to them will remain formless. They will not see Him. And it is not very encouraging for a servant who wants to serve his master but cannot see him.

As regards image-worship, one may do it and may not do it. It makes no difference. Forms of worship are merely means whereby to develop our spiritual eyes, and that is all. They are never the ends themselves. To the spiritual eyes, if developed, the image will have no significance as matter, but will be transformed into God. And before the development of such eyes, obeisance to God in the form of Krishna or to Christ in the form of Son of man means the samething as obeisance to God in the form of an image. For did not Kansa see Krishna, and yet wanted to kill Him ? Did not Caiaphas see Christ, and yet charged him as a heretic ? When different religious methods are judged on their own merit, then it may be that one method is found more efficient than another. But when they are judged in reference to the people for whom they are prescribed, then such comparison is inadmissible. For then they will be found equally efficient. As for instance, food nourishes our system, nourishment is the end for which food is taken ; and so long as it fulfils this end it is considered the best. But there is a great difference between the stuff that is given to an adult and the stuff that is given to a child. Now if both are served with the same stuff, then what will be the result ? Why, they both will not have nourishment. Like our systems our minds also differ, and hence need differential treatment. A method, which is suitable to the mentality of one class of people, may not be so to that of another. Let every body love his own method with all his heart ; let him stand by it at all costs ; but let him, at the same time, have a soft corner in his heart for the method of another. He may not find any interest in it ; but that is no reason why he should curse it.

Of nine kinds of Bhakti mentioned in Srimat Bhagabat Sri Gour Sundar has laid much stress the incessant muttering of the Name of Krishna as the best and most suitable form of devotion in Kaliyuga. He has however retained His Image-worship for those who have a predilection for it. But while He recommends this He warns the votaries not to think the Images they worship as made of stone, clay etc. It is the guru or the spiritual guide who prescribes a form of worship for his disciples. Disciples, on no account, should prescribe for themselves. If they do so, they follow not the soul but the whims of their own mind, and by so doing they do not attain God, but ever recede from Him. Heavenly light is not possible for him who becomes his own guide instead of offering himself to be guided by the guru who knows the way that leads to God. Hence in Koran we find that one, who does not select such a guide, is certainly guided by Satan. Those, who think that gurus are like them, mortal, and are therefore reluctant to accept them as guide, are sure to think the images they worship as made of stone or clay.

वैष्णवे जातिबुद्धिर्यस्य नारकी सः । भागवत

Image-worship is most appealing to people in general: For do we not erect statues of men and demonstrate our love and honour for them by garlanding the statues ? We cannot remain satisfied with merely entertaining in the mind a good-will towards them ; but we want to do something with our body also. This necessitates image-worship. Devotees are sure to be indifferent, if they do not find something before them to think of or to do with.

Again it is easy to denounce image-worship, but difficult to get away from it. In Hindu Scriptures mention is made of eight kinds of images, one being the image constructed by mind (मनोमयि मूर्त्ति), one who has not the courage to bow before an image of earth, does so before an image of mind. For no conception is possible without an image. And an image of mind is as material as the image of earth. So long as we do not return to our soul, there is no escape from our conceptions being material; and till then our meditation on the spiritual form of God is impossible. Hence we are all image-worshippers. If we do not confess it, it is because we want to conceal our hearts or to taunt others who have the courage to do so.

There is however as mentioned above, a sect of people among the Hindus that do practise idolatry. This class is known as Mayavadin. It has other designations such as the Jnanin, the Vedantin etc. It is analogous to the class of thinkers among the Mahamedans called Sufi. According to them Brahma is indistinguishable, having no form and no personality. There is no personality. There is no reality besides It. Jivas are not many, but one, and that is Brahma. That you see many is due to the fact that you are under the influence of Maya or illusion. Get away from the illusion and you will see that you are Brahma and nothing but It. Evidently Bhakti, according to them, cannot have any locus standi. Still for the people, who cannot grasp the idea and make it a matter of realisation, they prescribe worship of five gods namely, the Sun, Ganapati, Siva, Sakti and Vishnu. This worship is known as Panchopasana or the worship of five gods. They say that the worship of any one of these gods will purify the heart of the devotee, and help him to realise oneness with Brahma. He will now out-grow the necessity of any worship. For when he becomes himself transformed into the object of his worship, who will now worship whom? They do not acknowledge God, His devotee and his function, devotion, as eternal. This, is sheer idolatry and nothing but idolatry,—idolatry in spirit and idolatry in form. If there be no God, why do you create one and demonstrate yourself a great devotee of Him? What benefit is likely to accrue from such a self-deception? Your God, devotee and devotion are all your handi-work and are therefore material; and, as such, they are not expected to obtain salvation for you. On the contrary you will have to sufficiently thank your stars, if they have not already managed to lighten the grip of materialism on you the more. We much always remember that our mind is ever material and ever creative. This mind should in no case, be allowed to have an opportunity to unduly interfere with and vitiate the programme of religious activities that our Teachers, in unison with our Scriptures, have, through overwhelming mercy, prescribed for us. The path, whereby they want to lead us, is not an untrodden one. Many have gone by this way before us, and have attained their object. There is no room for discovery of a new one. We must do well to go by the old one. The words of our Teachers are our safe guards, and their experiences our security. We must keep the barks of our life steady along this path, a slight deflection wherefrom is sure to lead them into the dangerous clutches of the octopus-mind which is the mother of idolatry.

BY holding before the town of Nadia, the home of countless high-born Brahmans, the ideals of the preaching of the holy Name of God by Thakur Haridas born in a Muhammadan family and of the deliverance of Jagai and Madhai by Nityananda Mahaprabhu made it clear that the Vaishnava Acharyya (teacher of the religion that he practises) is not to be judged by his family or caste but is a supermundane being who is the teacher of the whole world and that there is forgiveness for all other offences but that God Himself does not pardon the offence that is committed against a Vaishnava. Nityananda Prabhu and Sri Gaur Sundar are only kind to one who is free from offence against the Vaishnavas.

Mahaprabhu now began to perform the kirtan in the company of His associates and followers every night without a break in Sribash Pandit's house with closed doors. Un-Godly persons failing to obtain the privilege of admission into these devotional gatherings tried in various ways to humiliate Sribash Pandit. A certain person of the name of 'Gopal Chapal', mis-called Brahman, once deposit opposit the closed entrance of the house of Sribash Pandit articles used in the worship of the Devi including liquor-pots. He was smitten with virulent leprosy for this offence against the Vaishnavas. In the agony of his un-hearable sufferings 'Gopal Chapal' approached Mahaprabhu and piteously implored His forgiveness. But considering the gravity of his offence Mahaprabhu did not pardon him at that time. But when after His sannyas Mahaprabhu was staying at Kulia on His return from Puri Gopal Chapal again sought His protection. This time Mahaprabhu advised him to seek the favour of Sribash Pandit. By the grace of Sribash 'Gopal Chapal' was absolved from his offence.

Mahaprabhu also established the ideal of performing the kirtan of Hari in the company of Godly persons who alone are fit to join in such function. One night Mahaprabhu with His devotees began the sankirtan in Sribash's house having had the gates closed and forbidden the admission of unfit persons. The mother-in-law of Sribash happened to be in hiding inside the house. Mahaprabhu as knower of all hearts was aware of this and complained that He felt obstructed in proceeding with the kirtan with sufficient zeal. Sribash Pandit judged by this that some atheist must have found his way into the house and hidden himself somewhere. He accordingly at once began an elaborate search and detected his own mother-in-law stowed away in a corner. Sribash Pandit directed her to be dragged out by the hair.

On another occassion when it happened to be a full-moon night Nityananda prepared for the worship of Vyasadeva by command of Mahaprabhu. Sribash become the Acharyya at this worship. As Sri Nityananda Prabhu in the act of chanting the kirtan placed garlands of flowers round the neck of Mahaprabhu Sri Gour Sundar manifested to him His six-armed Form.

In this manner Mahaprabhu continued to display various manifestations of His Divine Power. Sri Pundarik Vidyanidhi, the foremost among the Paramahansa Vaishnavas, who was an inhabitant of Chattagram joined Mahaprabhu at Nabadwip at this time. One day Mahaprabhu seated Himself on the couch of Vishnu in the house of Sribash and manifested His Divine Power in a most wonderful way. This marvellous mood tasted for seven praharas (twenty one hours) and is known as 'the mood of the seven praharas' and also as the great Manifestation.' It was during the continuance of this mood that Mahaprabhu bestowed the name of the happy' (sukhi) in place of her old name 'the unhappy' (dukhi) on a maid servant of Sribash who used to fetch water for Him. He also declared the greatness of Sridhar. The Lord showered His favours on Haridas. Sri Mukunda was staying outside all this time. After the Lord had bestowed His favour on all the devotees singly He was informed that Mukunda was outside. The Lord thereupon said, 'I will not be soon propitiated towards Mukunda. He speaks the language of pure devotion to the devotees. But when he is with the mayavadins (illusionists) he professes the doctrine of maya as, expounded in the Yoga-Vashistha. On Mukunda intimating his firm resolve to give up all association with the illusionists thenceforward the Lord commanded him immediately to His presence and expressed His satisfaction at his conduct. By this act of his the Lord made it known that the so-called latitudinarians or liberals who are disposed to tolerate all opinions have no chance of obtaining the grace of God until they exclusively practise pure devotion with a firm faith which is free from the least taint of any predilections for any other opinions e.g. empricism, utilitarianism etc. by discarding all evil association.

Sri Advaitacharyya was the co-disciple of Sri Isvarapuri who appears in the role of the Guru of Sree Chaitanyadeva the Supreme Guru of the whole world. For this reason the Supreme Lord shewed Sree Advaitacharyya all the respect that is due to the Spiritual Preceptor. Sri Advaitacharyya was surely grieved at this. He repaired to Santipur and there began to expound the excellence of the path of empiric knowledge to certain ill-fated people who deserved to be so deceived with the deliberate object of provoking the Supreme grace of the Lord's chastisement. Mahaprabhu on hearing of what Advaita was doing was filled with great indignation. He at once made His way to Santipur and administered with His own hands a severe cudgelling to Sri Advaita Prabhu. While he was being thus thrashed Sri Advaita Prabhu danced with joy crying, 'Today the wish of my heart is fulfilled.'

One day as the Supreme Lord expatiated on the glories of the Holy Name of His followers declaring that there was nothing equal or superior to It a certain luck-less student happened to protest saying that the glories of the Name that had been declared by the Lord could not be true but were mere eulogy. The Lord forbade His devotees to see the face of that student who thus offended against the Name and attired as He was forthwith made His way to the Ganges and bathed in its water with all His associates to be absolved of the sin of having listened to such blasphemy.

One day the Lord appeared to be fatigued by His exertions at a processional kirtan which He was leading along the streets. Arrived in the court-yard of one of His devotees the Lord sowed into the ground the stone of the mango fruit and immediately it grew into a great branching tree with ripe fruitage. A great mango festivity was thereupon celebrated with those fruits. That spot is famous to this day and still bears the name of 'Amhatta' (Amghata) 'the mango fair.'

Another day as the Lord was performing samkirtan at a place that was at some distance from human habitation the sky was overcast with clouds. The Lord commanded the clouds to depart whereupon they immediately disappeared. For this reason the people used to call that sandy bank of the Ganges 'the sand-bank of the clouds.' On a certain day the Lord, imbued with the dispositiou of Baladeva manifesting the lila of drawing of the Jamuna, with a loud voice ordered for wine. On this occasion Chandrasekhar Acharyya, Banamali Acharyya and certain other devotees behold in the hand of the Lord the golden club.

When the Lord began to preach the Name He commanded those who lived in the neighbourhood of the court-yard of Sribash to chant the Name of Hari with clap of hand. By degrees the samkirtan was proclaimed at the door of every house of Nabadwip with the music of mridanga, cymbal and other instruments. Hinduism had been greatly in abeyance at Nabadwip ever since its occupation by Bakhtiyar Khilji. It was the same in the time of Mahaprabhu under the regime of its military governor, Chand Kazi. In fact the Hindus of Nabadwip did not venture to utter the Name of God for fear of the Muhammadans. But now by command of the Supreme Lord the kirtan of the Name of Hari began to be chanted in a loud key to the accompaniment of mridanga and cymbal in every house of Nabadwip. Hearing of this Chand Kazi proceeded to the house of one of the townspeople who lived close to the court-yard of Sribash at Sri Mayapur and as he was guilty of chanting the kirtan broke his mridanga and proclaimed his resolve to punish with great severity and with loss of caste any resident of the town who chanted kirtan in the manner taught by Sri Gaur Sundar. The spot where Chand Kazi broke the 'khol' of the citizen became famous from that time and came to be called by the name of 'khol bhangar danga' the mound where the khol was broken and still maintains it sold name. (To be continued.)

Taking Refuge in God (श्रीशरणागति)

1. I do not know by what power impelled
Thy abode I seek for refuge
Full of mercy, Purifier of sinners,
Thou art ever bent on the deliverance of the fallen.

2. My only hope, O Lord, is this
That Thou surely art kind,
There is not another who needs Thy mercy more than myself,
Thou wilt surely drive away all my fear.

3. No one in all the world
Has the power to deliver me
Cherished Lord, full of mercy, by Thy declaration
Save the basest of sinners.

4. Having considered everything I have thus come To Thy feet, O Lord.
I am ever the servant and thou the Maintainer
Thou, Lord of the world, art my Protector.

5. I am but servant, all is Thine ;
Me Thou wilt deliver,
I take hold of Thy feet
I, indeed, am not mine.

6. Bhaktivinode has taken refuge
At Thy feet crying.
To forgive offence, imbue with love for Thy Name,
And to maintain him, belong to Thee.

[XVIII]

1. For the maintenance of wife, son, body, kin.
I was ever anxious in my mind.—

2. And how to earn money, win fame,
Accomplish the marriage of son and daughter.

3. By self-surrender there is no more anxiety now,
Thou, Lord, wilt provide for the maintenance of Thy household.

4. Thou wilt surely maintain me recognising me as Thy own servant.
I fell the greatest joy serving Thee, O Lord.

5. All things happen by Thy will, O Lord.
The Jiva says 'I am the actor,' it is not true,

6. Can the Jiva do anything unless Thou doest ?
The Jiva can only hope for such is Thy will.

7. I will serve Thee relieved of all anxiety,
I am not responsible for any good or evil in the house-hold.

8. Bhakti-vinode giving up his own freedom
Without desiring any other thing serves only Thy feet.

Sree Sree Chaitanya Bhagabat

CHAPTER VII

Summary :—In this chapter are described the sannyas of Biswarup, in the mood of Dattatreya the Lord, seated on the pile of refused cooking pots, teaching the truth to His mother and other matters.

Sri Gaur Gopal was an exceedingly restless Boy. He could not be controlled by any one except His elder brother, Biswarup. From his birth Biswarup was unattached to the world. He was always engaged in expounding devotion to Krishna as being the sum and substance of all the Scriptures. He was aware that his younger brother was the infant Gopal Himself but he did not disclose this to any one. Finding the whole world, including the so-called teachers of the Scriptures, void of devotion to Krishna, Biswarup felt it intolerable to live in such society. He accordingly made up his mind to renounce the world to avoid the sight of the faces of such people.

Biswarup rose from his bed early in the morning, bathed and came immediately to the gathering of the Vaishnavas at Advaita's house and stayed there the whole day. Every day at meal-time Sachi Devi sent Nimai to the house of Advaita to fetch His brother. The devotees gathered at Advaita's were fascinated by the extraordinary beauty of Sri Gaursunder. Biswarup carried out his resolve of quitting the world when he learnt that his parents were making active preparations for his marriage. As a sannyasin he became known under the name of Sri Sankararanya.

Sachi and Jagannath full of the purest affection for this child felt this as a great shock and Gaursundar exhibited the lila of fainting at this separation from His pure devotee. Advaita and the other devotees were profoundly affected at losing the company of this servant of the Lord Advaita comforted his companions by assuring them that Krishna Himself would become manifest in a short time and associating with them perform deeds superior to anything witnessed by the greatest devotees such as Suka, Prahlad etc.

Nimai gave up His waywardness and became very attentive in His studies. Jagannath Misra was alarmed and became afraid that Nimai would also leave the world if He came to realize by studying the Scriptures as Biswarup had done that devotion to Krishna is the one thing needful. He took counsels with His wife and altogether stopped the studies of the Boy. This led to a recrudescence of the wayward habits of Nimai till on a certain day He seated Himself on a pile of used up cooking pots refusing to come away from there in spite of the pleadings of Sachi Devi to the effect that the pots were unclean, till He was assured that His parents would allow Him to resume His studies. Misra was persuaded by the expostulations of his wife and friends at last to lift the ban on study and the Boy gladly returned to school.

1. All glory to Gaur-chandra, the Ruler of all the great gods,
All glory to the brother-hood of devotees loved of Biswambhar.

2 Glory to the Son of Jagannath and Sachi,
the life of all.
May the Lord deliver all jivas by His kindly glance.

3 In this manner at Nabadwip
Sri Gaursundar
Freely manifested Himself in the guise of childish acts.

4 Constantly on all persons He plays all manner of boyish pranks.
And does not stop even though He is sedulously schooled by the mother to behave properly.

5 If He is asked to be quiet He becomes doubly turbulent
And even breaks to pieces everything that
He finds in the house.

6 For very fear the parents say nothing ;
and with utmost glee
He plays as He likes, displaying unchecked
His Divine activity.

7 The story of the First Part is like the flow of nectar
In which Narayana plays in the form of a child.

8 The Lord no longer fears anyone, neither father nor mother,
Restraining Himself only when He sees
His elder brother,

9 The Divine Biswarup, who was born before the Lord,
From birth wholly un-attached to the world and possessed of all good qualities,

10 Biswarup expounds devotion to Vishnu as the meaning of all the Scriptures
There is no one who can refute His interpretation.

11 By ear, mouth, mind and all other senses
He neither hears nor says anything else save devotion to Krishna.

12 Noticing the peculiar ways of his younger Brother
Being amazed Biswarup thus muses within his mind.

13 'This Boy is never an ordinary Child,
He resembles the Divine Cow-Boy in His beauty and behaviour ;

14 'Performs unceasnigly all manner of super-human deeds.
Me thinks it is Krishna Himself who sports in the frame of the Child.'

15 Thus muses the high-souled Biswarup,
And goes his way never breaking the truth to anyone.

16 He passes all his time in the company of all the Vaisnavas,
In the pleasure of Krishna-talk, Krishna—devotion and Krishna-worship.

17 The world is mad with the taste of wealth, sons and learning,
All laugh at the Vaisnavas if they happen
but to see them.

18 Seeing the Vaishnavas they derisively shout doggerel verses at them—
'The mendicant, chaste woman, ascetic all go the way of the world.

19 'We call him the doer of good deeds who rides the horse or is carried in dola on the shoulders of men, Waited upon by ten or twenty lackeys who run before and after.

20 'Much as thy reverence criest in the fit of devotion.
Yet hast thou obtained no respite from the sorrows of penury.

21 'Thou call'st incessantly and with a loud voice on the Name of Hari—
The Lord is angered being addressed by shouts.'

22 Thus say those who are without devotion for Krishna ;
Hearing this the Bhagabatas are filled with grief.

23 Nowhere may anyone hear the Kirtan of Hari.
They find the whole world at all time
a blighted waste.

24 The Divine Biswarup is much afflicted
with grief.
No discourse of his cherished Krishna-
Chandra ever reaches his ears.

25 There are those who teach the Geeta and the Bhagabat.
But on the tongue of no one appears any exposition of devotion to Krishna.

26 All the professors are doomed being given to repeating mere perversities.
The world is unaware of the very name of devotion.

27 All the devotees lead by Advaita Acharyya
Lament the evil tendency of jivas.

28 In grief the revered Biswarup thinks within himself
'I will not see the face of any man, but go into the forest.'

29 Taking his bath in the Ganges at break of day,
Biswarup daily presents himself at the gathering at Advaita's house,

30 Expounds devotion to Krishna as the meaning of all Scriptures
Hearing this Advaita joyously exclaims with a thundering voice, 31 And, suddenly breaking off in the midst of his worship, holds Biswarup to his bosom.

All Vaishnavas repeat the Name of Hari with joy.

32 The devotees roar like lions in the fulness of Krishna—
Grief manifests itself no longer in the—bliss mind of any one.

33 No one goes back home leaving Biswarup—
Biswarup does not come to his own house.

34 After cooking the meal Sachi says to Biswambhar, 'Go and bring away your elder without delay,'

35 The Lord comes to Advaita's gathering by command of His mother Ostensively to take home His elder brother.

36 On His arrival the Lord beholds the assembled Vaishnavas Engaged in mutual discourse of the blessed story of Krishna.

37 Hearing this praise of Himself Sri Gaur-sundar
Bends on them all His auspicious glance that steals the mind.

38 His every limb displays the limit of matchless beauty.
Crores of moons have not the splendour of His single finger-nail.

39 His whole body is nude and gray with dust.
With a smile He speaks to His brother—

40 'Come for your meal, brother, mother calls'—
And taking hold of His brother's cloth walks off.

41 Beholding that fascinating beauty all the devotees
Regard Him with a fixed gaze ceasing all activity.

42 Those devotees being almost in the state of trance
The talk of Krishna does not come to the mouth of any.

43 The trance of His devotees at the sight of the Lord is natural,
The Lord steals away the heart of His devotees although they do not recognise Him.

44 That the Lord also steals the hearts of His devotees
This fact cannot be understood by others.

45 This hidden truth He made manifest in the Bhagabat, Parikshit heard it from Sri Suka.

46 Listen, in this connection, to the episode of the Bhagabat,
The incomparable conversation between Suka and Parikshit.

47 When this same Gaur-Chandra was born in the settlement of cow-herds
He played from house to house in the company of children.

48 From His birth all the milk-maids
Loved the Lord in their hearts more than their own sons.

49 Although they did know Krishna as the Supreme Lord
Their spontaneous love for Him exceeded their affection for their own sons.

50 Hearing this King Parikshit was filled with wonder
With a thrill of delight he asked Sukadeva—

51 'What you say, Gosain, is most strange ;
I have nowhere in the three worlds heard anything like it.

52 'Tell me what was it that could make them love Krishna,
Even more than their own children.'

53 Sri Suka said, 'Harken King Parikshit,
This is known that the Supreme Soul is the loved Lord in all bodies

54 'As soon as the soul leaves, son, wife, kinsfolk
Cause the body to vacate the house at once.

55 'Whence the Supreme Soul is the Life of all
Which Supreme Spirit is this Darling of Sri Nanda.

56 'Therefore for the reason that the Supreme Soul happens to be His Nature
The milk-maids have this superior love for Krishna.'

57 This again only applies to the devotees, not to others ;
Why else does not the whole world love Him ?

58 Krishna is also the Soul of Krishna and the others,—why then do they spite Him ?
This is due to Their previous offences.

59 Sugar is naturally sweet as all know ;
Some find it bitter owing to certain defects of the tongue

60 The tongue is to blame for this, not the sugar.
In the same manner Lord Chaitanya is sweet for all.

61 And all the people saw Him in this very Navadwip
Yet no one recognized Him except the devotees.

62 The Lord in all manner steals the hearts of His devotees.
Thus sports at Navadwip the Lord of Vaikuntha.

63 Prabhu Biswambhar bewitching the minds of all Went off to His home taking His elder brother with Him.

64 The high-souled Advaita thus mused within himself—
'This Boy is never an ordinary mortal'.

65 Advaita said to all the Vaishanavas,
'What this Boy is I do not know with certainty.'

66 All the devotees began to praise
The wonderful beauty, grace and speech of the Child.

67 Biswarup went back to his home only in name,
He soon returned to the house of Advaita.

68 Domestic pleasures had no attraction for the mind of Biswarup Constantly immersed in Kirtan and Kirshna-bliss.

69 Coming home he never interests himself in domestic duties,
Remains always insides Vishnu's room.

70 The parents begin to make preparations for his marriage,
Biswarup takes this very much to heart.

71 Biswarup thinks in his mind 'I will renounce the world.'
And this thought always wakes in his mind, 'I will go into the forest.'

72 The tendencies of the mind of God are known only to the Divinity.
Biswarup accepted sannyas within a few days.

73 Known to the world under the name of Sri Sankararanya
The foremost of the Vaishnavas set out on the path of the eternal.

74 As the high souled Biswarup went out
The hearts of Sachi and Jagannath were seared

75 Cried un-checked with all the family
Gaur Himself swooned away at separation from His brother.

76 With mouth I cannot describe the anguish of that parting
The home of Jagannath was filled with wailing.

77 Witnessing the sannyas of Biswarup the devotees,
Advaita and all the others, cried very much

78 Of those who heard of it in Nadia the ordinary people and the very best
There was no one who was not moved to grief by the news.

79 The hearts of Jagannath and Sachi were broken
They called constantly on the name of Biswarup.

80 The good Misra become un-controllable with grief for his son.
All the friends and kinsfolk consoled him—

81 'Be calm, Misra, be not grieved in your mind
That great soul has delivered the whole family.

82 'Of that family a member of which accepts sannyas
Three crores of generation attain to the realm of holy Vaikuntha

83 'Even such an act has been performed by your darling ;
All his learning has been crowned with success.

84 'It is meet that you should rather specially rejoice,'
With these words all of them held him by the hands and feet.

85 'This Bisvambhar will adorn your family
This Son will maintain your line

86 'By Him all your sorrows will be relieved ;
What are crores of sons to him whose son is He ?

87 Thus counselled all the friends,
Yet the grief of Misra was not to be cancelled.

88 By whatever device the high-souled Misra tried to restrain himself
The recollection of the great qualities of Biswarup made him forget all fortitude.

89 Said the Misra, 'That this Son will also remain in the family
Of this I am not at all convinced in my mind.'

90 'Krishna had given me that son, Krishna has taken him away,
That alone needs must be what Krishna-Chandra wills.

91 'The jiva has no little of power of his own.
To Thee, O Krishna, I surrender body and the senses.'

The Car Festival of Sri Sri Jagannath Deva at Puri

The annual Mahotsabs of Sri Purusottam Math at Puri, of Sri Brahma-Gaudiya Math at Alalnath and of Sri Sachchidananda Math at Cuttack.

The annual Mahotsabs of the three Utkal branches of the Sri Chaitanya Math of Sridham Mayapur are celebrated at the time of the greatest Utsab of Orissa viz. the Car Festival of Sri Sri Jagannath Deva.

The Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya spent practically the whole period of His career as a sannyasin at Puri. During His residence there the Lord was joined annually by a very large number of His devotees from Gauda (i. e., Bengal) on the occasion of the Car Festival. In the company of this large body of His associates and followers the Lord took the leading part in all the devotional activities connected with the great Festival. Sriman Mahaprabhu accompanied by a number of His devotees used to retire to Alalnath and stay there during the whole period of Anabsar when no one is allowed to have a sight of Sri Sri Jagannath Deva. The Lord attended by His devotees carried out with His own hands the cleansing of the Gundicha Mandir and Himself danced before the Car of Jagannath all the way while it was drawn to Sri Gundicha amidst the kirtan of the whole body of His devotees formed into a great procession. The annual Mahotsabs of the Purusottam Math at Puri and of the Brahma Gaudiya Math at Alalnath are celebrated by the devotees of the Gaudiya Math in persuance of these activities of the Supreme Lord.

Thakur Bhaktivinode, the pioneer of the present movement of pure devotion was very closely connected with Puri at different periods of his life. Sri Purusottam Math has been established in the small house built by Thakur Bhaktivinode for his own private devotional practices close to the site of Samadhi of Haridas. In this house Thakur Bhaktivinode spent the closing years of his life. Alalnath is situated on the sea-shore about fourteen miles to the south of Puri. The Sri Brahma Gaudiya Math has been established there adjoining the shrine of Sri Alalnath as a branch of the Sri Chaitanya Math.

Cuttack the ancient capital of Orissa, is one of the holy places sanctified by the dust of the feet of the Lord. Sriman Mahaprabhu visited Cuttack, which lies on the road to Puri from Bengal, on several occasions and it was on one of these visits that He narrated the famous story of Sri Sakshi-Gopal recorded in the Sri Chaitanya Bhagabat and Charitamrita. Cuttack was the headquarters of Protaprudra Deva the only powerful Hindu King of India of that day who was a most devoted follower of Mahapraphu.

The Sri Gaudiya Math of Calcutta, the principal branch of the Sri Chaitanya Math of Sridham Mayapur the holy birth-place of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya, stands for the religion of unalloyed devotion taught and practised by the Lord during eighteen years of His almost continuous residence at Puri as a sannyasin, and is trying to serve the people of Orissa and of the whole world in the best possible manner by endeavouring to revive throughout the length and breadth of the holy land of Sri Sri Jagannath Deva the eternal religion of all Jivas.

The annual Mahotsab at Sri Purusottam Math Puri, will be celebrated this year from June 3 (Sunday) to June 27 (Thursday). The anniversary Mahotsab of the disappearance of Om Vishnupad Srimad Bhaktivinode Thakur entered into eternal lila take place on June 17 (Sunday).

VOL. XXVIII | JUNE 1930, Chaitanya-Era 444 | NO. 1

New Year

THE Harmonist is to-day entering on the fourth year of her service of all pure souls whose only function is to serve the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna by every faculty, in conformity with the teaching of the Lord Himself embodied in all the Scriptures. The service of the Divinity in its unalloyed form of exclusive spiritual love is the hidden treasure of the Scriptures. Few, indeed, of this mundane world ever attain to it. Love for God, contaminated and distorted more or less by the reservations of mundane considerations of selfish gratification, is to be ordinarily found in this world. But the present Age is too critical to be prepared to admit the validity of the alloyed form of the love of God. The alternative is, therefore, either to strive for the pure form of devotion or to reject the very principle of the spiritual function. The Iron Age is least disposed to abate its contentions against love, from instinctive deference to the principle of causeless love.

In former Ages men were less critical and less willing to be critical in matters of devotion to Krishna. This change of temperament has necessitated attempts to explain the fundamental principle of love itself to meet the objections of loveless critics. But the critics are confident that they have the advantage of the controversy. This is proved by the prevailing tendency in all countries in favour of mundane knowledge and mundane felicity as against cause less exclusive devotion to Krishna.

The controversialists cannot be expected to cease to be controversial without being beaten in controversy. But the wonderful progress of the physical sciences both in theory and application has served to strengthen the belief of people desirous of material advantage in the possibility of mundane knowledge leading to unlimited mundane felicity. Mere defeat in logical controversy, even if it be really decisive and clear to the parties themselves, is not likely to destroy the faith in the physical science of a person who is strictly addicted to sensuous pleasure. The applied sciences have been able to capture the hearts of worldly people by their actual visible achievement in the form of pleasure -giving values capable of apparent tangible demonstration.

The Locomotive Engine, the Airship and the wireless Telegraphy are offered as the most convincing arguments to reconcile humanity to any defeat that it may actually sustain in metaphysical controversy.

It would not, therefore, be wholly accurate to describe the present Age by such terms as 'controversial' and 'critical'. Those terms were more applicable to the mediaeval period. The presen Age has been more aptly designated as materialistic. No theory is acceptable to a moderner, which is not productive of some form of ascertainable utility ; that is to say, material, limited, definable, and desirable result. That theory is spontaneously voted to be worthy of attention which holds out the prospect of being able to improve to any appreciable extent the present worldly prospects of any person in such a way that his happiness, depending on transitory conditions of this world, may be appreciably increased thereby.

There is very little confident or independent thinking about conditions of prospects beyond this worldly life. The speculations about the other world are now-a-days intended to vindicate the findings of the physical sciences and are really based on the assumption of so called truths established by such enquiry. The next world is tacitly assumed to be a continuation of the present and also as inferable from the conditions of the phenomenal existence, by methods that have proved successful in acquainting us tentatively with the apparent secrets of the present life.

But whenever any new 'discovery' about the other world is advertised by such auxiliary science calling itself metaphysics it is received with ill-concealed scepticism by most persons. The Age is apparently content with physical science. It does not expect nor desire the solution of its problems from the so-called metaphysical quarter. It is confidently looking forward to the progressive solution of all difficulty by the natural and inevitable developement of the physical sciences, and in due course. It has ceased to be impatient for the truth It does not expect a miracle. It is not prepared at all to acknowledge anything except limited human contrivance and limited human experience. Neither does it believe in special Divine dispensations. It admits only one royal road, viz., that of progressive empiric knowledge, along which we are assumed to be predestined to travel perpetually towards the progressive goal of ever widening mundane knowledge and ever-widening consequent mundane felicity.

The Harmonist does not fully agree with this prevailing outlook of the age. She is trying her best to supplement the current view by offering a great and startling fact for the consideration of the Age in the shape of actual conduct based on the knowledge of the Absolute. She is systematically offering to the world a narrative of the conduct of Sri Chaitanya Deva and His followers as embodying the condition of living relationship with the Absolute.

The soul does not require, or really desire, the multiplication or elaboration of mundane felicity that is promised and apparently yeilded by the physical sciences. All worldly felicity is realisable, however dimly, as lying off the plane of the soul. Such felicity is not only essentially trivial and disappointing but also providentially ephemeral. It would be foolish to desire any modification of their nature. They are as they should be. Empiric science is therefore rightly content to watch and submit to what is essentially unmodifiable. It tries to regulate the conduct of individuals by the mere extension of their experience of the operation of Nature. The physical sciences never promise anything but the sense of felicity resulting from fulfilment of the conditions of slavery. They know of no method nor end except the trivial and the transitory which are declared by the Scriptures to be the cause of all the apparent misery of the soul.

The Harmonist is not a pessimist nor an optimist. She admits the reality and necessity of spiritual conduct. She is confident of her ability to remove the prevailing misunderstandings regarding spiritual conduct by the grace of her spiritual teacher who is the eternal associated counter-part of the Supreme Teacher Sri Chaitanya or the Absolute Enlightenment Himself. The Absolute alone may reveal Himself to us as the only Lord of our souls by Whose exclusive service alone the soul may find her real and lasting satisfaction.

Sri Chaitanya or the Supreme Teacher is identical with Sri Krishna the Supreme Attractor, Lover, Recipient of the soul's eternal homage of reciprocal love. Sri Chaitanya leads us by the hand towards the knowledge and love of Himself as teacher. As soon as we love Sree Chaitanya as Teacher we attain to love of Sri Krishna as the Sole Recipient of the soul's eternal, willing, loving homage taught by Himself. Sri Chaitanya confers on us the service of Himself as the eternal Supreme Teacher, which is identical with love of Sri Krishna, the eternal and only Lover of our souls. The spiritual teacher is the eternal associated counterpart of Sri Chaitanya and, on the realisation of the nature of our real self as the eternal servants of Krishna by following His teachings, we are enabled to recognise the spiritual teacher as being identical with the best beloved of Sri Krishna, whose eternal function is to devise constant and fresh employment for our souls in the loving service of the Supreme Lord.

The Harmonist defines the scope and nature of empiric knowledge represented by the sciences treating of phenomena. The Harmonist is indirectly and secondarily concerned with such knowledge which is the deluding unwholesome reflection of the true knowledge. She insists on her right to be heard by all pure souls as the loyal exponent of the Absolute Truth. She maintains that the knowledge of the Absolute Truth revealed by the spiritual teacher automatically solves all difficulties in the only way that is really acceptable to our souls and implores a patient hearing for the message of the natural function of our souls recorded in the Scriptures and taught by Sri chaitanya.

The Eternal Gift of Jagatbandhu

(By Srijut Kishori Mohan Pal, B. L.)

Jagatbandhu Dutt, or J. B. D., is building in Calcutta the loftiest and the most beautifully designed Temple in Bengal, with residential quarters, for the Gaudiya Math, at a cost of over a quarter of a million of rupees, as eternal gift to the feet of the spiritual preceptor, His Divine Grace Paramhansa Paribrajakacharyya Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Thakur.

The Scriptures have declared that the gift is the form of the eternal function. Diverse people have understood the word gift in diverse ways.

According to different standards of judgment of the ignorant, the pedants and the really erudite scholars, the natural meaning of gift is liable to be understood in quite different senses. In the seventeenth chapter of the Geeta Lord Krishna has declared three possible interpretations of this word corresponding to the nature of the platform on which the giver happens to stand. The first is the enlightened gift which is gift for gift's sake without any desire for reward or compensation, due regard being had to the proper nature of time, place and person,—when, where and to whom —the gift is made. The second kind is the charitable gift painfully made with an expectation of rewards either here or in the next world. The third variety is the indiscriminate gift contemptuously made without any regard for time, place or person receiving the same.

The above three kinds of gifts express the three mundane qualities of Sattwa, Rajas and Tamas. The ignorant as well as the pedant are equally in favour of these three kinds of gifts. Gift properly made signifies relinquishment of, or aversion to, worldly, transitory enjoyments. The time and the place, the giver and the receiver of these three kinds of gifts being themselves comprised within the three corresponding attributes of mundane Nature, these charities are, themselves also necessarily transitory, insignificant and misplaced.

But the exceptionally fortunate man who receives his Divine eyes from the gracious associated companions of that Jewel of benefactors, Sri Chaitanya Deva, does not fall within the category of these three classes. Enlightened with the Divine knowledge he becomes superlearned. The Kurma Purana has declared three kinds of gifts, viz., 'Nitya' (eternal), 'Naimittika' (causal) and 'Kamya' (born of selfish desire). The fourth (turiya) which is the pure form of gift lies beyond the pale of these three attributes. That which is given to the enlightened Brahmans without a view of any return of reward or the enjoyment of the fruits thereof, is the eternal gift. That which is given to the learned for purification from sin is called causal gift and that which is given for the sake of getting sons and grandsons, victory, fortune, heaven and the fruits of religious observances, is the covetous gift. The fourth or pure gift is that which is given with the spiritual object of service to those who are conversant with the knowledge of the service of the Brahman, solely with a view to the enjoyment of Godhead. This form is the most propitious of all. In India, the land of the eternal religion, the glories of the eternal gift have been proclaimed from time immemorial in the spiritual Scriptures and the distinction between eternal, causal and covetous gift has been fully explained. But in this world the number of those that are prepared to practise the pure and auspicious form of the gift are very, very few indeed. Persons desirous of enjoying the fruits of their actions, liberationists, Yogis desirous of merging with the Divinity and similar other speculators are never tired of proclaiming the glory of the three mundane forms of charity. Only the most magnanimous associated counterparts of the Supreme Lord Sri Chaitanya practise and proclaim the pure and non-evil-producing form of the eternal gift.

In the Srimad Bhagabatam we find it stated that although the presiding deity of this Iron Age has many faults, still that which could not have been possible of attainment to individual souls in the Ages of 'Satya', 'Treta' and Dwapara', has been available to all by means of chanting the Name of Krishna. It is identical with Divine Love which was not given to any in the other three ages but which has been lavished on all by Sri Chaitanya Deva in this Iron Age irrespective of caste, creed or colour, time or place. If anybody out of his own good luck due to his devotional activities of previous births can find his way to make a gift of his transitory fortune towards that truly charitable performance inaugurated by Sri Chaitanya Deva, viz., the distribution of the spiritual love to all, the gift of such a person should be considered to be the purest (Suddha Sattwik) and best of all gifts. Such gift can purify in every way all generations, being completly immune from the triple mundane qualities of mixed Sattwa, Rajas and Tamas.

The Scriptures maintain that gifts should be made to the deserving and not to the undeserving. But who is really a deserving person in the eyes of the Scriptures? The Scriptures themselves say that 'he who can save himself and others from falling into the bondage of this world is the deserving person.' No atheist can be a fit recipient of the eternal gift, because he is being drifted hither and thither by his deliberate aversion to the Feet of God. How can such a person save his giver? They would be like one blind man leading another. For the same reason neither the elevationist nor the fruitive workers can be the proper recipients of the eternal gift, because they are ever liable to fall from even the highest position attainable by meritorious worldly activities. The liberationists cannot also claim to be the deserving recipients of the eternal gift, because according to Sreemad Bhagabat, 'alienated from the Feet of Sri Krishna they are liable to fall from their exalted position, attained through the knowledge of the Brahman as indistinguishable from themselves'. The greatest Yogis who desire to merge with the God-head, such as Viswamitra, Shaubhari and others have been found to have been liable to fall from their high positions in spite of their success in realising apparently unswerving connection with the Oversoul. They cannot also therfore be the fit recipients of the eternal gift as they cannot save others from the fall to which they themselves are liable.

The elevationists think that the hereditary, professional priests are the proper recipients of the eternal offering. But according to Sreemad Bhagabat those who cannot save the soul from spiritual lapse, cannot be the fit recipients of the eternal gift. King Bali instead of bestowing his gift on his atheistical hereditary family Guru, considered Vishnu to be the only fit Recipient of the gift of his all. There are many who consider their-blood relations as the proper recipients of their charity. But how can they, who cannot save even themselves, claim to be able to save those from whom they accept any gift on the strength of their temporary relationship? It is for this reason that Mahatma Bivishan, instead of considering his own brother Ravan to have been the fit person, placed himself wholly at the disposal of Bhagaban Sri Ramchandra and dedicated his all for the worship of His Feet. We usually consider that our mother, father, wife or husband or the gods preside over the good things of this world as the proper recipients of our gifts. But in the eyes of the Scriptures they cannot claim to be so, if they cannot protect our souls. This consideration led Prahlad Maharaj to consider Nrisiuha—Vishnu as the proper Recipient of his worship in lieu of his father Hiranyakashipu and he accordingly surrendered himself with body, mind and speech to the lotus Feet of the Supreme Lord, without desiring anything in return; because he knew that he who asks for anything of God in return of his service, is no servant at all but a trader. In this way Bharat, instead of taking his mother Kaikeyi to be the deserving person, considered the Feet of Bhagaban Sri Ramchandra as the only Recipient of his gifts and surrendered his all to Him. The consorts of these Brahman priests who were helpers of the sacrifice of their husbands, in place of their virtuous husbands, considered Sri Krishna to be the sole Enjoyer of all sacrifices, deceived their husbands and behind their back, made a gift of their all to Krishna and Baladeva. Maharaj Khattanga, in the last moment of his life, in place of gods like Indra and others, elected Sri Vishnu, the God of all the gods to be the sole Recipient of his gift and offered everything he had to His Feet. Hence according to Srimad Bhagabat, the crest-jewel of all Scriptural evidence, those who do not serve, Krishna viz., the elevationists, the liberationsts, the Yogis, the hereditary professional priests and pseudo-preceptors, blood-relations, father, mother, husband and the lesser gods cannot claim to be the deserving recipients of our gift, as none of them can save our souls from falling into this worldly bondage.

According to the same high authority the devotees of Vasudeva alone who are firmly and lovingly attached to His Feet and hence are not liable to fall from the spiritual condition, are the only persons who can save our souls from this worldly bondage. For this reason they are the only deserving recipients (patra) of all gifts. Of the devotees of Vasudeva, Sri Gurudeva, the transcendental preceptor, being the Divinely authorized Saviour of the fallen, is the most deserving recipient of our gifts. The transcendental Preceptor, unlike the sacerdotal pseudo-gurus, is not a preacher of the performance of worldly deeds. Neither like the elevationists, renunciationists or Yogis who desire the idle bliss of union with the Over-soul, is he prepared to renounce the worship of the lotus Feet of the Supreme Lord, Sri Krishna, for the purpose of his selfish enjoyments by intercepting for his own use the gift of his disciples intended for the sole Recipient of all gifts. The transcendental Preceptor is in the habit of appropriating all that our souls ignorantly suppose they possess in this world by enabling them to offer the same at the Feet of Sri Krishna Who is the sole Enjoyer of everything. Or, in other words, by taking away from us every transitory thing to which we may be unnaturally attached he purges our hearts of all mundane desires and makes us susceptible to the perennial advent of the Absolute Truth.

Kapila :

(Teacher of Theistic Sankha Philosophy)

BRAHMA asked Kardama to live and multiply. He accordingly went to the secluded bank of the Saraswati, worshipped the Supreme Lord for a long time and was able to see Narayana and Lakshmi, the Transcendental Couple, riding on Garuda. Kardama said with reverence, "Lord, I have now all my desires fulfilled. I am ordered by my father to procreate the human species and take this opportunity to meditate on Thee. It is true that it is not commendable to worship Thee for the fulfilment of our desires ; still I take recourse to this means only. I know it for certain that Thou conferest Thy best favours on him who lifts his hands in prayer, no matter whether he desires some boon for himself or is without any selfish motive."

Narayana replied, "It is not necessary to ask for anything. I love the devotees dearly and fulfil all their wants. I have already arranged everything. Manu and his wife Shatarupa will come to you shortly and bestow their beautiful daughter Devahuti on you. A part of Myself shall be born as your Son and hallow this world. Dedicate your all to Me and you will be free from sin and attain unto Me." With this Narayana left him.

In due time several daughters and a Son were born to him. At the time of the Son's birth auspicious signs became perceptible and Brahma said to his son Kardama, "You have discharged your duty and have got as your Son One Who will teach the Truth. He shall be called Kapila."

He then congratulated Devahuti on having the Supreme Lord as her Son and went away.

Kardama thought that it was high time that he should retire to the forest and give himself up to the contemplation of God. Devahuti became aware of it and asked him what would be her duty and informed him that she would be in a helpless state if he left her. Kardama consoled her saying that she need not be anxious as the Lord had owned her as His mother and advised her to receive instructions from Him and she would be free from all bondage. Kardama then approached Kapila and prayed that he might not again be attracted by the lures of the world.

Kapila said, "The path of Truth has, in course of time, become blocked and obscured, I have appeared to clear it. Always meditate on Me. See the self-manifested Oversoul in your heart and you will be free from fears and miseries. I will confer transcendental knowledge on My mother and she will be free from the fears of death !"

Kardama started for the woods meditating on Him alone and Kapila and Devahuti remained in their hut on the Bindusarobara.

One day Devahuti went to her Son and said, "My Lord, I am weary of supplying objects of enjoyment to my mind ; still it has not been satiated. It is incessantly driving me towards the darkness of misery. It is Thou alone That can'st help me. I am sure I shall be freed now that Thou hast come. Thou art the Lord of all. Extricate me from the mire of worldliness and infatuation and favour me with the true knowledge of myself."

He was pleased at her sincerity and said, "Mother, the mind is the cause of both bondage and deliverance. Let the mind be steeped in mundane matters and you are bound hand and foot. Concentrate it in God and you are free. It is the company of self-realised souls and listening to their chantings and joining them in their devotional performances that bring the real good. Then only do the world's temptations fail. The greatness of the devotees knows no bounds. Attachment to the world binds, while attachment to the devotees frees. They direct all their efforts and exertions towards My pleasure and do not hesitate to sever their connection with those who are nearest and dearest to them if they go against their service to Me in any way. They meditate on Me incessantly and enjoy chanting My glory day and night. They are beyond the reach of misery. Touch with such devotees alone can impart devotion to Krishna. When you associate with devoted persons you hear nothing else than talk about Me. They sing My glory in endless ways and your mind is naturally diverted from the world and directs its course towards Me. If you practise it without cessation your mind will be free from dross and all your functions will be directed towards the attainment of My holy Feet and as the consequence you will attain My holy Feet even in this life."

Devahuti said, "I am but a dull woman. Explain the devotional principles clearly and let me know my duty."

Kapila said, "Mother, the individual soul does, by nature, crave for touch with the Oversoul; but His illusory energy keeps him screened and entangled in the meshes of worldly attractions. It is association with self-realised souls alone that removes the screens and disentangles the unfortunate wretch, who is thus favoured with unalloyed devotion which is far superior to liberation. The real devotees never desire for salvation. They direct all their efforts to My service. They always long to look at My Form of transcendental Beauty and do not even turn towards salvation which offers itself at their feet. They serve Me eternally in Vaikuntha. The highest object of salvation is subject to decay but My devotees reside in a region where time has no influence and decay and destruction are unknown. So strong and unalloyed devotion to Me is the highest object of human achievement. Mother, betake yourself to the path of devotion."

"The Supreme Lord Sri Hari is the ultimate Cause. Some foolishly hold that Nature is the ultimate cause. They are wrong. The personal God Who is different from Prakriti (Nature) is the ultimate Cause. It is He Who impregnates her with material energy. First comes forth Mahattattva, the first sprout, as it were, of this world. Thenceforth come the different material objects. Earth, water, fire, air and ether are the five elements (mohabhoota); smell, liquidity, form, touch and sound are the five connectives (tanmatras); eye, ear, nose, tongue and skin are the five organs of sense. The mouth, the hand, the feet, the anus and the generative organs with the five organs of physical activity, the mind, the intellect, the perverted ego and nature added to them, form what is called the 24 Tattwas or categories. The Purusha or personal God is the 25th. The three attributes Sattva, Rajas and Tamas, or purity, activity and stupor, make the number twenty eight."

"The Purusha may be either God or the individual soul. Prakriti or Nature has attributes whereas the Supreme being or Purusha is not burdened with them. By dint of His inconceivable powers He resides in the body of the Jiva and is known as Paramatma. He remains unaffected by the qualities of physical Nature as the sun that casts its reflections on water. An infinitesimal portion of His pure essence is called Jiva who is liable to be affected by the qualities of Nature. This Jiva, devoid of all mundane attributes as he is by nature, imagines himself to be endowed with the triple material qualities of Sattwa, Rajas and Tamas and becomes thereby subject to mundane joys and sufferings."

"When by touch with self-realised souls he becomes re-instated in his original position he comes to know that he is independent of all mundane affinities. Assidnous devotion to Me alone can maintain him in My eternal service."

"Mother, let me delineate the process of serving Me by one who is free from the domination of Illusory Energy. The pure devotees contemplate on the Paramatma's dark beautiful Form with the conch, the disc, the club and the lotus and see His own Form. Unalloyed devotion enables the devotees to see the form of Godhead as he is, viz., the beautiful adolescent Sri Krishna. Shiva deserves the Name of Benefaction because he holds on his head the Ganges who flows from the holy Feet of the Supreme Lord."

"Devotion is either mixed with quality (saguna) or unadulterated by such quality (nirguna). Those who hanker after something else than Krishna may have mixed devotion while the spontaneous play of the unobscured conscious principle of the single-hearted devotees constitutes unalloyed devotion. These latter shun the desire for liberation from suffering as they shun the devil and want nothing but exclusive and eternal service of the Divinity. This sincere devotion is called unalloyed or pure devotion. The pure devotees sing My glory, serve the self-realised souls, behave sincerely, worship My divine Form, overcome their natural longing for creature comforts, listen to discourses on Hari, respect their superiors, imbibe friendship with the pure devotees and by means of other devotional practices attain Me without much ado.

"Those who indulge in malice and at the same time make a show of worshipping Me, practise the external forms of these devotional activities in vain. One should worship My divine form till one has attained the capacity for realising My presence in all beings as well as in one's own heart.

"This material world teems with millions of individual souls of whom man is the greatest. Those men who dwell in the land of Bharata and hold in high esteem the system of communal organisation for spiritual amelioration based on destinctions of aptitude and circumstances and are disposed to serve God are the highest class of men. The Brahamans who possess the knowledge of the Great Unknowable and are their teachers of religion form the highest class. Among the Brahmans those who are thoroughly well versed in the spiritual Scriptures are the greatest. Those Brahmans who possessing the knowledge of the Vedas follow constantly the principles of religion are the highest. Those who have dedicated their all to Godhead are superior to all others. There is none superior to one who is devoted to Godhead. He stands above all and knows no fall.

"One devoid of devotion is the creature of sorrow, want and anxiety. He may enjoy temporary pleasures, but is bound to be miserable in the long run. In the womb of the mother the soul averse to Godhead suffers excruciating pain and cries in agony sincerely imploring God to relieve him of his sufferings by re-installing him in His eternal service. But just after his birth he consigns all these to oblivion and as the result he has to appear again and again in this world. It is the devotee alone who can have true felicity."

With this Kapila took leave of His mother, went northwards and became invisible to the mortal eye.

Sri Vishnu imposed Himself on Kapila, instructor of unalloyed devotion. We must distinguish Him from the Kapila who is the propounder of atheistic Sankhya philosophy. Divine superimposition on individual Souls is of two kinds :—

(1) Imposition of the Lord Himself, e., g, Kapila, Rishabha.

(1) Imposition of the Divine Power, e., g., Narada, Vyas, Prithu, Brahma and Sanaka.

He in whom a particular energy or power of the Divinity manifests itself is called "imbued with the Divine Power". In this manner devotion manifested itself in Narada, in Prithu the governing power, in the four Sanas Knowledge, in Brahma the creative power. These regard themselves as so many servants of the Lord.

In superimposition of the Lord Himself the Divine energy manifests itself more perfectly and the individual soul regards himself as identical with Godhead.

Kapila and Rishabhadeva regarded themselves under Divine superimposition as the Supreme Lord Himself.

The Study of the English Language

(By Bishweswar Das B.A., Headmaster, H E. School, Santipur.)

AS English is a language with which we are all unavoidably concerned it is of the utmost importance to know the proper use of that language and what part it should play in the scheme of our useful activities. A tendency of abusing or praising the study of the English language in connection with diverse questions, is often noticeable in this country. We shall try to show in the present article how all may be benefited by means of the English language and what an abundant harvest of good the English as well as ourselves might reap from the proper use of the same. Let my countrymen consider with a calm and collected mind the views expressed here and approach the question of the study of the English language with the proper attitude.

The study of English was at one time generally considered to be among our bread-studies. It is, as matters stand at present, a convenient passport for entry into the political and commercial life of the world. But this is not the only claim it has upon our attention. The language has its own peculiar merits. For strong masculine vigour, a pronounced tone of practicality, elasticity and preciseness of expression the language occupies a high place in the world. Nursed by the hand-maid of empiric science and maintained by the fatherly care of its most assiduous application to all departments of life, the language, like the people to whom it belongs, is possessed of a wide wordly out-look which is worthy of being turned to account by being consecrated to the service of the higher life.

Any one making an acquaintance with this language cannot fail to appreciate its influence. Come within its influence in the proper way and your heart is sure to realise a new freshness. You cannot ignore its vivifying force, its masterful spirit, its ever-prying inventiveness. All languages rightly understood always point to the One. Most of the characteristics mentioned above no doubt belong to the best minds of the English nation, although they are apt to be abused by being directed to purely worldly purposes. But they are none the less true characteristics of the English language which portrays faithfully the thoughts, lives and manners of the English people.

So far as a seeker of the Truth is concerned the English language appears to have a very different mission to fulfil. The language seems to him suited to serve as a means of rousing the inert millions of the world, to carry life into the cold frames of its peoples. There is, therefore, a kind of special providence in the advent of the English people into India. They came to us with their language to regulate our learning, our habits of life and modes of thought, our traditional hopes and aspirations. This has led us to a strict self-examination and to the necessity of taking stock of our actual possessions. Our indebtedness, therefore, to both the English people and their language is great. Do not admire the English nation as a successful money-making, materialistic people. They should be to us as Heaven-sent agents to enable us to learn how to safe-guard the spiritual interests of all. They are, indeed, very different from the scriptural ideal of our warrior kings as guardians of spiritual welfare by direction of truly enlightened sages and saints devoted wholly to matters relating to the higher concerns of the soul. But we need not, therefore, unduly deprecate the English more than ordinary worldly people. If they fail in their higher duty towards us, if they make themselves unnecessarily exacting, they will surely be accountable to God, Who holds in His Hands the destinies of all nations and Who permits both individuals and nations even to abuse their freedom, affording them a chance of redemption from their failings by their own bitter experience. Let us study their character as well as their language to be also duly warned against such failings. The language would then be pregnant with invaluable lessons for us. Let us accept from the English people their close association with humanity, for the higher purpose. Let us acquire from their language that practical tone of thought which lies at the root of a nation's material prosperity, and turn it to higher account. Let us acquire from the English language the love of adventure, the zeal for action, the spirit of self-reliance, the indefatigable courage and perseverance, for the same purpose. Let us learn from their language scrupulous adherance to strict principles, regularity of life, steadfast devotion to duty and exemplary method of work. Let us adopt zeal for knowledge, patient and sustained efforts for large undertakings, love of researches and exertion for the discovery of the unknown. Let us learn these qualifications of a student and a really good citizen, and the proper virtues of a self-respecting gentleman. Let us use the English language for the purpose of the spread of self-culture.

We Indians have by an inscrutable Providence been made to come into contact with the language of the most powerful and prosperous nations on earth in order that we may become animated and invigorated by finding the proper use of the qualities that characterise that interesting nation. If by the study of English we learn merely to abuse or flatter the English people our learning will be harmful for both. If by the study of English we learn merely to imitate the vices of the English character, the free thinking of sensuous godless literature, our learning will do us no good. Providence has brought the English people into India not that we should learn English ways of living, not that we should imitate English modes of eating, drinking and dressing, but that we should find extended scope for our beneficial activities. If English education cannot do this for us then the opportunity will be abused. Indians are by nature and circumstances well fitted for this great task. The possession of this aptitude shows itself in our traditional anxiety to utilize every opportunity for spiritual use. We should continue to love to keep severely aloof from low ideals, we should love to detach ourselves from worldly-minded men and women, in order to be able to help all persons by our conduct. This aloofness is necessary under all circumstances and is a duty towards all. It is not opposed either to the interests of human society or to the laws that govern the moral world. A man should cut himself off from the company of his low-minded fellows in order to follow a better and clearer perception of his duties to them, and the right mode of discharging those duties. On this ground isolation is necessary and justifiable. In fact a man can work out his salvation only by thus living for others. To be able so to live for others is the greatest glory and highest virtue of man. If this view is correct there is nothing wrong in the idea of such isolation. It should by all means be encouraged. Men should be repeatedly warned against drifting into the vice of real isolation from the spiritual life by association with worldly people, no matter by whatever honourable or glorious names such vice be designated. The current method of study of English is, we believe, no antidote against this vice. The tendency of the English literature itself is only to make men active, enterprising, practical and useful in this life. We should be thoroughly imbued with this spirit of the English literature but not for the purpose of worldly living. The study of the works of a few select English authors under proper safeguards may serve the useful end. English books bring us into touch with the outside world. They carry us to the uttermost parts of the Earth, familiarise us, even when we do not move a yard from our homes, with the busy scenes of commercial life, the repulsive horrors of the battle-field, the roaring billows of the tropical seas, the frozen waters of the icy poles. English authors inform us about the customs of the most strange and savage nations as also of the mighty kings and potentates of the Earth. English books suggest to our minds the truth that the soul of man, inspite of the differences of caste, creed and colour which pertain only to the flesh, is the same in essence, that all are children of the same common Father variously called Jehova, Zeus, Jove, Allah, God, Brahma —purporting Sree Krishna, and that one touch of the spiritual nature may make the whole world kin. We are taught by the scriptures to consider all persons as kith and kin, but by the preventing manners and customs of the world we are excluded from the real society of one another. This wilful spiritual isolation, as the world goes, does not seem to be productive of any good. On the contrary it is the cause of all the evils so far as our real interests are concerned. Unless we are disposed to apply our Shastras to the conditions and requirements of life, ours will be a miserable lot, a lot which will involve all, the rich and the poor, the learned and the illiterate, the caste Brahmins and the caste Shudras, in a sad and pitiable plight. The study of English or any worldly language is sure to lead to this catastrophe unless directed to the higer purpose.

But a not wholly unfounded charge is also brought against the study of English. A Nationalist would say that the study of the English language disabuses men's minds of all ancient ideas and beliefs. In matters of religion, in matters relating to our highest interests the cultivation of the English language is hence calculated to a certain extent to make us losers rather than gainers. There is no gain-saying the fact that a thorough mastery of the English language need be no bar to the requirements of spiritual life the nature of which can hardly be suspected by one who is ignorant of the higher purpose. Nevertheless the charge is true that the materialistic tendency of the English language makes it more or less sceptical of religion. Let us counteract this materialistic tendency on us of all languages by a careful study of the scriptures and theistic philosophy. Let the study of the western sciences be rendered fruitful by the wise study of those vast lores of spiritual learning the Vedas, Upanisads and Purans bequeathed to us by the transcendental servants of God. If this is studiously and conscientiously done and if the happy wedding of the oriental and occidental spiritual lores be consummated, the brightest issue of that glorious union we doubt not, will no longer be a number of greedy nations, but one heoric community of mankind conscious of its real mission by spiritual awakening. England will benefit no less than ourselves by this happy and glorious consummation. Let us in the Name of the Most High reverentially acknowledge this. Let us recognise the English people as not essentially different from us and the language of that high and mighty but equally unhappy nation as not unfit to be the gospel of salvation.

Our article is rather long but we have not certainly written in vain when we think of the unrest that happily prevails in many quarters of this vast world, which is likely to rouse us to an attitude of enquiry regarding its real cause. May the Great Disposer Who wields the destinies of all nations and Who has in His inscrutable providence brought together Esterners and Westerners also graciously inspire all peoples with the true ideas and sentiments that tend to the real good, happiness and prosperity of one and all.

Calcutta, the 25th May, 1930

To

SRI SRIMAD BHAKTI SIDDHANTA SARASWATI GOSWAMI MAHARAJ

Your Holiness:

Among the many others may I be one to offer you my sincere congratulations on the Sridham Mayapur Exhibition recently held? It is proof that spiritual things have not yet died out of India and that people are still willing and anxious to go to such Exhibitions. We need such occasions to stir up our dying faith, by having practical demonstrations before our eyes. May I request you to continue such Exhibitions periodically, say once in 2 years, and later on, if possible once every year? They will grow in popularity as year passes year.

Being one of your humble admirers I wish you every success in your selfless undertakings, specially in your good work at the Gaudiya Math of Calcutta, with its thirty living branches all over India to spread the Truth, as it were, from end to end.

With my sincere respects and craving always your blessings on me and my humble undertakings for the good of India, your land and mine.

Yours very cordially,
H. W. B. MORENO

Universal Brotherhood

(NIMANANDA SEVATIRTHA B. Ag., B. T.)

UNIVERSAL brotherhood is a heavenly commodity. Love builds and hatred destroys it. The natural relation between one soul and another is that of fellowship in unadulterated love of Sri Krishna. This relation is realised through the endeavour to love the Lord. Love of the Lord is the guiding principle to unite us as brothers or fellow servants, all of us being the exclusive servants of the same Lord. This relation is alone natural and is automatically established as soon as we become really attentive to God, our only Lord, the sole Object of our exclusive service.

Love of the Lord being the natural function of our soul we must be always on our guard against the unnatural and obstructing intruder, lust, that is the bastard born of our unnatural alliance with flesh and blood. The teachers of Divine love preached their gospel of love by loving the Lord with all their faculties. Being killed in the physical body they had no reason to retaliate and being hated by reason of the flesh they were not anxious to be dragged into a similar predicament themselves. Christ, while apppearing to be crucified, cried aloud, "Father, forgive them for they know not what they are doing." Did not Nityananda, while seeming to bleed under the blows of his assailants, request Lord Chaitanya to show mercy to Madhai saying that he himself contrived to get the wound ?

Love of Krishna suffers no ill and consequently does not know revenge. That fleshy disposition is entirely foreign to the soul. It cannot be accommodated in the all-loving nature of the soul in intimate relation with God. For where is the possibility of a wire's losing the electric charge while effectively connected with the battery ? The soul that realises her subjection to the Divine Soul Who is All-love, is necessarily herself all-loving to the extent of her reciprocal nature and cannot be otherwise.

Difference of interest is visible only when the relationship of the physical and mental bodies is considered without reference to the soul. The twin bodies that enwrap the soul cause all the apparent difference ; or rather, the more our attention is given to our encasing of bodies the stronger and more inevitable and apparently unbridgeable is the difference. Our attention to flesh and blood tends to foster complete inattention to God. This tendency to entire inattention to God is the cause of the unnatural subjection of the soul to body and mind, of spirit to matter. In the annals of the tragic serfdom of soul to matter, race, colour, man-made creed, etc., are things that supply the motive-power and the consequent lust or hatred manifests itself in every form of gilded or naked hideosness.

Not wholly relishing to live in such an atmosphere even the misguided soul also always tries, however feebly, to assert himself. But the soul acting now under his misguided judgment utterly fails to devise the right means to find the condition of real harmony. The means that are adopted from time to time for this purpose only serve, under the circumstances, to make union still more impossible. The wrong treatment aggravates the malady. That is why our Peace-conferences, Leagues of Nations and all other conventions directed by lust fail to achieve their purpose.

We fail and fail again, but do not know or care to know, why we are thus almost predestined to fail. The reason of this should be also obvious. The cause of failure is betrayed by such as statements from authoritative quarters as that, "There is no place for Saints in politics." The Reality need not be officially ousted from the considerations of practical politics despite the most unpromising appearances. This should be true of all institutions. Religion and life need not be treated as two different subjects even partially independent of one another. It need not be taken for granted that one must live only by distrust and dishonesty, and only profess with the lip abnegation of the interests of the flesh. One must learn to cling to religion to triumph in life. Life cannot claim to have triumphed if religion is banished from the domain of practical considerations. The talk of love of God now hardly commends itself to our constant and dominant consideration. The examples of the past teachers of love have been forgotten and those of present ones are ignored.

Now-a-days there exists many an official religious mission all over the world. Even they appear to find it impracticable to be purely religious bodies. They are allowing themselves to be transformed more or less into agents for the promotion of lust (worldly interests). They are often called upon to help the cause of a narrow community to which they are assumed to belong by the flesh, even in the guise of a religious body. And we must not also forget that it was both easy and convenient for Ravana to cast his lustful eyes on Seeta, in the garb of a mendicant. The altars are liable to be easily desecrated by the worship of lust,—ungodly things,—money, name, fame. amelioration of the flesh, removal of the wholesome although seemingly distressing consequences of immoral life, etc. etc. These apparently benevolent deeds of the misguided worldling have no power to infuse the spirit of love into the hearts of the people who suppose themselves to be benefited in this fashion. For you cannot find any trace of electric charge in a wire which is not connected with the battery.

Sree Raghunath Das Goswami

BY this time the devotees from Gauda (Bengal) arrived at Puri. The Lord welcomed them all as in the previous year. In their company the Lord swept the Gundicha, dined out in the open and danced in the Car Festival. The mind of Raghunath Das was filled with great wonder on beholding these devotional performances. Then Raghunath Das cultivated the acquaintance of all the devotees. Adwaita Acharya bestowed on him his mercy in manifold measure. Shivananda Sen related to him how his father had sent ten persons to take him back and had written a letter to him on the subject. Those men had come up with his party at Jhakra from where they went back on not finding him with them.

The devotees returned to Gauda (Bengal) after a stay of four months at Puri. Informed of this the father of Raghunath sent a man to Shivananda to enquire about his son. The conversation between this person and Shivananda Sen has been preserved in the immortal work of Kaviraj Goswami. The man asked Shivananda Sen, 'Did you find any Vaishnava with the Supreme Lord, who is the son of Gobardhana, by name, Raghunath ? Did you make the acquaintance of any such person at Neelachal ?' Shivananda said, 'He is with the Lord. He is most famous. There is no one at Puri who does not know him. The Lord has made him over to Swarup. He is as dear to the devotees of the Lord as their own lives. He chants the Name night and day. He never quits the feet of the Lord even for a moment. He is most averse to the world and has no thought for food or clothing. He keeps up life by eating something now and then. When it is near midnight he takes his stand at the Lion Gate after seeing the ceremony of flower-offering to Jagannath. If any-body choses to give him anything he eats something. He fasts or chews raw fruit or grain as the occasion serves.'

The man conveyed these tidings to Gobardhan. Raghunath's father and mother were filled with grief on receiving this detailed information. They sent men and money for their child. Two servants and one Brahman with four hundred coins accordingly came to Shivananda. Shivananda said that it would not be practicable for them to reach Puri by themselves and told them to accompany him when he went there next. He sent them back with the assurance that he would take them with him when he next set out for Puri with his party.

The very words spoken by Shivananda Sen to the messenger sent to him by Gobardhan Mazumdar were heard and carefully recorded in verse by his gifted son Karnapur, the famous Poet. The Poet's words are—Shivananda said 'Jadunandan Acharya of most deliciously sweet appearance is the object of affection of Sri Vasudeva Datta (of Kanchanpalli). Raghunath Das is the disciple of Jadunandan Acharyya. By his good qualities he is more than our own life to all of us and by means of the excessive mercy of Śri Chaitanya he is always most gentle, the beloved of Swarup Goswami and a unique treasure of the realm of renunciation. Of those who live at Neelachal who does not know him ?.....'Who by delighting the minds of all became the soil of some rare fortune which ripened into maturity without culture,—in whom the incomparable tree of the Love of Chaitanya bore fruit at the time of planting its seed.' Karnapur has given in verse the exact words that Shivananda spoke to the messenger of Gobardhan Mazumdar.

Shivananda in due course set out for Neelachal next year. A servant and a Brahman from Gobardhan Mazumdar accompanied him to Puri. The Brahaman and servant with four hundred coins made their way to Raghunath. Raghunath Das did not accept their help. Those two, however, remained at Puri with the money. Thereafter Raghunath with much ardour invited the Lord to accept alms of food twice a month. The two invitations cost eight Panas of Cowrie-shells. Raghunath took this sum from the Brahman and servant. Raghunath continued to invite the Lord for two years and then gave it up. When Raghunath did not invite Him to dinner for two months the Lord asked Swarup why Raghunath gave up inviting Him. Swarup replied that he had done so on deliberation. Raghunath thought that he had been inviting the Lord by accepting money from a worldling. He realised that the mind of the Lord could not be pleased by such invitation. As the Lord could not accept the offering with unmixed pleasure the only gain by such invitations was his own 'reputation'. The Lord accepted his invitation by reason of his entreaty thinking that if He declined to accept it his foolishness would make him sorry.' These considerations made Raghunath give up the practice of inviting the Lord.

On hearing this the Lord said with a smile. 'By feeding on the cooked food of worldlings the mind is made impure. If the mind becomes impure, it is no longer possible to recollect Krishna. The cooked food supplied by a worldling proceeds ultimately from motives of meritorious activity (rajas) tending to a worldly result. It, therefore, pollutes the minds of both donor and enjoyer. By reason of hesitation on his account I have accepted it so long. It is well that he has given it up by his own conviction.'

After a while Raghunath also ceased to attend at the Lion Gate for his food. He began to obtain his food by begging at the chhatras. On hearing of this from Govinda the Lord asked Swarup, 'Why does not Raghu stand for food at the Lion Gate ?' Swarup said, 'Feeling it troublesome to wait at the Lion Gate he begs his food at noon from the Chhatras.' The Lord said, 'He has done well by giving up his attendance at the Lion Gate. To beg at the Lion Gate is the trade of a harlot.—'He is coming, he will surely give,—he has given ; another is coming, he will give ; this person who is gone did not give ; another will come and give.' At the Chhatras one may fill his belly by whatever is obtainable. There is thus no other matter but chanting of Krishna with joy.'

Saying so the Lord once more bestowed His favour on Raghunath. He gave him the stone of Gobardhana and the garland of Gunja twigs. Shankarananda Saraswati had brought the stone and garland when he came from Brindaban. The gunja garland was attached to the side of the Gobardhana stone. Shankarananda laid these two before the Lord for His acceptance.

The Lord was delighted on receiving the two things, the like of which was not to be found before. He put on the garland of gunja at the time of recollection. The Lord nursed the Gobardhana stone by holding it to His Eyes and Bosom, receiving its odour and placing it on His Head. The stone was constantly bathed in His tears. The Lord called the stone the Body of Krishna'. He bore on His Person the stone and garland in that manner for the space of three years. Being pleased with Raghunath, He gave him the stone and garland.

The Lord said, 'This stone is the holy concentrated Form of Krishna. Worship Him with earnestness. Worship this Stone by the pure, rational method (sattvic) of service. You will obtain the treasure of the love of Krishna in no time. The sattvic worship is performed in the pure form by means of the spray of Tulasi and water procured in an earthen pitcher. Place one Tulasi spray inside two Tulasi leaves. Offer the Lord with faith eight sprays of Tulasi in this form. The Lord gave him this command as He made over to him the Stone with His own holy Hands.

Raghunath began to perform the worship with great joy. Swarup gave him two pieces of cloth half a cubit in size, one small board as a seat and one earthen Kunja to fetch the water. Raghunath worshipped the Lord in this fashion. At the time of worship he beheld the darling Son of the Chief of Braja in the Stone. Raghunath was overwhelmed with love as he thought of the Gobardhan Stone which the Lord had given him with His own Hands. The joy that is experienced by worship with Tulasi and water is not equalled by that of worship on a grand scale with the sixteen offerings. When Raghunath had continued to wors hip the Lord in this manner for some time Swarup Goswami said to him, 'Offer eight couris worth of Khaja (a kind of sweetmeat). If it be given with faith it becomes the equal of nectar.' Then Raghunath began to offer eight couris worth of Khaja which was supplied by Govinda by command of Swarup.

When Raghunath received the Stone and garland he arrived at the following conclusion regarding the intention of the Lord, 'The Lord has surrendered me to Gobardhan (Sri Krishna) by giving me the Stone and to the Feet of Radhika by giving me the Garland of Gunja.'

LONGING FOR SERVICE

1. Hari !
Sri Rupa Goswami In the form of Sree Guru
Taught in my ear,—
Learn the meaning of my words, You who beg for the gift of the Name ;
You will then find attraction in chanting the Name.

2. The Name, Form, Quality, The excellent Deeds of Krishna,
With the utmost care,
Apply to thy tongue And mind, in order
Following the Scriptural injunction.

3. Dwelling in Braja, Following the spontaneous bent of love Practise chanting and recollection.
In this manner employ Thy whole time,
Accept this as the essence of all teaching.

4. Ah ! Rupa Gosain ! When wilt thou, out of mercy,
Grant this wretch to live in Braja !
Thy soul is love ; To be the follower of thy feet
Is the hope of thy servant.

(X)

1. Gurudeva !
Out of thy great mercy, 'Mid the wood-land of Gauda,
Thou hast given me a place in Godruma.
Thou hast given me thy command,— Abiding here in Braja
You sing the Name of Hari.

2. But when, O revered one ! Wilt thou, out of thy mercy,
Bestow the fitness on this slave ?
When will my mind be tranquil, I will bear up with all,
And serve Hari with singleness of heart ?

3. In childhood and youth, By contact with worldly pleasure,
My habit has grown corrupt.
By my own evil deeds This body has become
A hindrance to the service of God.

4. Now in old age Smitten with the five-fold malady,
Teach me how I am to serve.
Crying with anguish, At thy feet
I fall in this great distress.

(XI)

1. Gurudeva !
By administering a particle of thy mercy, Make this servant of Thine
Infinitely more humble than a blade of grass.
Imparting strength To bear all trials
Make me unsolicitous of my own honour.

2. Give me, my Lord, The strength to honour all
In the manner that is due.
It is only then that with joy I will sing the Name of Hari,
And all offence will end.

3. When will this person, Gaining such mercy,
Be blessed, indeed, O Lord ?
Destitute of strength and wit I am very low ;
May thou make me thine.

4. To judge of my fitness, I find I have none,
Thy mercy is essential.
If thou art not merciful, I will not cease weeping
Till life itself is spent out.

Middle Part.

CHAPTER I

Summary :—In this Chapter are described the first manifestations of the Lord's loving perturbations, due to separation from Krishna, in the guise of his narration of the experience of His sojourn to Gaya after His return from there, the talks among the devotees regarding the novel mood of the Lord, the meeting of Shrihas, Shriman, Gadadhar, Sudashiva and other devotees at the residence of Shuklambar Brahmachary and their wonder and lamentations at sight of the Lord's loving condition of separation from Krishna, the Lord's visit to Gangadas Pandit and Mukunda Sanjaya, the anxiety of mother Shachi for her Son and her prayer to Krishna for His sake, expositions of texts by the Lord to His pupils to the effect that Krishna is the sole Meaning of all sounds and all scriptures, the Lord's bath in the Ganges, His discourse to His mother while taking His meal that all Scriptures point to Krishna and of the terrible tortures suffered by souls averse to Krisana during their stay in the mother's womb, Krishna-manifestations and expositions of Krishna in teaching His pupils, the proud words of the Lord declaring in His conversation with Gangadas Pandit that His exposition of the Scriptures signifying Krishna are above the scope of mental speculations, the Supreme Lord's absorption in the devotional mood by listening to Ratna-Garbha Acharya's reading with devotion of a shloka regarding Krishna, the Lord's exposition of the verbal name as power of Krishna, lamentations of His pupils as the Lord finally declared severance of His connection with them giving them His blessings, the sorrowful words of the author at the recollection of these pastimes of Shri Gaur Sundar, the Lord's teaching of the mode of congregational chanting of Krishna to His disciples, and other matters.

1 With Arms extending to the knee, of Colour yellow like that of gold,
The only Two progenitors of congregational chant, with wide Eyes resembling the lotus,
The Two protectors of the world, the Two Divine fosterers of the dispensation for the Age,
To these Two benefactors of the world, these Two manifest Embodiments of Divine Pity I make my obeisance !

2 My obeisance to the eternally Existent through three-fold Time, Son of Jagannath !
Obeisance to Thee, attended by Thy Servants, Sons and Consorts !

3 All and manifold glory to the King of the twice-born, Viswambhar !
Glory to the community of the Vaishnavas, loved of Viswambhar !

4 Glory to Gaurchandra, the Bridge to religion, most Patient!
Glory to His Beautiful Form replete with the harmonious chant!

5 Glory to the Friend, Treasure and Life of Nityananda!
Glory to the abode of the love of Gadadhar and Adwaita!

6 All glory to the Lord of His loved ones preceded by Shribas!
May thou bend Thy auspicious glance on jiva, O Lord!

7 Glory to the intensely Beloved of Shri Jagadananda Glory to the heart's love of Bakreswar and Kashishwar!

8. The words of the Middle Part are as the pieces of nectar,
By listening to which the wickedness of the heart is cancelled.

9 Listen, brother, with one mind to this narrative of the Middle Part,
The manner in which the congregational chant had its beginning,

10 Sri Ganrsunder returned Home after performing His pilgrimage to Gaya,
The City of Nadia rang with the tidings.

11 All His friends and relations ran to meet Him.
Some turned up earliest, some came next, others were the last to arrive.

12 The Lord greeted them all as was befitting for each,
All were gladdened by seeing Viswambhar.

13 They went forward to meet Him and brought Him home.
Vishwambhar spoke to them about the holy place.

14 The Lord said, 'By the blessing of you all
I return after visiting the holy land of Gaya without difficulty'.

15 The Lord spoke with the greatest humility;
All were pleased to notice the lowliness of the Lord.

16 Some desired Him a long life by placing their hands on His head
Some recited the Mantra, gently passing their hands over all parts of His body;

17 Some blessed by touching His bosom with their hands —
'May Govinda Whose bliss is most cooling vouchsafe His Grace.'

18 Fortunate Shachi was filled with happiness;
By looking upon her Son she did not know for joy where she was.

19 There was rajoicing in the family of the father of Lakshmi.
The sorrow of Lakshmi was dispelled by the sight of the face of her Lord.

20 All the Vaishnavas were gladdened.
Some of them instantly set out to see Him.

21 The Lord having accosted all with respect and humility,
Sent them away with kind words as they departed to their respective homes.

22 Taking aside three or four devotees of Vishnu,
The Lord held confidential talk.

23 The Lord said, 'Listen, all my friends, as I narrate
The wonders regarding Krishna, that I have seen at different places.

24 'No sooner did I enter into Gaya
The very first thing that I heard was a sound of great auspiciousness.

25 'Thousands of Brahmans were reading aloud the Veda,—
'Open your eyes behold Ye the Tirtha of the Feet-wash of Vishnu!'

26 'Formerly when Krishna came to Gaya,
The Lord washed His Feet as He stopped at this place.

27 'For being Whose Feet-wash the Ganges is so great,
The truth regarding Whose Feet-wash is known to Shiva by receiving the same on his head—

28 'This spot, by the power of the self-same Feet-wash of the Lord, Bears the name of Padodaka Tirtha.'

29 As the Lord uttered the name of the Tirtha of the Feet-wash
His twin lotus Eyes let loose an unrestrained stream of tears.

30 Till at last the Lord growing extremely uncontrollable,
Began to cry a good deal, calling upon the Name of Krishna.

31 The wood-land of flowers was flooded with the current of supreme Love!
The Lord repeatedly cried 'Krishna' amid a storm of sighs.

32 His whole Frame was covered with horripilation,
The Lord could not be calmed but trembled with shivering.

33 Sriman Pundit and the other devotees
Witnessed the wonderful weeping of love for Krishna.

34 The stream of love flowed on all sides of the Eyes:
As if Ganges herself manifested her presence.

35 In their minds all of them mused with wonder.
"We have never seen Him in such guise before.

36 The grace of Sri Krishna has now been His.
What Majesty of the Lord might He have beheld on the way?"

37 The Lord after a short while manifested His external consciousness,
And at last thus addressed them all.

38 The Lord said, 'My friends, go back to your homes to-day.
Do not fail to come tomorrow to the place I mention.

39 'Meeting you together at the secluded place
I will submit to you in privacy all My sorrows.

40 'Tomorrow to the house of Suklambar Brahmachari Yourselves and Sadashiva must come early.'

41 The Lord sent them away after greetings.
Lord Biswambhar occupied Himself with His proper Activities.

42 There was incessant super-imposition of Krishna in the Body of the Lord.
He behaved as one utterly averse to the world.

43 The mother could not understand the conduct of her Sons
Yet she felt transported with delight on beholding her Boy.

44 The Lord wept, crying aloud the Name of Krishna.
The mother saw that the courtyard was flooded with tears.

45 'Where is Krishna? Where, indeed, is Krishna?' cried the Lord.
And as He went on speaking, excessive love grew apace.

46 The mother could understand nothing, nor the cause of it
She besought the protection of Govinda with joined palms.

47 The Supreme Lord began to manifest Himself.
There was rejoicing all over the infinity of worlds!

48 'The Lord's auspicious beginning of showering His love,'—
So ran the report; on hearing this the brotherhood of the devotees came thither.

49 Those Vaishnavas who came to have a sight of the Lord,
The Lord greeted them all with kindness :

50 'Meet tomorrow at the house of Suklambar ;
I will submit My sorrows talking to you in seclusion.'

51 Sriman Pandit was filled with joy.
He was highly delighted on beholding love that was most worderful.

52 At early dawn after performing His morning duties, taking his basket,
He set out with a glad heart for gathering flowers.

53 In the home of Sribas there is a tree of Kunda flower.
The Purpose-Tree itself, as it were, manifest in the form of the flowering plant.

54 Whatever the number of flowers that the Vaishnabas pluck, they can never deplete.
The inexhaustible, irreducible flowers bloom there at all time !

55 Waking at early dawn all the devotees.
Met there for gathering the flowers.

56 All of them—Gadadhar, Gopinath, Ramai, Sribash, Plucked the flowers in the mellowness of Krishna-talk.

57 Even at such moment Sriman Pandit, making his way thither, Appeared in their midst with a laughing face.

58 They all asked, 'We find much laughter to-day'.
Said Sriman, 'There is of course good reason for it.'

59 The Bhagabatas said, 'Do speak out'.
'Hear my reason', said Sriman Pandit,—

60 'Most wonderful story, most impossible,— 'Nimai Pandit is become the greatest of Vaishnavas !'

61 'He has returned from Gaya with all felicity.
On hearing of this I went to greet Him in the afternoon.

62 'All His conversation bespoke of the utmost aversion of the world.
There was no manifestation of arrogance even for a moment.

63 'He began to talk of Krishna in private,—
Of the wonders that He had witnessed at the different places.

64 'No sooner did He utter the name of the Tirtha of the Holy Lotus-Feet,
All the place was filled with His tears.

65 'His whole Frame trembled very much, all the hair standing on end.
Ejaculating, 'Ah, Krishna,' He at once fell down on the ground.

66 'There was no sign of animation in any part of His Body as He swooned away.
After a while the external vision re-appeared with a startled motion.

67 'Till at last, as He began to weep crying 'Krishna',
It seemed as if the Goddess Ganges herself appeared in His eyes.

68 'By the devotion that I have witnessed in Him
There is no longer the belief in my mind that He is a mortal.

69 'On regaining external consciousness He only said this,
'Meet together at the house of Suklambar early tomorrow morning.

70 'To Yourself, Sadasiva and Murari Pandit I will confess My sorrows'.

71 'Most auspicious are these tidings that I have delivered to you;
There is certainly reason for believing it in every way.'

72 Those devotees, on hearing the words of Sriman, Triumphantly shouted the Name of Hari with a great voice.

73 The magnanimous Sribas was the first to speak,
'May Krishna increase our kindred !'

74 May our Gotra increase !

75 They all discoursed about Krishna with joy ;
And there arose the auspicious and most entrancing sound.

76 The Bhagabatas repeated the benediction, 'May it be so',
'May all persons serve the Feet of Krishna-Chandra'.

77 Having plucked the flowers in this manner the Bhagabatas
Departed for the performance of their worships.

78 Sriman Pandit proceeded to the bank of the Ganges,
To the residence of Suklambar Brahmachari.

79 On hearing these tidings the revered Gadhadhar
Hastened to the house of Suklambar :

80 'I will listen to the narrative of Krishna that He will relate' :—
He remained in hiding in Suklambar's house for this purpose.

81 Sadasiva, Murari, Sreeman, Suklambar,
All the loving followers, gathered together.

82 At this juncture presently the King of the twice-born, Biswambhar, Made His appearance and mingled in the assembly of the Vaishnavas.

83 All of them greeted Him with the greatest joy,
The Lord did not manifest any external vision.

84 So soon as the Lord caught the sight of the Bhagabatas
He began to recite texts descriptive of devotion,

85 'I obtained My Lord ;—Oh, whither did He go ?'
With these words the Lord fell down on the ground with the pillar held in embrace.

86 The column of the room broke under the pressure of the Lord.
He fell prone with dishevelled hair crying, 'Where is Krishna ?'

87 No Sooner did the Lord fall down exclaiming 'Oh, Krishna' !
Than all the devotees tottered and fell on the ground.

88 Gadadhar swooned away inside the room ;
There was no knowing where one fell in this indiscriminate tumble.

89 All of them became unconscious by the bliss of the love of Krishna,
And the Goddess Jahnavi smiled in amazement !

90 After a while Biswambhar manifesting external consciousness
Began to cry long and piteously, uttering the Name of Krishna :

91 'Oh, Krishna ! Oh, My Lord ! Oh, whither hast Thou gone ?'
Saying this the Lord fell down on the ground time and again.

92 The Lord, Darling Son of Sachi, cried for love of Krishna ;
The Bhagabatas wept aloud surrounding Him on all sides.

93 There was no end of falls of the holy Form.
The Lord knew nothing of this by the pastime of love for Himself.

94 There arose the concerted sound of the chant, weeping of love :
Suklambar's house was filled with loving devotion !

95 Biswambhar sat up becalmed after a while ;
Yet the stream of bliss flowed unceasingly.

96 The Lord said, 'Who is inside the room ?'
Brahmachari replied, 'It is Your own Gadadhar.'

97 Gadadhar was weeping with his head bent low.
Lord Biswambhar was pleased by the sight.

98 The Lord said, 'Gadadhar, you are truly fortunate by your previous good deeds.
From your infancy you have fixed your mind firmly on Krishna.

99 'This precious birth of Mine has passed away tasting vanity.
I, indeed, obtained the priceless Treasure ;
It has left Me by defect of luck,'

100 Saying this Biswambhar fell down on the bare earth.
The Form that is the Object of universal adoration, rolled in the dust !

101 The external consciousness repeatedly returned,—the Lord fell as often ;
He beat the ground with His Face and Nose;
His Life was preserved by Providence.

102 He could not open His Eyes for tears of love.
His beautiful Mouth could articulate only the Name of Krishna.

103 Biswambhar wept clasping the necks of all,
'Where is Krishna ?—Brothers, tell me quickly.'

104 The devotees wept on beholding the earnest longing of the lord.
No other sound could manifest itself in any one's mouth.

105 The Lord said, 'Relieve My sorrows;
Oh, bring Me the Darling Son of the Prince of the Gopas' !

106 So saying, heaving great sighs, He cried time and again.
He would not bind the tresses of His hair that trailed on the ground.

107 The whole day passed away like a moment in this bliss
The Lord then took leave of the devotees for a brief interval.

108 Gadadhar, Sadasiva, Sriman Pandit,
Suklambar and the others were all filled with amazement.

109 All of them were made dumb by the love they had witnessed.
By the sight of that which had never before been seen their bodies had no external activity.

110 All of them joyfully made their way to the community of the Vaishnavas.
They narrated to them in every detail all occurrences.

111 On hearing the good tidings all those great Bhagabatas
Wept crying, 'Hari, Hari.'

112 On hearing of this unheard-of love, all were filled with wonder.
Some said,—'May be that God is manifest Himself.'

113 Some said, 'If Nimai Pandit turns out well,
We can tear off the heads of the atheists with ease.'

114 Some said, 'This seems to be a mystery regarding Krishna.
There is no doubt of it, know this as certain.'

115 Some said, 'From association with Iswar Puri
He must have beheld some manifestation of Krishna at Gaya.'

116 In this manner with joy all the devotees
Spoke severally in diverse ways.

117 Jointly they all began to bless Him,
'May the mercy of Krishna prove true by all means'.

118 All of them began to perform the chant with delight.
Some sang, some danced, some wept outright.

119 In this manner the devotees passed their time in happiness.
The Lord remained immersed in His Own mellowness.

120 Evincing a slight manifestation of external consciousness
Biswambhar set out for the home of Pandit Gangadas.

121 The Lord greeted the feet of His teacher,
The Guru, rising with a sense of regard, embraced Him.

122 The teacher said, 'Blest, indeed, is Your life, my Dear ;
You have effected the deliverance of the whole kin of your father and mother.

123 'All Your pupils also know only Yourself.
They would not open their books at the bidding of Brahma.

124 'You have now come back to the view of us all.
Begin to reach your pupils from tomorrow go back to Thy home for this day.'

125 After making His obeisance to His guru, Biswambhar left the place, Encircled by His pupils like, the Moon amid the stars.

126 He came on to the home of Sri Mukunda Sanjaya.
Arrived there He took His seat inside the Hall of Chandi.

127 The joy that manifested itself in Mukunda Sanjaya
And his whole family, knew no bounds.

128 The Lord drew Purushottam Sanjaya into His embrace.
He drenched his body with His tears.

129 The women began to utter the ejaculatory note of triumph.
There was the greatest rejoicing in the house of Mukunda.

130 Bestowing His auspicious glance on all
The Supreme Lord came to His Own Home.

131 On reaching Home the Lord sat at the entrance of the shrine of Vishnu ;
He bade farewell to His companions with expressions of affection.

132 None of those who came there to greet Him
Could understand the ways of the Lord.

Ourselves

Annual celebrations at Sri Purushottam Math, Puri.

The annual celebrations commenced on May 1st and are in full progress. The usual daily programme includes reading and exposition of the Srimad Bhagabat, lectures on the religion of the Bhagabat, congregational chant of Sri Hari and mutual discourse. The celebrations will continue till the 6th of July. The long duration of the celebration is justified by the declaration of the Scriptures that in the Iron Age the eternal religion will be propagated from Purushottam in Utkal. This statement has been fulfilled by the propaganda of Sri Chaitanya Deva in the guise of a Sannyasin carried on from Puri where the Supreme Lord as Teacher resided continuously for the period of eighteen years. It is in the fitness of things, therefore, that the position of Puri as the premier preaching centre of the eternal religion in the Iron Age is conceded by all who have any faith in our Scriptures. Rev. H. Collins and Prof. Rosen of Srirampur College were much pleased on hearing from the lips of His Holiness Srimad Ban Maharaj a learned discourse on the Vaishnava philosophy, during their visit to Sri Purushottam Math on the 28th of May.

'Sridham'

The Post Master General of Bengal and Assam has permitted the use of the address 'Sridham' in forwarding all telegraphic messages to the Daily Nadia Prakash with effect from the 5th of May. The messages will be received by Nabadwip Telegraph office and by it despatched to the office of the Nadia Prakash at Sridham Mayapur without delay. Telegraphic messages for the Nadia Prakash are pouring in from all sides and the readers of the journal will receive first-hand information of important events at the earliest moment after their occurence.

Dr. Nepar at the Gaudiya Math.

Mr. E. H. Nepar M. P. S. had an interview with His Divine Grace at the Gaudiya Math at 4.30 P. M. on May 4. The conversation turned on the nature of the transcendental sound as the source of spiritual knowledge. The spiritual preceptor is the bearer of the message of the eternal and delivers the same by bringing about the appearance of the transcendental sound on the lips of those who seek for enlightenment by submissive listening at the feet of the spiritual preceptor. This is the conclusion of all spiritual Scriptures. Mr. Nepar expressed his gratitude for being favoured with the communication of what he admitted to be a reasonable although to him wholly novel view regarding the easy and only method of attaining spiritual enlightenment.

Shrines of the Foot-prints of Sri Chaitanya Deva at Jajpur.

The work of construction of the Foot-prints shrine of Sri Chaitanya Deva was commenced here on the 28th May. Sri Chaitanya Bhagabat mentions the visit of Sri Chaitanya Deva to the temple of Sree Baraha Deva at Jajpur.

Proposed establishment of five shrines of the Foot-prints of Sri Chaitanya Deva.

As the result of his service of Sri Sri Guru-Gauranga Sripad Atulchandra Baudopadhyaya Goswami Bhaktisaranga Bhaktishastri, Secretary of the Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha, has received offers of pecuniary help for the establishment of five shrines of the Foot-prints of Sri Chaitanya Deva from the following devotees of District Howrah :—

1. Srijut Aswini Kumar Sardar of Village Raghunathpur.
2. Sj Upendra Nath Kayal of Palpara
3. Sj Vasudev Mandal of Nabagram
4. Sj Fakir Chandra Karar of Kanagram
5. Srijakta Rani Dei of Durgapur.

Place of appearance of Sri Lokanath Prabhu

On the 23rd of May the site of the advent of Sri Lokanath prabhu was restored to the homage and prominent view of the public by appropriate devotional activities performed there by the residents of the locality at the earnest solicitations of Sripad Ramanath Bhattacharjya Goswami in pursuance of the wishes of His Divine Grace Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj. It is proposed to establish a branch of Sri Chaitanya Math on the site which is located in the District of Jessore at the village of Talkhari in the Sub Division of Magura. Srila Lokanath Goswami Prabhu is the Diksha Guru of Srila Thakur Narottam. Our hearty thanks are offered to the Zemindar of Talkhari Srijukta Bharat Chandra Bhattacharya, Srijukta Shibdas Bhattacharya, Srijukta Dhirendra Nath Bhattacharya and other sympathisers.

Great gathering at Chhatnai.

A vast gathering of the local residents, including a large number of respectable Mohammadan gentlemen and students, at the village of Chhatnai in the District of Jessore, was addressed on the 12th of May on the subject of the duty of serving Hari during the period of childhood, by Pandit Sripad Radha Charan Goswami Bhaktiratna Bhaktishastri by way of narration of the activities of Sri Sri Gauranga Deva. The great assembly listened spell-bound to the lucid exposition of the learned speaker who is one of the well-known preachers of the Gaudiya Math, Calcutta.

Restoration of Sri Alalnath Temple.

A handsome donation of Rupees five hundred has been sanctioned by Srijukta Vishnupriya Chaudhurani proprietress of the Chaudhury Estates of Maligbati, District Midnapur, towards restoration of the temple of Sri Alalnath.

Propaganda at Bulandsar, U. P.

His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Sarvaswa Giri Maharaj by command of His Divine Grace Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Paramhansa Thakur is employed in preaching the teachings of Sri Chaitanya Deva at Bulandsar, in English and Hindi languages. His Holiness lectured in the Raj Rajeswar Temple and expounded Bhagabat at the residences of Babu Durga Charan, Chairman of the Municipality, and Babu Jogesh Narain, Government Pleader. Swamiji Maharaj also delivered on the 25th of May a lecture in English, which was highly appreciated, at Prithvinath Dharmashala on universal love before a distinguished and representative gathering of the people.

Preaching in Barisal and Jessore

His Holiness Tridandi Swami Sripad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj preached at the following villages from the 22nd to the 30th of May, Viz. Benodenagar, Kachubere, Kuralia, Auria, Hatbaria Bhadrabila. His Holiness lectured on Sanatan Dharma at the Town Hall of Narail on the 31st May and 1st June. Swamiji Maharaj in the course of his speech referred to the starting of the monthly ournal Sri Sajjantoshani for propagation of the religion of unalloyed devotion by Thakur Bhaktivinode from Narail during his residence there as Officer-in-charge of the Sub-Division during the years 1878-1880. The Sub Divisional Officer and all the leading gentlemen of the place graced the meetings by their presence. Srijukta Bidhu Bhusan Bhowmik, the well-known pleader of Narail, rendered magnanimous hospitality to Swamiji Maharaj and party by receiving them into his residence as guests. The people of Narail have been deeply impressed by the learned discourses of His Holiness.

IN THE PRESS

Srimad Bhagabat. The work has been completed with indexes up to the end of the ninth Skandha in forty-seven parts. Seventyfour Chapters of the tenth Skandha have been printed. The printing of the eleventh Skandha has already been commenced separately.

Sri Chaitanya Bhagabat (2nd Edition). The publication of Madhya and Antya Khandas of Sri Chaitanya Bhagabat has been delayed owing to certain unavoidable causes. The Car Festival of Sri Sri Jagannath Deva

THE Car Festival of Sri Sri Jagannath Deva was celebrated on the 28th of June. It proved to be a day of heavy rain. The devotees of Sri Purushottam Math in pursuance of the example and teaching of Sri Chaitanya Deva performed the due observance of the auspicious occasion by the chanting of Kirtan in front of the moving Car of Sri Sri Jagannath Deva. The Kirtan party was led by His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Viveka Bharati Maharaj whose towered head and shoulders above the vast assemblage of pilgrims and whose moving and sonorous voice reached every ear. His Holiness sang the verses of the Chaitanya Charitamrita. These verses were made by Shri Swarup Damodar on the occasion when Shri Chaitanya Deva instituted the chant before the Car, to express the thoughts of the Lord Himself in regard to the function. The words of Swarup Goswami should be appreciated by our readers in the original in the pages of Shri Chaitanya Charitamrita. No translation can do them justice. It is my intention to submit for the sympathetic consideration of devotees certain thoughts suggested by those verses as to how Sri Chaitanya requires us to regard the Car Festival.

Sri Chaitanya is delighted to find Sri Jagannath Deva on the move in His Car from Neelachal to Sri Gundicha. Sri Chaitanya is not satisfied with the dress, the country or the occupation of the Lord at Neelachal. The worship of Sri Jagannath Deva at Neelachal does not satisfy Him. At Neelachal the Lord is surrounded by pomp and power. He is served by kings and warriors in the manner that is appropriate in such surrounding. But it leaves the heart bereft of the service of its Beloved.

Sri Chaitanya wants the Lord to appear in His heart and accept the worship of His heart which is obstructed by the display of the Majesty of the Lord of the Universe. Sri Chaitanya wants to worship the Lord, as the denizens of Braja worshipped Him, in perfect confidence in the ordinary relationships of life. That would be natural and far more congenial to the innermost disposition of the heart.

But the Lord is His own Master. He is also the Lord of the Universe. He can, indeed, be loved with the whole heart. He is so perfectly loveable that it is not possible not to love Him. But it is not similarly possible to have Him always sufficiently near for the purpose of serving Him in the intimate relationships of domestic life. But the heart is not satisfied by rendering only distant homage to the King of Kings, Who can be properly approached only by the formalities of reverence. The King as King has no equals and no superiors. He can have only subjects. There can be for this reason no unreserved intimacy between the King and His subjects. The very atmosphere is unsuitable for the exercise of the personal relationships. The Office is the object of all homage rendered ostensibly to the Person Who holds it. The person in office can have no individual requirements or predilections. He has also to submit to be served by a uniform round of official formalities.

At Neelachal Sri Jagannath is hedged round by all the impassable barriers of an elaborate and formal worship from day to day. He is not permitted to be served according to the particular aptitudes of particular persons. It is of the nature of obedience extorted by force. The people of this world would not even serve their Lord unless they were forced. They are inclined to serve the Lord in expectation of rewards and through fear of punishment. Such persons have no occasion to be dissatisfied with such arrangement. The contented subjects of the Great King of Kings live in perfect peace and happiness under His most benign government. They are secure in the enjoyment of all felicity under the protecting care of the Lord. They have reason to be extremely grateful to Him for this and to adore Him with sincere good will, loyalty and obedience. The power of the Lord is so great and so irresistible that even the most wicked find it convenient not to openly transgress His laws.

But these subjects have other and dearer relationships of their own. In fact they really serve the king only for the sake of those relationships. The King is loved as the protector of those interests. The King Himself is not those interests. No one of His subjects ever seriously wants the King to be a member of his family. He is not sufficiently known to them to inspire such longing for His inclusion into the domestic circle. Moreover the King would be uncomfortable in the home of a subject who cannot be expected to supply his royal needs with his limited resources. A loyal subject would not, therefore, properly enough like to see the King reduced to his own less dignified condition. So the very arrangement does not permit of any other healthy relationship than one of distant and reverential loyal homage. Neither can a perfectly loyal subject properly desire any other kind of relationship.

Sri Chaitanya is prepared also to render all this homage to the King. But He is not satisfied with this. He is willing to have the Lord in His home in order to serve Him in the ordinary domestic relationships unobstructed by the etiquettes of the Court or the Harem. He finds it impossible to be on a footing of such real intimacy with the Lord when He is constantly waited upon by Kings and Warriors, Queens and Maids-in-wating, and by all the pomp and circumstance of Royalty. These are no doubt His due and those people are most fortunate who have an opportunity of serving such a King. Neither do the denizens of Braja resent the assumption of the royal state by their Beloved Who has to ignore His relationships with them for the purpose.

But the denizens of Braja can never forget Him. They also cannot leave Braja and migrate to His Kingdom to live there as His contented subjects. They long very much to have Him in their midst in Braja to live with them in unreserved intimacy in that happy rural surrounding. They want to love Him as a private person in every form of intimate relationship and not merely to serve His Majesty. They can be content with nothing less than this, because He is truly the Life of their very lives.

Sri Chaitanya is, therefore, delighted when He finds the Lord moving towards Sri Gundicha which is no other than the heart of the devotee.

The All-Vaishnava Conference

THE conference of Vaishnavas that the Viswa-Vaishnava Raj-Sabha intend to invite to meet on the occasion of the Annual Celebrations of the Gaudiya Math was rendered into the English language as 'Theistic Conference' in a previous issue of this Journal. But there is really speaking no word in English or any other language that possesses the exact connotation of the term 'Vaishnava.' We, therefore, intend to retain the word 'Vaishnava' itself as being the most appropriate word to express the object of the conveners.

It is necessary to explain the reason for this preference to prevent any possible misunderstanding. The word 'Vaishnava' does not refer to anything of this world, either directly or indirectly. It means the servant of Vishnu and has not been coined by the linguists of this world. An etymological meaning has no doubt been ascribed by Grammar to the word Vishnu. Vishnu etymologically means the 'All-pervasive.' But the etymological meaning although apparently perfectly intelligible and acceptable to all people of this world and for that reason also convenient for adoption as implying a sufficiently distinguishing attribute of Godhead, is not, however, the true meaning of the word itself.

The peculiarity of the word 'Vishnu' consists in this that it is transcendental, that is, part and parcel of the revelation. The Name Vishnu, in other words, is identical with Godhead Himself. This peculiarity inhering in the word is necessarily incomprehensible to the limited intellect of man. The word Vaishnava as the name of the servant of 'Vishnu' is similarly identical with the devotee of God. The word 'Theist' is not claimed to have been revealed and has been coined by man ; and, therefore, belongs to this world and is so regarded by all who use it. It has a worldly connotation and can have, for this reason, no reference to the spiritual except by way of analogy which process can never be of any spiritual benefit to those who are not in a position to realise its analogical nature.

Therefore, to translate the word Vaishnava into 'Theist' or 'Devotee' is opposed to the fundamental principle of real transcendentalism. There is nothing to be gained by this unnecessary concession to vague thinking on the subject of the Absolute. On the other hand the adoption of the real nomenclature at the outset will prevent all further difficulty in the future.

The holy Names of the Godhead are not fabrications of the human brain like other names current among the nations that refer to things of this world. There are no doubt also epithets of Godhead coined by man. Such epithets need not be classed with the real Names. The Names 'Vishnu', 'Krishna', etc., are the eternal Names of the Godhead. As such they are identical with the Form, Quality, Activity and Paraphernalia of the Absolute. The holy Name of Godhead possesses this additional power by the will of Godhead that he is the first to appear in this world to the Truth-seeking cognitive faculty of the soul who is not satisfied with worldliness. The spiritual nature of the holy Name and His descent into the purified consciousness of the sincere seeker of the Truth is the only means of spiritual enlightenment revealed by the Scriptures available to us. The holy Name in the Form of the Word or spoken Sound belongs to the realm of the Absolute. The holy Name is Godhead Himself and is the Source of all cognition. The cognition of the individual soul of man is a derivative, conditioned by the will of the Source. The limitation of human cognition is willed by the Source. Deliverance from limitation also proceeds from the same quarter.

So long as the ban of limitation is not lifted from the cognitive faculty of a person he is unable to realise the real nature of the holy Name even when He chooses to appear in this world in the Form of the spoken Sound. It is open to the Sound or Name Himself to lift the ban. It is His will revealed in the Scriptures to lift the ban if the individual soul is sincerely inclined to seek for real enlightenment, which can only be by grace.

Atheism is nothing but refusal to recognise the supreme necessity of Divine Grace and, by implication, of the implied necessity of receiving enlightenment from the servant of God, in the form of the spoken Name. Any concession in the matter of nomenclature is thus a concession to the atheistical disposition. The atheist alone can insist on his own concocted terminology in pursuance of his principle not to recognise the necessity of Divine Grace and its implications. Such persons are not likely to be benefited by any discussion of the subject of the Absolute and are excluded from real participation in such discussion by deference to their own bad logic.

The term 'Theism' which is so current and is regarded as being properly applicable for designating the revealed creeds, is not free from very grave defect for the purpose of expressing the real Truth. Theology should not allow itself to degenerate into a mere speculative science on a line with the empiric sciences. There is a real

Subject of investigation for theology and One Who is categorically different from the subjects of investigation of the speculative intellect. This clear demarcation must be preserved with sufficient care which cannot well be expected from those who are themselves wholly ignorant of the Truth. No competent mechanic will agree to run his locomotive except by the proper method because he really means to run his machine. The speculators on the Absolute are not in the know and should be wise enough to have the modesty of their utter ignorance. They should not regard the conduct of the hypothical mechanic as either narrow or orthodox for the reason that it happens not to be identical with their unproved speculations. The real theologian must possess the degree of orthodoxy of the competent mechanic and need not give up his function of guiding the machine properly by uncalled-for deference to the wishes of the passengers who never expect any such foolish concession to their irresponsible opinions.

If it be asked whether it will be possible for those who are not in the know to follow any discussion conducted in transcendental vocabulary, the answer is that the business is to understand the transcendental by means of the transcendental by the grace of the transcendental. It should, therefore, be possible for one who is not in the know to join in the discussion as learner, but only as learner. If he wants to know, the discussion will be intelligible. If he wants to serve it will also appeal to his conviction. All this will be possible by the grace of the transcendental teacher, because, being in the know, he can properly manipulate the analogical vocabulary to explain the nature of the holy Name of Krishna as being the only Means as well as Goal of all spiritual endeavour.

There is a distinction without difference between Krishna and Vishnu. The vision of the individual soul is derived from Vishnu. It is Baladeva Vishnu, the Primary manifested Form of Krishna, Who is the direct Source of all individual souls. In this sense all individual souls are the fractional dissociated parts of Vishnu or in other words the dependent extensions of His spiritual essence. In this sense all individual souls are Vaishnavas, that is servants or dependants of Vishnu, by their constitution.

Krishna is the Master, Vishnu is the functionary, individual souls are the living instruments and the service of Krishna is the function. But the service of Krishna is the direct function of Vishnu. The service of Vishnu is the direct function of the individual souls. The one function is, however, identical with the other. There is distinction without difference. The service of Krishna is realisable by the individual souls through and in the service of Vishnu. The spiritual Teacher or Acharya is the manifestation of the plenary power of Vishnu.

The atheist is also a Vaishnava by constitution, but not by disposition. His aversion to Vishnu is due to the abuse of freedom of will which is the natural condition of cognition forming the staff of the individual soul. The atheist is unwilling to serve Vishnu. He is, therefore, deluded to serve Vishnu and he can thus exist only through ignorance which overtakes the soul although he is by constitution perfectly self-conscious. This is the natural state. The atheist is a disobedient servant of Vishnu whose existence is maintained by the mercy of Vishnu in the form of His deluding Energy which persuades the Atheist to accept willingly the ignorant service of Vishnu under the impression that the atheist is his own master in doing so.

Therefore, the Viswa-Vaishnava Raj-Sabha is truly catholic, without making any concession to the deluding energy, in inviting all persons without distinction of caste, creed, or colour to the Vaishnava conference to be held on the occasion of the Annual celebrations of the Gaudiya Math of Calcutta to participate in discourses for the purpose of being enlightened regarding the Absolute Truth by the grace of the Acharyya.

Presidential address

(at the thirty-sixth annual session of the Sridham Pracharini Sabha)

I am afraid, you have all got tired by now at this late hour of the evening and I should not like to take your time for long.

Thirty-six years ago this association met for the first time in the town of Krishnagar. From some time before this meeting discussions for spreading the knowledge of Sreedham Mayapur had been going on, as the result of which and at the unanimous desire of sympathisers this Association came into existence, and the Sree-Bigrahas (the holy Forms of Godhead) were installed at the Yogapitha (the holy Site of the Lord's Appearance) at Sreedham-Mayapur.

I am extremely glad to see amongst us this night Rajarshi Nafar Chandra Pal Chowdhury Bhaktibhushan, one of the foremost of the first organisers who is Secretary of this Association. The enthusiasm of a youth in this grand old Octogenerian for taking part in the deliberations of this meeting with a view to encourage us in whatever little success we have achieved in this direction inspite of our difficult position, is highly commendable and deserves our best thanks. Up till now he has remained closely associated with us as our Secretary, and we highly value his co-operation. Words of encouragement and hope from such old friends always help us to keep up our ardour in the midst of hard struggle against odds. I am afraid I fail, for my poverty of expression, to adequately convey my joy and thanks to him.

We too have advanced in years and are shortly to be classed among the superannuated. We cherish greater hopes in our younger generations who have taken up the service of Sreedham and are devoting their valuable time and energy—even their whole life-to this cause. Let us hope, brighter prospects await us in every moment of the future.

The service of the holy Name, of the holy Dha´m (the transcendental Abode) and of the supreme Desire of Godhead is available to all of us. Whoever takes any part in them, deserves the grateful regard of the whole world. There is no other means of escape from the clutches of worldly inclinations for any creature than the service of the holy Name. The service of the Name enables humanity to free itself from the hold of all superstitions and wrong ideas, and to be footed in the service of the Desire of Krishna (Krishna-Ka´ma). The service of Dham frees one from the jaws of Illusion (Ma´ya´-v´ada),—the terribly wrong theory that a jiva or creature is himself God and Master, and that there is no existence, except in the human imagination, of the holy Name, Form, Attributes, Pastimes (Lila´) and Paraphernalia of Godhead. The service of Krishna's Desire saves one from the hand of the great foe of hankering for one's own sensuous gratification. One is thereby freed from serving the earthly passions and may be installed in the service of the Desire of the transcendental Despot, in the singing of the saving hymn of transcendental love (कामगायत्री)

As the consequence of putting on this gross physical body, base desires for the gratification of physical senses have cropped up. In consequence of the coil of the subtle material or mental body indifference to the service of Godhead has grown, and mental speculations are ever driving us in the opposite direction. But this wrong direction is turned towards right if the inclination and taste for the service of Krishna's Desire dawns forth. The service of Krishna's desire is gained if and when we take to the service of Sreedham.

The Sanskrit word 'Dham' has different lexiconic meanings. But in the sense in which it is understood by the wise or seers it means 'that region or place where there is no scope of any desire for injury, of envy and of mortality, and which is ever self-effulgent, spiritual and blissful.' Our Lord Chaitanya was pleased to appear in this Sree Dham in order to awaken the world to the consciousness of its real nature.

But unfortunately we were not aware of the glory and majesty of the Dham. Hence we so long busied ourselves with other activities. We had no taste for the service of the Dham. We had no faith in the worship of the Forms of God. We engaged ourselves in studies and laboured under the idea of dominating over the people of the world by our empirical reasoning, scholarship, genius and force of moral character. But a great soul directed us for the first time to the service of Dham with the advice that all good would be gained by such service. The preaching of Sree Dham in the present time is the outcome of the efforts of that great soul who engaged us in the simultaneous service of the holy Name, the Abode, and the Desire of Krishna. We wish and pray that his teachings and ideal may encourage all of us to the service of Sree Dham. Because the service of Sree Dham will lead us, as a matter of course, to the service of the holy Name and the holy Desire of Krishna. Relation with the worldly abode, and hankering after the ordinary worldly life soon cease for one who realises his relation with Sreedham. Relation with Sree Dham being established, the Means of the service of the holy Name soon brings one to the Goal of the service of Krishna's Desire, and this is the only Object of life.

Every created thing is a prey to Time, and we can hardly have our hopes for any length of time. Why then is this attraction for things so transitory? Why are these frantic efforts for one's own sensuous gratification? Why is there no attraction for Krishna? —no desire for serving Krishna? Why is there such strong aversion to God? We are quite indifferent and blind to the transcendental. Diverse systems of secular education have completely enveloped us The cultivation of secular and spurious so-called spiritual literature may make us at most only mental speculationists. But that will bring us no real good. Can we not then rid ourselves from the errors of judgment of the human race? Certainly we can. If only we seek the refuge of the spiritual we can surely get out of all the miseries of this detestable materialism or worldliness.

The only spiritual Entity or Reality Who has mercifully descended to this world is the holy Name of Krishna, Who ever dwells in His transcendental realm. That transcendental locality where He manifests Himself and displays His Activities is Sreedham. By the service of Sreedham the service of the holy Name and the all-holy Desire of Krishna is attained. Mere pretence to serve the Name apart from the service of Sreedham, and living aloof from all relations therewith, does never lead to the goal of the service of the holy Desire of Krishna (Krishna-ka´ma).

No good can ever accrue to any jiva or creature except by complete surrender to the lotus Feet of Sri Chaitanya. If it ever comes to our knowledge,—even as a flash of lightening, through the causeless mercy of Chaitanya's own servants,—as to what the function of the pure cognition, viz., the individual soul, is, then and then only we can be saved from the counsels of our fellow-mortals in this realm of the darkness of ignorance.

For the last thirty six years information about Sreedham has been propagated to a great extent in various ways. But Ah ! The curse of our fate ! Many are still found to be wholly averse to the investigation of Truth. They are awfully busy with many other activities ! But such non-essential activities are but an index of ignorance and of aversion to accept the unmixed blessing.

One of the principal objects of the Association was to make an effort for the spread of the culture of transcendental learning. Unfortunately for us, the place which was once famous as a great seat of spiritual learning is at present wholly lacking in that culture. We know from the past history of Nabadwip that students from distant countries used to flock to this place for education in transcendental learning. Even to this day students, though few in number, come for secular education to the town of Nabadwip—Kulia-Nabadwip,—dominated by the (Vaishya) economic mentality. When Lord Chaitanya introduced and taught the superphenomenal connotation of literature in Sreedham Mayapur Nabadwip, seekers of Truth began to pour in from distant countries, in great numbers. When, as Professor of the science of Vyakarana, the great Lord interpreted every aphorism, every primary Grammatical function, word, base, and inflexion as pointing in its real connotation to Krishna only, also when He pointed out that the efforts of all literatures and sciences,—whether in Brahmi Kharosti, Sankey, or Pushkarasadi,—pointed only to non-Krishna in their delusive phenomenal connotation, when He pointed out that Krishna is the only Word and also Its only Meaning (the only object of connotation) as well, in all languages, of all scripts, there was a great consternation among His pupils of secular learning. But lovers and seekers of the Truth began to flock round His lotus Feet for education in the transcendental literature. But the service of the holy Name, Who is the Life and Soul of this transcendental learning, is not possible unless and until one takes up his abode here in Sree Dham. And the service of the holy Desire of Krishna (Krishna-Ka´ma) is not possible without the method of the successful service of Krishna's Name.

This Association now claims its members from among the educated of all communities in India. But what can we offer to its first organisers except our sincere regards and thanks ? We pray that their holy memory may continue to inspire us to the service of the Association.

The Octave containing the Teaching of Sri Chaitanya

(Prof. Nimananda Das Adhikari B. Ag. B. T. Sevatirtha, Bhaktishastri).

चेतो दर्पणमार्ज्जनं भवमहादावाग्निनिर्वापनं श्रेयःकैरवचन्द्रिका-वितरणं विद्यावधूजीवनम् ।
आनन्दाम्बुधिवर्द्धनं प्रतिपदं पूर्णामृतास्वादनं सर्वात्मस्नपनं परं विजयते श्रीकृष्णसङ्कीर्त्तनम् ॥

The universal Teacher Sri Gaur Sundar did not Himself write any book but He was pleased to impart to His eternal associates the inclination that manifested itself in their penning many a volume that, on one hand, stemmed the tide of the illusionist philosophy of Shankara (Mayavad) which was then at the zenith of its false glory and, on the other hand, shed, like so many torches, a refulgent light on the path which He, out of overwhelming mercy, thus chalked out for all benighted travellers like ourselves. Sri Chaitanya Deva Himself, however, condensed His teachings into eight shlokas composed by Himself which He has left to us as the eternal legacy which, while testifying to His historical appearance, give in a nutshell the universal religion of all souls that He preached and practised for our sake. These eight shlokas go by the name of 'Sikshashtakam.'

The shloka quoted above is the first of these eight shlokas. We make an attempt to discuss here its meaning, and shall, if it pleases Him, discuss the meanings of the other shlokas later on. But, while so doing, we confess that our thinking principle is so much crippled by the shackles of Maya, that it can hardly hope to peep into the uncompassable scope of their significance which can be grasped aright and expressed in an infinitesimally small measure only by those whom He is pleased to raise to that level of thinking that water-marks the flood-tide of Maya. The only consolation that motivates our endeavour is that it may be blessed by the glance of approval of one honest seeker of the Truth and by the power of his good-will may engender in us a fervent desire to dive deeper down into the innermost recess of the heart of the Vaishnavas who being the only custodians of the Divine light can impart the enlightenment that will reveal to us the real meaning of the shloka embodying the actual words of the Supreme Lord Himself.

Seekers of the Truth may be put into two broad groups, viz. (1) the believers and (2) the non-believers. The former, adopting mainly the process of deduction, try to realise the Truth through the advocacy of the Divine guide (Sri Gurudeva), whereas the latter, preferring the method of induction, try to realise it by means of their own ascending efforts. Thus with the difference in the method of efforts originates difference of the schools, in logical conformity with the different view points that they hold of the Absolute Truth.

Karmins, Yogins and Jnanins are the non-believers and the Bhaktas are the believers. Karmins maintain that their good actions, by their own efficacy, without the grace of God, can work out their liberation from the evils of the present existence. The nature of this liberation is not defined. Yogins realise the supreme Soul (Paramatma) as the ultimate Reality. It is supposed to be very subtle, and to pervade this universe through and through. Jiva or the individual soul is conceived as a part of It encased in this physical body. By salvation or liberation they mean the reunion of the individual soul (or the Atma) with the Supreme Soul (Paramatma), and they try to bring about this supreme desideratum by regulating the work of the respiratory system. Jnanins on the other hand mean by salvation extinction of the distinctive self into a state where there is no observer, no observed and no observation; and they try to work it out by means of self-denial.

The devotees (Bhaktas) believe in the Personality of God; and by salvation they mean the eternal service of the Supreme Lord. This salvation, they say, is in the Hands of God. He knows whom to take back into the kingdom of heaven as His servant and whom to refuse. They say to the Karmins, "Your actions cannot be binding upon God Who is free.' To the Yogins they say, 'Your supreme Soul (Paramatma) being hinged on the existence of this universe which is not eternal cannot be the ultimate Reality and your union with this Paramatma cannot, therfore, be also eternal'. To the Jnanins they say, 'You may deny God, you may deny yourself, but your denial cannot bring about any change in the subjective nature of God Who is ever unchangeable and unchallengeable. He is what He is and not what you want to make Him to be.'

Bhaktas in loyal conformity with the Scriptures and the Prophets accept Lord Krishna as the ultimate Reality. He is the only Object of all love in the transcendental realm called Vaikuntha. They completely surrender themselves to His mercy and try to gain His favour by the methods revealed by Krishna's will in the Scriptures. In Srimad Bhagabata mention is made of nine modes of this function called devotion. Adoption of one or all of these modes is willed by Krishna to lead the devotee to his goal. These modes are as follows :—

(1) Hearing Vishnu
(2) Preaching Vishnu
(3) Thinking Vishnu
(4) Worshipping the Feet of Vishnu
(5) Adoring Vishnu's Form
(6) Praising Vishnu
(7) Attending on Vishnu as servant
(8) Serving Vishnu as friend
(9) Surrendering the distinctive self to Vishnu

Of these the second method according to Sri Gaur Sundar is the best mode of worship, which alone the people of this Iron Age (Kaliyuga) should adopt. The supreme Being and His Name are one and the same thing. His only manifestation in this world is His Name as Word. Undergoing initiation at the hands of a Guru who knows what the Name is, a worshipper is sure to achieve the highest good within a very short time. Hence in the above shloka Sri Gaur Sundar says,—Glory to the chanting of the Name of Krishna that achieves for the worshipper sevenfold results which are :—

1. Purification of the heart. Primarily there are three impurities that make the heart unfit to receive God's light. These are (a) lust or desire for anything other than the service of God-head, (b) actual worldly enjoyment and (c) the renunciation of worldly enjoyments. Worldly enjoyment is as bad as its renunciation. They are like the two ends of a stick representing two aspects of the same thing. In both cases a man follows his own predilection, without any reference to God. A complete check of these adverse currents of thought is most necessary to enable the heart to regain its fundamental function that ever points towards God.

2. Freedom from worldly cares and anxieties. The human mind is always haunted by them. Sri Krishna Samkirtan impregnates the mind with Divine power that enables it to resist any deflection threatened by the worst kinds of temptations.

3. Attainment of the highest good. Sri-Krishna-Samkirtan is both the Means and the End and hence the good that attends it is higher than what attends the quest of a hypothetical goal by material means, viz., the pious deeds of a Karmin or the renunciation of worldly enjoyment of a Jnanin.

4. Attainment of knowledge. It is again of two kinds—one is material related to this phenomenal world, and the other is spiritual, that is related to the spiritual world. The former addicts the mind of its possessor more firmly to this world; whereas the latter obtains emancipation for the soul by establishing him in Krishna-Samkirtan which is his natural eternal function.

5. Increment of heavenly bliss. Krishna-Samkirtan is the End unto Itself; whereas the other methods namely Karma, Yoga and Jnana are the imperfect means to relative end. Hence the bliss that attends Krishna-Samkirtan is complete and perfect unlike the seeming bliss that is imagined to follow from the other methods.

6. Realisation of perfect bliss at every step. Krishna-Samkirtan is a thing of the spiritual Realm. Imperfection never enters into the constitution of a thing of Vaikuntha. Hence the taste of the bliss that it enables us to realise at every step, cannot but be perfect.

7. The complete and supreme satisfaction of the soul. The Jiva under the bondage of Maya is thwarted by many limitations that prevent his complete satisfaction. SriKrishna-Samkirtan provides the scope for the complete highest simultaneous activity of all the faculties of the soul.

That the Vaishnavas are Idolaters

An idol is a seeming representation of an actual sentient being.

An idol is a seeming representation of an actual sentient being. So it is made up of foreign materials and is different from the animated being himself. Idols cannot take the initiative whereas animation proves otherwise.

It is not possible for us to form any idea of the actual sentient being whom we call man except by the process of idolising. In case of the physical body we may be induced to concede that it is not itself the sentient being because the physical body is found to be capable of losing its consciousness and to be under the control of the mind for taking any initiative. If a mosquito bites any part of the body there can be no reaction which is attributable to the possessor of the body unless the reaction is initiated from the mental and super-mental regions, which are located beyond the limb affected, not merely quantitatively but, in the case of conscious reaction, also qualitatively. It is not possible to offer any spatial or temporal location to the principle of consciousness. This would be opposed to our actual experience. The qualitative difference between animation and the inanimate, between consciousness and non-consciousness, is a fact of realisation of all persons which cannot be ignored or explained away by any speculation based on experience.

Distinction between the model and the sentient.

If animation is categorically different from the condition of the inanimate and if it be found to be conscious of both categories, we obtain the principle within ourselves by which to distinguish between the actual sentient being and his hypothetical representation belonging to a different category.

The physical body of a man is, however, something different from a hypothetical representation of the sentient being inhabiting the body. We have no access to the sentient being himself through any of our senses. It is not also possible for the mind which is dependent on the senses for the materials of its hypotheses to give us any assurance that the sentient being, who is styled by mind as 'man', has even a symbolic semblance to the physical human body. But we habitually in all our dealings and speculations allow the physical body to represent its sentient possessor. This is idolatry.

The mind inhabiting the physical body is capable of being described in terms of its physical activities. Thoughts and every form of conscious function are ordinarily taken to represent the mind. But the thoughts and aptitudes are recognisable by the mind as different in their nature from the sentient being who is their possessor.

The thoughts and aptitudes are no more capable of taking the initiative than the physical body and inanimate objects which form their material bases and to which they are limited. The thoughts and aptitudes of the mind connect the sentient principle with the phenomenal world. The thoughts and all aptitudes towards material objects are expressible by the vocabulary at our disposal and are thus capable of 'symbolic' represention. This is possible because they are partly of the phenomenal world. They all partake of the nature of entities, possessing no initiative of their own, that are perceivable and conceivable by the mind through the senses. Between this aspect and the language which represents them there is no difference of category. Both are entities limited by the conditions of space and time, which are by their nature devoid of the power of initiative.

Sorrow and joy can in this manner be partially represented by appropriate expressions of the countenance. Here the symbolisation is not wholly imaginary. No one will object to the reality of such representation on the ground of its being altogether fictitious and misleading. Every one spontaneously recognizes the close analogy that exists between the thought and feeling and their natural expressions clothed in the forms of sound and colour, as manifest to the ear, the tongue and the eye. So the objection implied in idolatry does not apply to statues and pictures, facial and linguistic expressions when they represent the phenomenal, physico-mental adjuncts or possessions of a sentient being.

The soul of a man does not lend himself to such justifiable representation by any method known to the mind. No thoughtful person will admit any but wholly fictitious and misleading resemblance between a statue or a picture and the soul whom they purport to represent. This is so because the soul is located wholly beyond the phenomena. Our thought and the physical body being limited and ephemeral, despite their admitted connection with the soul as his possessions, are not acceptable to the mind, which evidently occupies a position of advantage that enables it to be the judge, as capable of representing the spiritual without committing the mischief of identifying him wholly with the limited and inanimate.

The objection to idolatry is based on these considerations. The sentient being is admitted to possess actual existence. But in his subjective nature he is unapproachable by our thoughts and senses. The thoughts and senses are impregnated with the quality of consciousness by their unintelligibl but realisable connection with him. But the thoughts and senses always have an outward direction of reference. If they attempt to look inwards they are unable to find any standing ground. The entity who employs the mind, the senses and the organs of the physical body in their functions, himself remains securely hid beyond the ken of those gross material organs. Those who 'identify' an 'idol' with the original sentient being commit the unpardonable blunder of ignoring the unbridgeable distinction between the concocted material model and its spiritual prototype. It is no doubt the grand privilege of the mind to be able to imagine whatever it likes. It can deliberately commit the grossest blunders. It can obstinately stick to a cause which it knows well to be fallacious. It can in exercise of its birthright of perversity deliberately suppose an 'idol' to symbolise the spiritual, without undertaking the task of disclosing its reasons for entertaining such a strange conviction. But as the same prerogative of freedom of choice belongs in an equal measure to all minds it cannot guard itself against the rejection of its deliberate perversities by other minds.

Qualitative difference from absolute knowledge is different from quantitative differentia of the same quality.

Exoteric and esoteric phases.

Ignorance or blind perversity is no aspect of the absolute knowledge. They are not a variety of such knowledge, nor even any measure or degree of it. It is no doubt true that the absolute includes everything But by the same test that which by its own admission leaves out anything cannot also be regarded as absolute. The Absolute also accommodates qualitative difference from Himself. But the qualitative non-absolute need not, therefore, be represented as the quantitative differentia of the Absolute Himself. The 'idol' represents qualitative difference from the Absolute and not His quantitative face which is wholly inadmissible in respect of the Absolute. We know nothing about the sentient being that can enable us to assert any real similarity, symbolic or otherwise, between the 'idol' and the spiritual entity. This is so because the soul belongs to the realm of the Absolute and is comprehensible only as part and parcel of the knowledge Absolute Who is qualitatively different from all knowledge derived from our experience of the temporary and limited. Our ignorance of the Absolute is no doubt characterised by quantitative differentia. It may be more and less obstructive. But all mental attitudes regarding the Absolute needs must be only different forms and degrees of ignorance and should be carefully distinguished from the Absolute Knowledge Himself. Idols are but preliminary index or indistinctive wrong identification of the unknown entity when his esoteric phase is ignored. In the case of the Vaishnavas they do not subscribe to the exoteric manifestation of the spirit or matter as his proper representation by distinguishing the one as belonging to the category of objects of worship and the other as belonging to that of objects of selfish sensuous enjoyment.

That which is approached by us as an object of gratification of the senses is not the spirit but his exoteric face with which our soul has nothing to do. The esoteric face of the spirit can be approached only by the pure soul for the purpose of worship. The spirit makes himself known to our pure souls when he is so approached. The soul's real cognitive faculty acts through spiritual senses that are concerned with the worship of the esoteric manifestations of the Absolute. It is only the esoteric manifestation that is fit to be so worshipped. The exoteric manifestation cannot be worshipped at all as it does not possess the necessary reciprocal initiative required for the spiritual communion. That which submits to our physical senses ceases thereby to be a proper object of worship of our souls. It is then apprehended as the servant and we stand to it in the relation of masters. In the case of the Idol it is, therefore, entirely dependent on us for the relationship that we may choose to have towards it. This may flatter our vanity but is not worship. The concept as well as percept may be our Idol. There is an exoteric face of the concept as of the percept. The soul as worshipper is concerned with the esoteric face which reveals itself only to the serving faculty inherent in the soul in his natural state of perfect freedom from all ambitions of lording over exoteric manifestations.

If we choose to regard the exoteric manifestation as the object of our worship it is thereby converted into the Idol. The instinct of worship is inherent in the soul. When it is directed to the wrong object the process becomes unnatural and unsatisfactory. It is called Idolatry. The Vaishnavas distinguish carefully between the exoteric and esoteric manifestations, between physical and mental activities directed to exoteric manifestations in the way of attempts to extort a satisfaction for the senses and the same activity directed towards esoteric manifestations in the form of endeavours to minister to the satisfaction of the senses of the One object of all worship of the soul.

The Vaishnavas neither offer worship to, nor accept it for themselves from, any creature. It is the constituent and only function of the pure soul of the creature to serve the Creator by the process of spiritual service. The relation of one creature to another is that between fellow-worshippers of one God. They have no function towards each other except the service of the Lord.

The spiritual devotee has no ambition of subordinating the Fountainhead to the inspection of senses.

Persons who have not examined their own selves are liable to misconceive the true existence of a spiritual devotee who is not sanguine to enjoy Godhead by subduing the Fountainhead Object of his inspection through senses. In the fallen state it is not possible to conceive or imagine any other function for ourselves than selfish enjoyment by means of the senses. It is not possible for any living person to abstain wholly from sensuous activities. The senses are always actively engaged in reacting to the stimuli of taste, touch, colour, smell, sound that present to them the tidings of the external world. The mind who controls these activities of the senses by the process of attention has no other function than that of devising new methods of employment of the senses for the purpose of expanding and perfecting all forms of sensuous activities. This appears to be the God-given and only function available to us in this life. The senses are never tired of their function of exploring all the nooks and corners of the phenomenal universe that is ever open to their scrutiny. Their spontaneous activity is rewarded by the discovery of unknown spheres for its exercise that keeps alive, widens and intensifies the desire for further activity. There is no possibility of ever finishing the inspection of the world which holds an infinite store of so-called 'secrets' to stimulate and misguide all who are engaged in searching for them.

But there is one secret which can never be known by the activities of the senses. The senses can never find out the nature of the devotee of God who does not desire any sensuous enjoyment for himself. We can, of course, understand the sensuous activities of mortals. We can sympathise with those activities as we ourselves happen to possess and value similar experience. But we are not ordinarily aware how one can have anything at all to do with God Who is not open to the inspection of the senses. Until we actually experience the form of activity in which the devotee is engaged how can we either sympathise with or understand the function of the devotee of God ?

It is of course possible to discover an incipient tendency to the function if we look into ourselves. We can at once detect there a natural hankering for the living Truth with Whom it should be possible to hold direct communion, not for the idle purpose of satisfying our passing whims which are the products of our present state of ignorance and which can, therefore, only misdirect and distract us, but for the purpose of seriously acting up to the actual requirements of our supersensuous deeper nature. The sensuous life is recognisable as radically superficial and misleading in spite of the ever-widening scope for dissipation that is being opened up by the discoveries of the physical and mental sciences in the domain of sensuous experience. The belief in the possible existence of a life that is really or categorically different from and higher than the worldly life, is inherent in us. That life is ordinarily defined as the spiritual service of God. It is the life of the devotee.

That which separates the devotee from a non-devotee is the fact that the former happens to live in actual communion with God Who is not open to the inspection of the senses. But it is not possible for us to understand what the devotee actually does. The devotee serves Godhead. A non-devotee can only desire to enjoy the exoteric energy of Godhead by subjecting it to the inspection of his senses and thereby seemingly reducing Godhead to a level with his own superficial nature.

He does not quarrel with the contending position of matter and spirit.

Looking at them from a particular angle of vision in our mundane reference we are apt to regard matter and spirit as occupying contending positions in respect of each other and as being at loggerheads towards each other. As soon as we arrive at such a conclusion we consider it our duty to try to remove their mutual incompatibility. But the spiritual devotee is not found to quarrel with the apparently contending position of matter and spirit.

As soon as a spiritual devotee is engaged in rendering spiritual service to Godhead by his perpetual organs of senses he is thereby naturally relieved of his unnatural supremacy. The effective inclination imparts to him the vision that is necessary for rendering such service. It is not possible to understand the process except through experience which is itself the product of such inclination. The devotee is then enabled to endure naturally the resistence offered by foreign agency,

He is not then forced to play the role of the master. He is then naturally found to be humiliative and neglecting his opposing temper. And he then naturally and willingly supplies all honours and other requisites that are demanded by his pseudo-'friends'.

The great point is to realise the 'natural' position. Once this is realised spiritual functioning is spontaneously generated. This in its turn resolves all difficulties presented by material obstacles that surround the devotee on all sides in this world. The obstacles are not overcome by the process of violence or successful opposition. They are overcome by deferring to them to the full measure of their demands. This is possible only for the devotee. In the case of one who is not himself properly established in his natural spiritual condition the phenomenal world presents its disruptive and opposing face to all his activities. To the devotee they are always a help and never a hindrance.

Sree Sree Chaitanya Bhagabat

133 No one could detect His old arrogance of learning.
He appeared always like a great recluse.

134 Sachi did not at all understand the behaviour of her Son.
She worshipped the Ganges and Vishnu for the welfare of the Child.

135 'Krishnachandra took away the husband, took away the sons,
There now remains this only One.

136 'O Krishna, be pleased to grant me, who am without a protector, this boon
That Biswambhar may stay in the house, with a sound mind.

137 Bringing forth Lakshmi Sachi made her sit by the side of her Son.
The Lord cast His eyes on her but as if He did not see,

138 He cried unceasingly, reciting texts of the Scriptures,
And said constantly, 'Where is Krishna ? Oh, where is Krishna ?'

139 At times He exclaimed with such a deep voice
That Lakshmi fled in terror and Sachi got affrighted

140 The Lord did not sleep at night by the taste of the mellow quality of Krishna.
He found no respite in the agony of separation, but by turns constantly stood up, fell down, sat up again.

141 He controlled Himself at the sight of strangers.
The Lord went to the Ganges for His bath at break of day.

142 No sooner did the Lord return from His bath in the Ganges
Than the whole body of His students made their appearance in due form.

143 Nothing except 'Krishna' ever comes to the lips of the Lord.
The students knew nothing of this.

144 The Lord sat to teach by their request,
To manifest Himself to the assemblage of His students.

145 The disciples opened their books by uttering the Name of Hari.
The darling Son of Sachi was delighted on hearing this.

146 On catching the sound 'Hari' the Lord lost all external consciousness.
And the Jewel of the twice-born bent His auspicious glance on them all.

147 The Lord began to explain in the exclusive mood
The names of Hari in the Sutra, Tika and Britti.

148 The Lord said, 'The Name Krishna is true at all time,
All the Shastras declare nothing but Krishna.

149 'Krishna is Godhead. He kills and maintains all.
Aja, Bhaba and all others are the servants of Krishna.

150 'He who explains that there can be any meaning save the Feet of Krishna
Wastes his life in vain by utterance of falsehoods.

151 The Agama Vedanta and all philosophies,
All the Shastras,—speak of the treasure of devotion to the Feet of Krishna.

152 'Teachers, bewitched by the deluding Energy of Krishna,
Go astray by giving up the path of devotion to Krishna,

153 'Krishna is Ocean of pity, Life of the world,
Lover of His servants, darling Son of cowherd Nanda.

154 'One who has no affection nor inclination for the Name of Krishna
Is in bad plight by his study of all the Shastras.

155 'One who is poor and base, if he takes the Name of Krishna,
Goes to the Abode of Krishna even if he were laden with every offence.

156 'This is the intention of all the Shastras.
Whoever doubts this suffers sorrow.

157 'That wicked person who explains the Shastras by leaving out the worship of Krishna.
Never knowing the inner meaning of the scriptures,

158 'Teaches the Shastras but does not understand their meaning.
The ass vainly carrying the load of the Shastras is doomed to perdition.

159 'People earn only death and destruction by such study.
By it they are deprived of the high festival of Krishna.

160 'The Lord bestowed the gift of deliverance to Putana.
Such is Krishna ! How may people meditate on other things by giving Him up 161 'The Lord deliverd even such a great sinner as Aghasur.

For what other pleasure may people give up His chant ?

162 'All the world is sanctified by the Name of Krishna.
Yet wretched jivas abstain from chanting His Deeds.

163 'Even Brahma and his peers are convulsed with joy by the festival of the Lord.
Leaving out the same people earn only damnation by dance and song.

164 'The Name Krishna delivered Ajamil.
No one knows Him, blinded by the vanities of wealth, rank and learning !

165 'Listen, brothers all, to My true words,
Worship the priceless treasure of the lotus Feet of Krishna.—

166 'Those Feet that Lakshmi desires to serve!
The Feet by whose worship Shankara is the true servant of the Lord !

167 'Those Feet from where Jahnavi is sprung !
Brothers, may all of you cherish the hope of those lotus Feet ! I would like to see the person in this Nabadwip

168 'Who has power to refute My explanation in My presence !'

169 Biswambhar than Whom there is none greater is Embodiment of all sound-forms.
Whatsoever He chooses to explain, by whichever word, must needs be true.

170 The students bereft of all thought listened with undivided attention.
The Lord also expounded the truth forgetting all restraint.

171 Every word by its nature spontaneously declares that Krishna is the Truth.
There is no wonder that the Lord Himself should thus explain.

172 In a short while Biswambhar manifested
His external vision.
Feeling somewhat ashamed He began to enquire.

173 'How did I explain the Sutra today ?'
All the students said, 'We understood nothing.

174 'You explain that Krishna is the only Meaning of every word.
Who is able to understand Your exposition ?'

175 Biswambhar said laughingly, 'Hear', all
My brothers.
Bind up your books for this day and let us go to the Ganges for bath'.

176 All of them up their books at these words of the Lord,
Then set out in the company of Biswambhar for bathing in the Ganges.

177 Lord Biswambhar sported in the water of the Ganges,
Like the full Moon in the depths of mid-Ocean.

178 Lord Biswambhar played in the holy stream of the Ganges
In view of the denizens of Nadia of most auspicious deeds.

179 Brahma and his peers cherish the desire of beholding the beauteous Form of the Lord
Who played in the water in the guise of a Brahmana.

180 All those persons who thronged the bathing steps for immersion in the Ganges
Gazed on the face of Gaurchandra !

181 All spoke to one another to this effect,— 'Blessed are the father and mother who have such Son.'

182 The joy of the Ganges waxed strong at the touch of the Lord.
The goddess manifested the agitation of waves in her delight.

183 Jahnavi danced in the guise of her waves
In worship of the Lord Whose Feet are served by the infinity of worlds !

184 The daughter of Jahnu encircling the Lord on all sides
Showered her water on Him, without being visible.

185 The Veda alone knows the inner meaning of all these Pastimes, :
A little of them will be revealed by all the Puranas in the long run.

186 Biswambhar returned Home after bath.
The company of students departed to their respective homes.

187 Changing His cloth the Lord washed His Feet.
He then sprinkled the holy Tulasi with water.

188 After duly worshipping the holy Form of Govinda
The Lord came away from the shrine and sat for His meal.

189 Cooked rice with the spray of Tulasi
Was brought to Him by His mother.

190 Making the offering to Viswaksena
The Lord of the infinity of worlds then ate His food.

191 Sachi, mother of the world, sat in front of the Lord ;
The loyal consort Lakshmi watched from within.

192 The mother said, 'What books did you read today, my Dear ?
Did you engage in quarrel with any person ?'

193 The Lord replied, 'I read the Name Krishna today.
The lotus Feet of Krishna, the Abode of all good qualities, are true ;

194 'The hearing and chanting of the Name and quality of Krishna are true ;
Who so-ever serve Krishnachandra are true.

195 'That Shastra alone is true which tells of devotion to Krishna ;
The Shastra that says otherwise, commits sin.

196 'The shastra in which devotion to Hari is not found—
It is one's duty not to listen to it even if Brahma himself be the speaker.

197 'The Chandala is no Chandala if he serves Krishna ;
The Bipra is no Bipra if he walks in the path of sin.'

198 What the Lord as Kapila had once said to His mother,
In the same mood He now spoke again.

199 'Listen with attention, mother, to the power of devotion to Krishna.
Practise love for Krishna, My mother, in every way.

200 'Mother, there is no death for the servant of Krishna.
The destructive wheel of time is filled with dread at sight of Krishna's servitor.

201 'All the sorrow of confinement in the mother's womb, of birth and death,—
One who serves Krishna knows nothing of all this.

202 'Krishna is the Father of the world.
Whoever does not serve Him, My dear.
That unnatural sinner, in revolt against his Father, is tormented by misery in every birth.

VISWA VAISHNAVA RAJ SABHA

Shree Gaudiya Math
Calcutta (India)
1st July. 1930,

DEAR SIR,

We presume you may agree with us that India is the unique cradle of a truly international civilisation and spiritual culture of the highest order extending far back into the pre-historic days and has ever been the cynosure of all eyes and is now actually passing through a period of travail for a rejuvenated spiritual birth.

Empirical attempts and intellectual pursuits for centuries of an ever-changing civilisation have been driven to despair in their vain quest for the real desideratum. Science has so long failed to yield the real solution of the ever-complicating world-problems threatening the whole humanity with impending dire confusion. Out of despair many a popular creed and convention are being thrown intt the-melting pot almost every day, but these desperate experiments formulated by imperfect science only multiply labyrinthine theories and barren speculations that are crushing down the world.

May we make bold to ask as to what is that solid rock of ages standing firmly on which India with her hoariest of civilisations still claims to become the mother of the coming inevitable light ? We venture to think that the savants and right thinkers of the day will probably subscribe to our view that the objective of the great Leagues and Conferences lies only in the spiritual regeneration oo the world, the inspiration of which is to come from the inexhaustible reserves of the Absolute.

The real message of peace and harmony in sweet concordance with the pristine note of the Divine Texts of the Vedas was proclaimed on the sweet soil of Bengal over four centuries ago by Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya who propagated for one and all the religion of Transcendental Love. His revelation of the only source of all real peace and harmony is not a soothing balm for temporary relief but the eternal panacea and the ultimate consummation to be attained.

Sri Chaitanya's life of perfect devotion and burning love for the Absolute embodied the most sublime philosophy for the really pragmatic and synthetic solution of the discordent elements of life in its limitless aspects. His message naturally took a cosmopolitan character for its wide catholicity and it was much elaborated and far-extended by the illustrious six apostles known as 'Goswamis' who associated themselves with the most ancient institution in the form of an organised mission known as 'The Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha'.

This Mission received fresh impetus at a later age through the life and preachings of great Vaishnavas (perfectly self-realised saints) like Srinibas Acharyya, Thakur Narottam, Prabhu Shyamananda, Viswanath Chakravarty and Baladev Vidyabhusan the great commentator of the Vedanta. Soon after them intervened the dark age of ignorance and perversion which prevailed till the seventies of the last century when a great saint named Thakur Bhaktivinode took a bold stand in re-establishing and rejuvenating the pure and eternal religion of loving service of the Divinity and practising and preaching it in its true presentment.

This very line is being pushed on very successfully in all quarters by His Divine Grace Paramahansa Sreemad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj, the greatest and most learned of saints, who is the Acharyya (Messiah) of the present age and who is now the president of the said historic Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha. During the decade of His Grace's public activity thousands of highly educated persons of respectable families of India have devoted their whole life and energy for this Mission, numerous devotional literature in different languages is being published and distributed, three purely religious newspapers and periodicals have been carrying on the propaganda from door to door and as many as thirty preaching centres have already been established all over India where arrangements are being made for imparting theistic education to all students free of expenses and many other such activities have been taken up for the spiritual uplift of the age.

As you are a brilliant star in the firmament of liberal culture we appeal to your feelings of love and compassion for the world to help this universal cause by your hearty participation in wise advice and sympathetic collaboration with the Mission for the greatest and lasting good of humanity. We shall feel highly obliged if you can kindly extend our invitation to all your friends, members and constituents whose active sympathy will promote the universally desired success of the propaganda.

Recently a temple and requisite buildings have been constructed in the northern part of the city of Calcutta for the accommodation of the Gaudiya Math, the general preaching centre of the Mission, at an expense of over three hundred thousand rupees. In connection with the inauguration ceremony of this new temple of the Gaudiya Math to be held on the 5th of October next a series of religious performances, physical demonstrations of the Esoteric principles and congregational discourses are being organised there by the Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha to continue for over a month from the date as per programme enclosed.

We, on behalf of the members of the Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha, most humbly solicit the favour of your fraternal company at the ensuing celebrations. We beg to invite your special attention to the item of the All-Theistic Conference where all the savants and saints of the east and of the west and all persons interested in spiritual culture are invited to assemble for participation in various important functions in connection with the spiritual cause represented by the Mission. It is our firm faith that your kind presence and collaboration will be a real asset to the proceedings and will substantially promote its success.

Specific arrangements for your companions, attendance, conveyances and accommodation may be made on previous intimation to the Secretary, Gaudiya Math, Calcutta (India).

We remain, ever in service,
Your most humble brothers,
Atul Chandra Goswami.
Nishi Kanta Sanyal.
Kunja Vehary Vidyabhusan.
Secretaries,
Shree Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha.

Ourselves

Sixteenth Anniversary of the Disappearance of Thakur Bhaktivinode.

The sixteenth anniversary of the disappearance of Srila Thakur Bhaktivinode, entered into the eternal Lila, was duly celebrated at Sri Chaitanya Math, Sridham Mayapur, on the 26th of July and simultaneously at all the branch Maths.

A detailed account of the celebrations at Sri Purushottam Math, Puri, is separately inserted Entry into the new Temple and Buildings of Sri Gaudiya Math at Bagbazar, Calcutta.

The Gaudiya Vaishnavas in a vast Samkirtan procession under His Divine Grace Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur with Sri Sri Gaur-Vinodanandaji will enter the newly-built Temple and residential quarters of the Gaudiya Math at Bagbazar in the afternoon of Oct. 5, (1930).

The Nabadwip Almanac.

The Nabadwip Almanac of the year 444 Gaur Era has just been published by the Gaudiya Math. A copy of the book should be secured by all persons endeavouring to lead the spiritual life. The Vaishnava Almanc is essentially different from the Smarta Almanac. The latter lays down the daily observances of those persons who seek either elevation or liberation i. e. enjoyment or freedom from misery. The Vaishnavas do not seek any amelioration of their own condition which is due to the will of God, but guidance for serving the pleasure of Krishna. The point of view of cause-less devotion to the Holy Feet of Krishna ought to be adopted all over the world to the supersession of any other view. This is the object of the Nabadwip Almanac. A copy of this booklet may be had for annas two only.

SRIDHAM MAYAPUR

District Board Road from Hular Ghat (Ghat on the Ganges) to Sridham Mayapur.

This road is being used by an immense and increasing number of pilgrims and an attempt was made to induce the District Board for improving it up to the requirements of the heavy pilgrim traffic on the occasion of Sridham Mayapur Exhibition. We learn that the Government has authorised acquisition of land for the purpose of constructing the road in question. The public may hope that the authorities of the District Board will take up the work of construction which is overdue without further delay.

Postal and Telegraph communication.

A branch post office was opened from the 1st of June, 1929 at Sridham mayapur, which was converted into a temporary Sub-Post-Office from the 1st of following November. Orders have since been received from the Department providing a permanent Sub Post Office at the Holy Birth-place of Sri Chaitanya Deva with effect from the first of July (1930) The arrangement, it is hoped, will be completed by the conversion of the Sub Office into a combined Post & Telegraph Office in the near future to meet the urgent and increasing requirements of the public interested in the holy Birth-site of the Lord.

Para-Vidya-Peeth.

The following students of the Para-Vidya-Peeth came out successful at the Govt. Sanskrit Examinations :—

(1) Pandit Sripad Gaurdas Brahmachari Vyakaranatirtha, Upadeshaka, Bhaktishastri, in the Madhya Examination in the Kabya and Adya Examination in Saukhya ; (2) Sri Gopinath Pati in Madhya Examination in Kabya ; (3) Srijukta Tarak Nath Devasarma (4) Srijukta Nikunja Behari Das and (5) Srijukta Birendra Chandra Bhattacharyya in the Adya Examination in Sri Harinama mrita Vyakarana.

PROPAGANDA.

Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj

At the earnest solicitations of Srijukta Kiran Chandra Ghose, Zemindar of Kurigram, His Holiness explained the Bhagabat at the local Sevasram on the evenings of the 3rd and 4th of June. A large number of Brahman Pandits and other gentlemen of the locality including Mr. Dhirendra Nath Roy Bar-at-law, well-known Zemindar of Narail, and the manager of the Narail Estate attended in spite of heavy rainy weather. They were all most highly delighted by listening to the proper exposition of the Bhagabat from the lips of a true devotee who s himself actually employed in the whole time service f the Supreme Lord. They were also convinced f the necessity of relying on the expositions of the reachers of the Gaudiya Math and avoiding those f hired readers of the Bhagabat. His Holiness has ince made his way to Puri to assume the direction f the annual celebrations of Sri Purushottam Math, Puri, by command of His Divine Grace Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur.

Srimad Bhakti Hridaya Bon Maharaj and Srimad Bhaktiranjan Bhaktisar Maharaj

Crowded meetings on two successive evenings were held in the Central Hall, Berhampur, Ganjam (Madras) at which lectures and discourses on 'pure spiritual service of the Supreme Lord' were delivered in English by His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Hriday Ban Maharaj, and Sripad Pandit Ramananda Das Goswami Vidyarnab B A., Bhaktishastri, of the Gaudiya Math of Calcutta. In course of his lectures Srimad Ban Maharaj dealt with the implications of the term Daridranarayan and Byabaharic Dharma in order to clear up widely prevalent misconceptions. A requisite sum was subscribed on the spot for the erection of a temple at Sinhachalam to enshrine the holy Foot-prints of Sri Chaitanyadeva. The cultured audience expressed their unanimous sense of having received true enlightenment from the utterances of their Holinesses. The function was presided over by His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhaktiranjan Bhaktisar Maharaj of the Gaudiya Math, Calcutta.

Srimad Bhaktivivek Bharati Maharaj.

His Holiness expounded Srimad Bhagabatam at the market-place of Baduria to large gathering of the local people both Hindus and Mahomedans.

Srimad Bhakti Sarvaswa Giri Maharaj.

His Holiness delivered a lecture in English on 'The great message of the Gita' at a large gathering at Kohitur, Mussouri on June 1. On June 4, His Holiness lectured in English on 'Universal Love' in the Municipal Hall of Mussouri at a meeting presided over by Rai Shaheb Dr. Ram Narayan Lall. The speech produced a great impression on all present.

Srimad Bhaktiranjan Bhaktisar Maharaj

His Holiness preached the message of unalloyed devotion tanght and practised by Sri Chaitanyadeva at Delang, Udayapur, Shasevak, Sepatna and other localities in the district of Puri, His Holiness explained the Chaitanya Bhagabat to an admiring audience at the residence of Srijukta Phanibhusan Chandra on the bank of the Vindu Sarovar at Bhuvaneswar.

BRANCH MATHS.

Sri Brahma-Gaudiya Math (Alalnath)

Portions of the residential quarters of Sree Brahma-Gaudiya Math have been constructed; the work of the roof of this section is in progress. Sree Sree Gaur Sundar (Bijaya Vigraha) was carried under the personal direction of Paramahansa Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur by a grand procession of the Kirtan parties of the neighbouring villages of Alalnath on the 23rd of June from Sree Purushottam Math, Puri, to Sree Brahma-Gaudiya Math, Alalnath, in commemoration of the retirement of the Supreme Lord from Puri to Alalnath during the period of Anabasara. The occasion was celebrated by the people of Alalnath and the surrounding villages by the exhibition of dances of masked figures, a lantern lecture in Oriya on the life of Sri Chaitanyadeva by Sripad Paramananda Brahmachari Vidyaratna and by the honouring of Mahaprasad at Sree Brahma-Gaudiya Math by all the people of the neighbourhood.

Alalnath.

The auspicious wish of His Divine Grace in regard to the repair of the road from Puri to Alalnath has resulted in the work being taked up in earnest this year. The repairs of the exterior of the main temple of Sri Alalnath have been finished. The compound wall is being built. The construction of the wall on the north side of the compound has been completed. The northern half of the eastern wall adjoining the Lion Gate is being built with pecuinary help received from the Revered widow of Param Bhagabat Kaviraj Tarini Charan Samaddar who attained the dust of Sri Kshetra. The repairs of the interior of the main temple will be taken up very soon.

Sree Paramahansa Math (Naimisharanya)

Information has been received from Sripad Nrisinghananda Brahmachari in charge of Sree Paramahansa Math, Naimisharanya, of the commencement of the work of construction of a new block of residential quarters of Sree Paramahansa Math. Arrangements are also in progress for the construction of a lofty temple in conformity with the wish of Srila Paramahansa Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur who desires, in conformity with the heart's desires of Sri Chaitanyadeva, the restoration of the scriptural status of Naimisharanya, the centre of Bhagahat learning.

Sree Purushottam Math, Puri

The annual celebrations of the Math are progressing most successfully. The gracious arrival of Paramahansa Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur with a great company of pure devotees on the 22nd of June infused special divine vigour into the proceedings. His Divine Grace and party were received with great reverence at the Puri Railway Station by a number of distinguished persons including Rai Bahadur Janaki Nath Bose, Advocate of Cuttack, Rajarshi Rao Saheb Kumar Srijukta Saradindu Narayan Rai M. A., Prajna of Dinajpur, Srijukta Purna Chandra Ghosh Superintendent of Puri Jail, Srijukta Gangesh Chandra Chakravarty, B. L. pleader and others. The Mahanta Maharaj of Uttarparsha Math and Mr K. D. Paul Civil Surgen of Puri had sent their cars and the Dewan Bahadur of the Raja Shaheb of Puri depated two decorated elephants to the Railway Station to join in the function of reception. His Divine Grace followed Sri Gaur Sundar to Alalnath the next day in commemoration of the display of the pang of separation by the Supreme Lord during the period of Anabasara.

The festival of the disappearance of Srila Bhakti vinode Thakur was celebrated on June 26 at Sri Purushottam Math by Paramhansa Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur in person. In the afternoon His Divine Grace himself carrying the flag led a procession of congregational chanters along the sea-shore to Sri Bhakti Kuti where Thakur Bhaktivinode practised his devotions and to the shrine of the Samadhi of Thakur Haridas adjoining Sri Bhakti Kuti for offering the complete homage of his heart. His Divine Grace talked to the assembled people regarding the supreme sanctity of the holy site of Srila Bhaktivinode Thakur's loving service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda. He pointed out to Rajarshi Prajna the spot where Thakur Bhaktivinode used to perform his devotions and also the adjoining site of the devotions of Sri Raghunath Das Goswami and the Sri Vigraha of Sri Giridhariji worshipped by Sri Das Goswami that is still there The procession of chanters then followed His Divine Grace to Sri Siddha Bakul, the site of the devotional performances of Thakur Haridas and from there to Sri Gambhira where Sri Chaitanyadeva resided. Then His grace with the Samkirtan party went into the Temple of Sri Jagannathdeva and beheld Godhead on the occasion of the Festival of His New Juvenation. The procession then returned to Sri Purushottam Math.

In the evening there was a large gathering in the spacious halls of Sri Purushattam Math for the due observance of the anniversary of Thakur Bhaktivinode's disappearance. The function consisted of the chanting of the octave hymn in honour of Sri Garudeva followed by the reading of a poem by Pandit Sripad Radhacharan Goswami Bhaktiratna Bhaktishastri composed by himself for the occasion. Thereafter Paramhansa Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Thakur spoke about the unique character of the religion of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas and about the gift of Thakur Bhaktivinode. Sripad Sundaranada Vidyavinode, Editor of the Gaudiya, at the desire of His Divine Grace, delivered a brief speech on the mercy of Thakur Bhaktivinode. Pandit Sripad Brahmachari Ananta Vasudeva Vidyabhusan then sang a hymn composed by Thakur Bhaktivinode. The proceedings were concluded by the Vaishnavas of the four Sampradayas and all assembled people duly honouring the Mahaprasad at the Math.

On the 27th June the devotees, who had arrived at Sri Purushottam Math from all parts of the country forming themselves into a huge Samkirtan procession in pursuance of the wish of Srila Paramhansa Thakur, proceeded to Sri Gandicha Temple for the purpose of cleansing the same. On their arrival in front of the Temple His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj read and expounded to all the Lila of the cleansing of Sri Gundicha by Sri Chaitanyadeva from Sri Caitanya Charitamrita. Entering the shrine the procession then circumambulated the Temple by the performance of organised chant and cleansed the shrine. The devotees then made their way to the Indradyumna Tank and sported in its water in pursuance of the Lila of the Supreme Lord.

The Car Festival, June 28.

In conformity with the wish of Srila Paramhansa Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj the devotees of Sri Purushottam Math forming a vast Samkirtan procession performed the chanting of the text of Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita in front of the moving Car of Sri Jagannathdeva from the Lion Gate to Sri Gundicha. The charting of the Samkirtan was led in pouring rain by His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj and became the centre of attraction of all the assembled pilgrims.

Publications of devotional literature by the Gaudiya Printing works.

1. Sri Prem-Vivarta by the associate of Sri Gaursundar, Srila Jagadananda Goswamipad, 4th Edition.

2. Geetabali by Srila Bhaktivinode Thakur, 5th, Edition.

Rajarshi Rao Shaheb Kumar Saradinda Narayan Rai M. A., Prajna has promised to bear all expenses for the reprint of 'Achar and Acharya', being impressed by the impartial truth of the conclusions embodied in the said publication of the Gaudiya Math.

Visitors at the Gaudiya Math.

June 4, at 9 A. M.—Srijut Nanigopal Joardar M. A. (Oxon.), B. D., and Srijut Durgapada Basu, cashier Balarampar Estate. His Divine Grace spoke regarding the speciality of Gaudiya philosophy by comparing the same with other philosophical systems both of the East und West.

June 12, afternoon,—Dr. Bibhutibhusan Dutt D. Sc., P. R. S., Professor of Mathematics, Calcutta Science College; Srijut Kshetralal Saha M. A., professor of English literature Nalanda College, Bihar Sarif; Srijukta Kaviraj Birendra Nath Sen Gupta of Uluberia.

His Divine Grace had a short talk with Dr. Datt on the position of Mathematics in the east and west. His Divine Grace then proceeded to explain in Mathematical language the nature of the service of the Godhead and the various stages of the same.

Srijukta Prakash Chandra Dutt Principal Jorhat Technical institute paid a visit to the new Temple and buildings of the Gaudiya Math at Baghazar under construction and after careful inspection express e his unbounded admiration of the truth, originality and high quality of the art, design and execution of details of the buildings.

Babu Dakshinaranjan Ghose B. A., at the Gaudiya Math.

In the fore-noon of Tuesday, June 1, Srijukta Dakshinaranjan Ghose B.A., Retired Deputy Magistrate and a well-known writer and compiler of Vaishnava Hymns had a long interview with Srila Paramhansa Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Thakur at the Gaudiya Math. His Divine Grace spoke on the superiority of the worship of Sri Radha-Govinda to that of Sri Ram-Sita and exposed the unsoundness of the view that has been circulated by speculative thinkers like Raja Ram Mohan Roy, Bhandarkar, Macuicol and other writers on the subject. Dakshina Babu admitted the Truth expressed by His Grace and the necessity of the employment of the teacher's rod and the physician's lancet by the Gaudiya for the cure of gangrenous formations in the Gaudiya Society that are being sedulously fostered by disguised and open enemies of the truth. We intend to present the reader with the substance of His Divine Grace's important discourse in a succeeding issue of the journal.

Dr. Moreno's letter of Appreciation.

In the last issue is published the text of Dr. Moreno's letter to His Divine Grace. Dr. Moreno has claimed to be recognised as the compatriot of His Divine Grace. But the Doctor will certainly pardon us if we remind him that His Divine Grace is preaching that we are all of us by own proper nature the denizens of the same country viz., the kingdom of God. The Gaudiya Math does not stand for geographical, political or social India. It is the exponent of spiritual India which is categorically different from any country of this world. Dr. Moreno should have, therefore, no hesitation to invite the people of the whole world to be his compatriots of spiritual India. The letter itself is couched in the most cordial terms that should go a great way to establish unreserved and complete fellowship among all pure souls who are not attached by partisanship to the temporary and disruptive concerns of this world.

The festival of Sree Radha-Madanamohana

(Entry into the new Temple and Buildings of the Gaudiya Math Oct. 5, 1930.)

The question has been asked why it is necessary to have a shrine made of brick and mortar for the worship of God The shrine has been supposed to be at best only a kind of temporary aid for a primitive form of worship to a person of undeveloped mentality. As such a person is supposed to understand nothing as true but gross matter he is considered to be naturally inclined to the worship of enshrined idols. To most people with 'ordinary' culture such 'foreign' help has often seemed to be not only not necessary but positively and rightly repugnant. The formal entry into a shrine containing the holy Forms of the Divine Pair would appear to such thinkers to be an unjustifiable concession to people with a particularly dense judgment who should be an extinct race in the quondum Metropolis of British India in this twentieth century after Christ. The function may thus be opined to be lacking even in the excuse of being a foolish, unavoidable surrender to the thoughtless demos.

It is the contention of the organisers; that the ceremony of entry into the spiritual Abode of the Divine Pair worshipped by the Gaudiyas is absolutely necessary for the reason that it alone can remove the spiritual ignorance of all the people of this world by imparting to them the knowledge of their relationship with the Divinity.

It is not possible to have any duty towards Godhead without any knowledge of the nature of one's relationship to Him. It is possible for every one of us to have this knowledge which a mortal does not ordinarily possess. The knowledge of man is confined to this phenomenal world. If a human being wants to define Godhead by means of his present knowledge such definition will necessarily make God a commodity of this phenomenal world in his estimation. Such a person is bound to suppose further that God is both impersonal and inanimate. Because if God really exists like any other object of this world and also possesses animation and rationality it should be possible to find Him out and to hold communion with Him on our own terms, which has not yet been possible for at least the vast majority of the cultured people.

There is of course a small number of persons who suppose that it is possible to find God as an animate person and to have actual dealings with Him. These persons also declare that it is possible for all to know and have such dealings with Godhead. Various elaborate methods have been put forward by these 'sects' for helping one to attain the vision and relationship of Godhead. But inspite of these definite 'assurance' and 'realisations' no paticular 'Prophet' or 'Doctrine' has yet received unanimous or even general recognition either of the masses or of the intelligensia of the world.

But it has been possible to arrive at a consensus of opinions in other departments of knowledge. In the sphere of 'religion' alone extreme differences of 'opinion' have hitherto proved to be ineradicable. In other words knowledge of spiritual matters has not progressed to the stage that has been actually attained in the case of knowledge regarding all other subjects. How are we to account for this ?

The very first thing that has to be done if the real truth is to be discovered and propagated, is to try first of all to understand the nature of the issue itself. This should be the only starting point in the journey towards the Truth.

What is Godhead ? Why should we concern ourselves about Godhead ? These are the questions that naturally confront one on the threshold of the theistic life. We should not enter the shrine unless and until we are convinced of the necessity of worshipping the God within.

The ordinary answer that you will see the idol and be enabled to worship it after you enter the temple should be rejected at once as unsatisfactory. One is clamorously pressed to enter a variety of temples with different idols and worships. How is he to select from among them the one object of his worship without the requisite preliminary knowledge ?

The contention that knowledge follows practice is not also any solution of the difficulty. The questions disturbing a person who seeks entry into the temple are, 'What is Godhead ? Why am I to worship Him at all ? Why should it be impossible for any person who knows these matters to convey a correct idea of them to an honest enquirer ? The idea of a thing is not, of course, identical with the thing itself. But the idea should be of help in inducing a person to decide about the necessity of worshipping at a particular shrine.'

Knowledge of some sort regarding the nature of Godhead, the nature of His worship, and the nature of His worshipper, viz. the enquirer himself, must precede the rational acceptance of any form of worship. The worship of a rational being can only be an intelligible attempt to 'realise' some kind of antecedent symbolic or ideal knowledge. This preliminary knowledge of practicable relationship with God is the proper motive behind all actual rational attempt to realise such relationship. But the preliminary knowledge is not the relationship itself. There must also be an 'object' for cultivating such relationship. This 'object' again is different from both the symbolic knowledge as well as the process of relationship.

Therefore this precedent 'knowledge' of the nature of Godhead need not be supposed to be identical with the 'object' attainable by 'worship'. On the contrary the 'object' of 'worship' can only be realisable by means of 'worship' based upon a correct symbolical knowledge of the nature of the Worshipped as possessing the power and inclination to bestow on His worshipper the grace of His service which should be naturally desirable to the latter for its own sake.

The worship of the Divine Pair Sri Sri Radha-Madanamohana is the worship of the followers of Sri Chaitanyadeva or the Gaudiya Vaishnavas belonging to the Madhwa community. The worship of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda by the other communities is a derivative of the worship of the Gaudiyas and also essentially different from the latter inspite of much superficial resemblance.

In order to worship Sri Sri Radha Madanamohana it is first of all necessary to obtain the preliminary knowledge of the nature of such worship. This is the 'knowledge of relationship'. The acquisition of this knowledge is the first step in spiritual endeavour (sadhana). Sri Sanatan Goswami Prabhu was authorised by Sri Chaitanya-deva to impart this preliminary 'knowledge of relationship' to His followers. Sri Sanatan Goswami Prabhu is the sole Acharyya of this process which is called initiation into the knowledge of the Divinity. By the attainment of this knowledge of relationship one is enabled to enter into the spiritual Abode of the Divine Pair or the Gaudiya Math.

The servitors, their service, the holy Forms of the Divine Pair installed in their spiritual Abode collectively form the category of 'the Worshipped.' There is an 'inner' and an 'outer' body of worshippers of Godhead. The 'inner' servitors are a part and parcel of the Divinity Himself. The 'inner' servitors 'call' the 'outer' servitors to participate in their eternal service of the Divine Pair in the transcendental Realm of Goloka. The Gaudiya Math is the holy Abode of Godhead and of His eternal servants made manifest to the vision of the people of this world by the grace of the Acharyya of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas who is the spiritual successor of Sri Rupa and Sanatan Goswami Prabhus, the eternal Divinely appointed teachers, by their conduct and precept, of the loving service of the Divine Pair Sri Sri Radha-Govinda in the eternal transcendental realm of Goloka. Sri Rupa Goswami is the original practising teacher (Acharyya) of the function of spiritual service constituting the 'worship' of the Divine Pair. The 'object' of spiritual service is the attainment of love to the Feet of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda for the sake of such love.

The Name of the Divine Couple worshipped by Sri Sanatan Goswami Prabhu is Sri Sri Radha-Madanamohana. Sri Radhika is the Divine Counterwhole of Sri Madanamohana. Sri Radhika reciprocates the love of Sri Madanamohana. She is the Mistress and Sweetheart of Her amorous and sole Divine Lover. The Name Madanamohana indicates that the Lover of Sri Radhika is different from, and yet symbolically similar to, the God of mundane amour. Sri Sri Madanamohana is far more lovely than the supposed lovely God of mundane amour in as much as the latter is liable to be subdued and bewitched by the real and eternally enduring superior charm of the Divine Lover of Sri Radhika There is only analogical resemblance, differing even in analogy both in degree and quality, between the highest conceivable mundane amour and the transcendental amour of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda. But there is also a categorical difference between the two. The preliminary knowledge of this cannot be available to the dissociable individual soul except by the grace of Sri Sanatan Goswami Prabhu manifested through the eternal chain of spiritual teachers represented to us at this moment by the present Acharyya of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas—His Divine Grace Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj.

His Divine Grace has named the function of the entry into the new Temple and residential quarters of the Gaudiya Math, which is to take place on the 5th of October, as the Festival of Sri Sri Radha-Madanamohanaji.

The members of the Viswa-Vaishnava Raj Sabha have been commanded by His Divine Grace to invite all persons to receive the preliminiary knowledge of spiritual service by joining the All-Vaishnava Conference which is to assemble in the Hall of the Gaudiya Math on the day of the Festival of Sri Sri Radha-Govindaji, in order to learn from the holy lips of His Divine Grace and other speakers enlightened by Him, in a symbolically intelligible form, the nature of the worship of the Divine Pair. Those fortunate persons who really seek the Absolute Truth should be enabled thereby to receive the preliminary knowledge of the Truth by the grace of the Acharyya. The members of the Viswa-Vaishnava-Raj-Sabha accordingly invite one and all to avail of this opportunity for obtaining the working knowledge of the Truth by the grace of the Acharyya and Sri Chaitanyadeva. It is only by Means of such knowledge that the Truth figured to our limited vision by the present, by us undecipherable, symbols of the Shrine of the Gaudiya Math, the holy Forms and their Worship by the pure Devotees of the Math, may be truly realised.

Brahmanya-Deva and Brahmanas.

(Prof. Yadubar Dasadhikary M, A. B. L. Bhaktishastri).

THE word 'Brahmanya' (ब्रह्मण्यः) means (ब्रह्मणे हितः) a friend or benefactor to Brahman (ब्रह्मण्) or Brahmana (ब्राह्मण). It also means the object of worship to a Brahmana. And both these senses in fact point to one and the same thing, for the real Friend and the best Benefactor is certainly the truest and highest Object of worship or love. Who is then this Brahmanya-deva ?

He is no other than Vishnu Himself, the all-pervading Supreme soul. So we find in the Santi Parvan of the Mahabharata 'Brahmanya' and 'dear to Brahmana' as two of a thousand epithets of Vishnu, the Supreme Lord. (1)

Anhika-Chandrika also points to the same fact. (2)

Here the Brahmanya-deva is Vishnu, the All-pervading. He is Achyuta—the ever Unchangeable, and is Krishna—the Son of Devaki. Hence we make obeisance to Him in the words of Vishnu-Puranam. (3)

'Salutation to Brahmanya-deva, the Friend (Protector) of the vedic lore and Brahmanas, the Protector of the Universe, Who is Krishna (the most pleasing Attractor) and Cowherd (of Brindaban) ; salutation to Him again and again.'

The word 'Namas' in the verse means the negation of egoism or pride. So by salutation we mean absolute surrender at the Feet of our object of worship or love. For true and perfect love is not possible so long as one retains an iota of selfishness or egoism.

A certain degree of self-surrender and selflessness seems to be present also in lust. Any display of palpable excess of selfishness would scare away the victim of lust and make the process difficult of realisation. But in so-called earthly love genuine self-surrender and selflessness is out of the question. Love here on earth,—nay in the domain of Maya, can not but be wholly selfish. Here all existence being phenomenal and selfcentred, love also directly and necessarily pertains to the deluded mind and body, and cannot divest itself of self-seeking and self-gratification. And self-gratification of the Jiva is sensuousness or lust. Love here on this earth and of one creature towards another is essentially sensuous and can therefore, be never lasting or true. Yet selflessness is the only admitted mark of its purity which of course may vary in the degree of perfection.

But the case is quite different with transcendental love which is a function of the pure soul and which is therefore necessarily pure. Any reservation in favour of physical or mental gratification will deprive love of the quality of its natural absolute purity. Transcendental love connects the individual Soul with the Oversoul and regulates the dealings of individual souls towards one another in the state of grace. It is perfectly free from any touch of mundane impurity. The serving individual soul seeks no pleasure of his own. His only object is to seek the pleasures of the senses of the

(1) "ब्रह्मण्यो ब्रह्मगृद् ब्रह्मा, ब्रह्म ब्रह्मविवर्द्धनः । ब्रह्मविद् ब्राह्मणो ब्रह्मी ब्रह्मज्ञो ब्राह्मणप्रियः ॥"

(2) ब्रह्मण्यो देवकीपुत्रो ब्रह्मण्यो मधुसूदनः । ब्रह्मण्यः पुण्डरीकाक्षो, ब्रह्मण्यो विष्णुरच्युतः ।

(3) नमो ब्रह्मण्यदेवाय गोब्राह्मण हिताय च । जगद्धिताय कृष्णाय गोविन्दाय नमोनमः ॥

Godhead,—the only Object of his love. As this also happens to be the function and lookout of all pure souls, they are all united by these common impulse in truly unselfish friendly emulation for serving the Lord by the method of unity in diversity. Love has been set forth by Sree Chaitanyadeva in the last Sloka of the octave of His own composition. (4)

'He (Krishna) may hold me lying at His feet in close embrace, trample upon me with scorn, or wound me to the quick by keeping out of my sight. Attached to the gratification of His senses whatever may be the course of that Libertine, nevertheless, He alone—and none else is, indeed, the beloved Lord of my life.'

Real love is possible only when directed to the holy Feet of Krishna alone. This is the highest goal of human life as taught by the Supreme Lord Chaitanya.

It has been said above that Lord Vishnu, Brahmanyadeva, Krishna is dear to, and is the Worshipped of, Brahmans. Is he then the exclusive Lord of any particularly favoured caste or class? Have not people other than Brahmanas any right to worship and love Him? And have not creatures other than human being the same right and fitness? In other words, is Brahmanhood the monopoly of a particular species of created beings? And is it again the monopoly of a particular class of a species of creatures called man?

It will surely be preposterous to answer it in the affirmative. It is arrogance and ignorance on the part of a particular class or species to deny this right to any other creature. And it does not stand to reason to maintain that it should be necessary to regard it as their special and exclusive privilege in any limited sense. God is the creator, Friend and Protector of all creatures and every creature is endowed with an inherent right to claim Him as his own, or in other words, to worship and love Him. Godhead retains the prerogative of being partial to those who are partial to Him. Else God would be no God, becoming only a subservient creature of the fancy of erring tiny individuals.

Hence the word 'Brahmana' in the epithet 'dear to Brahmanas' is not to be taken in any narrow sense defined by the circumstances of this world. Here 'Brahmana' has the true universal sense, meaning any creature recognising his relationship of absolute association with the great One.' 'All creatures created by Brahma or Brahmanyadeva are Brahmanas. (5)

(5) "सर्व्वे ब्रह्मजा ब्राह्मणाश्च"

Every individual soul is a Brahmana by his essential nature; he is Brahmana as a creature of Brahmanyadeva, as a worshipper or servant of the one Lord. The worshipper of Brahmanyadeva, is, therefore, a Brahmana. So that Brahmanhood is the inherent quality or virtue of every pure serving soul. The worship of Vishnu or Brahmanyadeva is everyone's birthright and only natural duty.

Although the condition of a Brahmana is the essential nature of all creatures, yet obviously enough, it is the special privilege of human beings to be able to attain easily to this most desirable state, and to know and love God; because the possibility of rational and true knowledge is found only in human beings. Among men again the perfection of rationality and true knowledge is to be met with, not universally, but only in very rare cases. These rare cases of human beings are the only true Brahmanas.

For this possibility of the attainment of true rationality and knowledge by a human being, human life, though in itself imperfect and transitory, has been declared by the Scriptures as the most precious of all and most difficult of attainment. By humanity alone the truest and highest good open to all creatures can be achieved. Hence it is enjoined in the Scriptures that human life should be utilised to the full for the above purpose. This should be done without delay and continued till the moment of death. For this peculiar advantage human beings are regarded by the Scriptures as the highest of all creatures in this world.

It is also quite obvious, that even among men it may not be the lot of one and all to turn this great possibility into reality. The condition of a Brahmana has not been achieved by one and all in any Age in the history of creation. Diversity of taste and capacity is noticeable in different persons, and according to this diversity there is found to exist a broad Divine classification of human beings under fourheads, viz. Brahmana, Kshattriya, Vaishya and Shudra. As humanity is the highest of all worldly conditions, so Brahmanhood again is the highest level of humanity. But this does never mean that Brahmanas are an exclusive hereditary caste, or that the so-called caste-Brahmanas are perfect human beings. Brahmanhood is not the exclusive possession of any human being by right of birth. What is meant by the Varna or class of Brahmanas is that the aptitudes of Brahmanhood are found to prevail in the members and that they are for this reason naturally and individually better qualified than any other class of individuals by their possession of true knowledge to serve Krishna which is the highest goal and good of the human life. They form a spiritual class of individuals devoted to the service of Vishnu and are accordingly regarded by the Scriptures as the natural leaders of society for guiding it to the same perfection.

It has been observed above that Brahamanas are so called to indicate that they are individual souls wholly devoted to the worship of Brahmanya deva or Vishnu. In this sense the term Brahmana is wide enough to be able to accommodate any and every created being, as also in its restricted and higher sense. Owing to the disinclination of the creatures of this world to serve Vishnu, it means a particular class of select individuals. Any individual member of the Brahmana-class is liable to forfeit his status of a Brahmana by neglect of the service of Brahmanyadeva, Krishna—his eternal Lord,—enjoined by the Scriptures for the purposes of developing our love for Krishna, which is the supreme goal of all individual existence. A Brahmana who neglects his duty will automatically lose his pre-eminence and will have no more claim to be a Brahmana than any member of any other class. He has failed to utilise the opportunities available to him and has abused the privileges, and, therefore, should rightly forfeit his right to the distinction and honour of a Brahmana. For the same reason, any individual of any other class, manifesting the aptitudes of a real Brahmana, should be regarded and classed as a Brahmana. Caste-conventions can and should never be any bar to the recognition of Brahmanhood. The classification of society into four Varnas noted above is a convention based on accurate observation of actual conditions. But shorn of their true meaning and purpose they are liable to become selfish iron-shackles and obstacles to retard the spiritual progress of society. The Scriptures fully recognise the fact that a Brahman may degenerate into a worldling and a Sudra by birth may display the qualities of a Brahmana.

We have noticed above that true knowledge and love of Godhead constitute Brahmanhood. Hence this is the fundamental qualification of a true Brahmana; and motiveless uninterrupted unalloyed and all-round service of Brahmanyadeva is the proper and only function of a Brahmana or a pure soul. A Jiva or individual soul in his pure state is, therefore, a Brahmana. When he chooses to forget the true nature of his ownself by deliberately attaching himself to non-Brahmanyadeva or Maya, he becomes subject to misery by his election of ignorance. In this apparently forgetful and miserable state he degenerates into a Sudra or a creature of sorrow and ignorance. Sudrahood is the self-acquired second nature of a worldling; it is the perverted reflection of the real self which is mistaken as his true nature by a deliberately irrational use of his judgment. Non-remembrance once deliberately and wilfully adopted, quickly grows so strong and complete that a Jiva in the Sudra state regards it as self-annihilating to believe in his inherent, indestructible Brahmanhood, and would not care, nor have any liking for his proper function of the service of Brahmanyadeva, and consequent unalloyed and ever-increasing joy flowing from the service of the Divinity. Yet the Brahmanhood of Jivatma or a pure soul in his free state can never become altogether extinct, just as the activities of our consciousness do not wholly cease even during sound sleep. Brahmanhood thus enshrouded by Maya has to be regained. This is true self-realisation. And when from a sincere desire to know and consciously serve Brahmanyadeva a Jiva approaches, with proper submission, the Acharya, true Preceptor who knows and serves the Absolute Truth, and by the grace of Brahmanyadeva, is accepted and admitted into pupilage by the merciful Acharya, he is then truly initiated into the process of self-realisation and gets the appellation of a Brahmana.

In Sudra or miserable deluded state a Jiva has a fourfold pride or conceit which is the characteristic and expression of his Sudra nature so long as a Jiva prefers to be blinded by these conceits he necessarily fails to perceive and accept the favour and light that is always vouchsafed by Brahmanyadeva. That is, on account of his challenging spirit due to these ignorant conceits and consequent utter want of submission, the Truth Who reveals Himself mercifully to all who do not shut their eyes is not welcome and knowable.

The first of these conceits is the conceit of birth. When a Jiva forgets his true self, he chooses to believe his physical encasement i.e. the body, to be his own self. He identifies himself in practice with the mortal material body, and does not effectively believe in his spiritual existence which is quite apart from and beyond the body. He is then proud or humble, elated or depressed, according to the social rank in which he i. e., his body appears to be born. To such a human being occupying a high or low social position, the Vedas give the name of Sudra and the Srimad Bhagabatam calls him Gokhara or one of the most foolish of foolish animals.

The other three forms of conceits are inseparably related to and dependent on the first one which is, indeed, the main root and stay of the rest. The second conceit is that of wealth. All the wealth of the phenomenal universe is really no property of the soul. Nobody carries it away with him as he departs from the world. It is at least only an apparent right of temporary possession and enjoyment. But this right of seeming temporary possession and enjoyment is declared by the Scripture as imaginary and as the source of all misery. Brahmanyadeva is the real and only proprietor of everything. The phenomenal world is, however, His disowned property located outside His proper realm. Jivas or creatures forgetful of the nature of their true selves and their true function viz., the eternal service of Brahmanyadeva in the Absolute Realm, pose as tin-gods and pseudo-masters and usurp the right of material enjoyment in this house of correction. Such wrong conceit of being proprietor and enjoyer of the objects of the material universe arises, when the true knowledge of the relation eternally subsisting between Brahmanyadeva, the individual souls, and the material and spiritual worlds, is overshadowed by self-willed ignorance of the individual soul. At the dawning of true knowledge the Jiva sees that he is the eternal servant of Brahmanyadeva in the realm of Vaikuntha and no self-elected pseudo-proprietor of the realm of Illusion and that his duty is not to pursue selfish enjoyment but to serve the Lord not with the material things of this world which although belonging to Him are never acceptable to Him, but by the faculties of his pure soul restored to their natural function by the Grace of the Saviour or Sri Gurudeva.

The third is the conceit of learning or scholarship. This is also born of sheer ignorance. True knowledge of the proper relation between Brahmanyadeva, Brahmana and the worlds spoken of above is the real and useful knowledge, and it keeps the pure soul really humbler than a blade of grass. By the cognitive faculty of the pure soul a Jiva realises his own spiritual nature as an infinitesimally small fractional part of the Serving Potency of Brahmanyadeva, and the futility of his deluded ignorance, thus called knowledge, generated by his irrational dealings with this world. He realises that the knowledge of physical Nature is the ignorance that screens from his view the realm of Vaikuntha and perpetuates his ignorance and holds him fast in the fell grip of the deadening Energy. He realises that Brahmanyadeva is the Absolute Truth, the Supreme Godhead, that every particle of the Absolute realm which alone is real is of His essence and that Krishna with His spiritual realm makes one indivisible conscious personality, Who is related to this world as light to darkness.

The fourth is the conceit of physical beauty. It is quite obvious how fragile and vile this apparently charming commodity of this world is. This is one of the brood of the wilful identification of the soul with his physical temporal prison and is the sauce that stimulates the inclination for selfish enjoyment. It enchants and betrays its victims viz., the so-called enjoyer and the enjoyed, by holding out the prospect of a false satisfaction, that is never satiated, of enjoying and being enjoyed. This physical beauty deludes the vision and keeps concealed from it the eternal and true Beauty of Brahmanyadeva that is visible only to the serving soul.

All these four forms of false pride constitute the motive behind the functions of the perverse soul or Sudra, the creature of sorrow. If any of these conceits is unsatisfied, partially satisfied, or obstructed, the Jiva feels very miserable and unhappy and considers his life a failure. Whereas the function of a Brahmana, or a loyal soul is the perpetual service of Brahmanyadeva only, which is Bhakti or Devotion. A Brahmana categorically discards all these conceits and is perfectly submissive to Brahmanyadeva.

If these four are the false prides that are liable to overtake a Jiva due to his wilful ignorance, what constitutes the truth corresponding to them ? The Absolute Godhead, Lord Gaurasundar, has pointed out the true nature of the Jiva and his natural relation with the Godhead :—'I am no member of any of the four orders (Varna), nor am I in any of the four stages (Asrama). But I am a humble servant of the servants of the servants of the lotus-feet of the sweetheart of the spiritual milkmaids, Who is the ocean of all ever-increasing Supreme Joy. *

A Jiva by his spiritual nature is an eternal servant of Krishna. He is a pure devotee. He is not a member of any social order of this world, nor belongs to any stage of the worldly life. One whose soul is awakened is spontaneously inclined to and engaged in the service of Godhead by all his faculties, and for all time. He is a Brahmana who is altogether free from the sway of Maya. The true devotee is the only perfect and true Brahmana. It is only a malicious atheist who can fail to recognise the Brahmanhood of the true devotee. True devotion is to be found only in the Brahmanas and never in Sudras. A Brahmana is such because he is always a true devotee of Brahmanyadeva, whereas a Sudra, so long as he persists in his worldly conceits, can never be regarded as fit to be

* नाहं विप्रो न च नरपतिर्नापि वैश्यो न शूद्रो नाहं वर्णी न च गृहपतिर्नो वनस्थो यतिर्वा । किन्तु प्रोद्यन्निखिलपरमानन्दपूर्णामृताब्धेर्गोपीभर्तुः पदकमलयोर्दासदासानुदासः ॥ servant of Brahmanyadeva. Semblance of devotion that is to be met with in him is nothing but his love for objects of his own sensuous enjoyment, and not any love for Brahmanyadeva. Want of pure devotion manifests itself in a Jiva who is averse to serve God by free choice and is the only criterion of the condition of a Sudra. So says Sruti :

'O Gargi ! One who passes away from this world without knowing the immortal Reality is an object of pity,—a Sudra ; whereas one who leaves this world after having known Him is truly a Brahmana.'

Enlighteners Regarding Aspersions

A Spiritual Devotee offers his Divine Services like a loved to her lover by ignoring the barriers of Foreign Things

The Case of Vilwamangal.

THE reference to an idol and its condemnable attribution has no lien to perpetual unalloyed souls, viz, the Vaishnavas. The Vaishnavas look through and beyond the material properties as they want to serve and not to enjoy. They find nothing worthy of condemnation in the Image as they are not anxious to set any stores by their subjective vision An idolater approaches his idol with the intention of fulfilling his desires, whereas a spiritual devotee is found to offer his 'services' ignoring the insurmountable barriers of foreign things, like a loved to her lover. This is fully illustrated in the appreciated life of Vilwamangal with whom heavy cyclonic gales, highly established pedigree, a dead corpse and a venomous serpent were no barriers but positive helps to reach his goal.

Idolatry is certainly an intercepting barrier to a Devotee if he is guided by the ideas of mundane Spectators.

The attitude is the whole thing. If I want to serve Godhead with all my faculties, the Image Himself at once and for this very reason becomes the true symbol of the Object of my worship. All material obstacles will then cease and animate objects operate as excitants of devotion to the Transcendental. They suggest and symbolise in the most powerful manner the most characteristic qualities of the most devoted service of the Absolute. This certainly is not idolatry in the sense of worship of a creature of our desires for extorting from it sensuous satisfaction for ourselves. The devotee sees her beloved in every object. The object itself is not of course transformed into something different from itself. But it does not suggest any gross corporal material relationship as to a mundane spectator. It acts like a small barrier interposed on the path of descent of a mighty mountain torrent, that serves only to augment the force of the rushing mass of water. The pure soul intent on serving the beloved Lord remembers Him most tenderly in moments of the greatest isolation. She will be in love with such isolation and prefer its solitude to even the society of so called sympathising 'friends' of this selfish world.

In fact the Image has His real existence in the attitude of the worshipper towards the object of his worship. To the idolater Godhead would still be the Image even if He chose to appear bodily to his view. The Idolater would never think, of the pleasure of the Lord but only of his sensuous self even when he finds himself in actual presence of the Divinity. It is only the lover who is privileged to understand the nature of his relationship with the object of his love. A loveless nature can be but a worshipper of himself in all circumstances. This makes all the difference between idolatry and spiritual devotion.

The devotee alone can realise his true relationship to his Beloved. The devotee has no other function except loving the Lord. The selfish worldling has no other function than to seek for his own enjoyment. Love in the latter takes the perverted form of lust or the desire of selfish enjoyment. He loves only those objects that minister to his own selfish pleasure. He only pretends to love even God but for the same purpose. This is Idolatry. He can have no real relationship with Godhead, because the Supreme Lord can never in His proper Nature serve the pleasure of His creatures. When, therefore, a lustful person professes to worship God, he worships only the embodiment of his own lust. It is also such persons who are most fastidiously particular about the letter of scriptural statements in regarding ceremonials and symbols of worship. But the Pharisee is always the Pharisee with all his scrupulosity and pedantry.

Idolatry is certainly an intercepting barrier to a devotee if he is guided by the ideas of a mundane spectator. Love directed to the spurious concocted idea of Godhead is intercepted by the concoction. If Godhead is supposed to be any other than what He really is, devotion to such a hypothesis is bound to be doubly harmful. There is no lack of examples of soft-hearted sensuous sentimentalists who parade their sentimental vagaries on bahalf of the concoctions of their own sinful nature, as devotion to God. It is the unbalanced state of these misguided persons copying the externals of devotion that is responsible for much of the suspicion with which the ceremonials of the religion of devotion is regarded by the uninitiated. This display of hysterical emotion for any object of this world must be carefully distinguished from true devotion. The practice of exaggerated sentimentalism for mundane conceptions or objects may afford a fund of pleasure to persons who are constitutionally disposed to be unnatural, but it has a very demoralising effect both on the person who allows himself to fall under its power and on the spectators who may mistake it for devotion.

Krishna is Located Above and Beyond Empiric Knowledge. The Holy Form श्रीविग्रह. The Devotees do not Subscribe to the artificial elimination of the Externalities.

Vaishnavas do not run the risk of falling into the blunder of mundane sentimentalism, because they know Krishna to be adhokshaja that is located above the scope of all knowledge born of the senses; whereas idol-worshippers are found to be busy in recognising the object of worship as one of the manifested articles of Nature. It is not sufficient to borrow a correct phrase and apply it to a form of worship conforming externally to the prescriptions of the Scriptures to be able to avoid the sin of idol-worship. It is necessary to be on our guard against both physical and mental idols. The idea born of the senses must be fully recognised as utterly inapplicable to the transcendental. It is very difficult, nay impossible, for a mortal to be free from all predilection for cherished ideas and not to mistake them as transcendental. It is, for instance, possible for a person to admire the Sri Bigraha (the Holy Form) as an embodiment of certain mental conceptions derived from sensuous experience and suppose that he is thereby protected against the sin of idolatry. As a matter of fact, he has only transferred his homage to the to the mental idol and to the transcendental Form of Godhead Those, who deny all necessity for a visible Form in worshipping God, may be, and as a matter of fact, are bound to be worshippers of mental idols, in as much as their opposition to visible idols is based on the mistaken notion that the transcendental is identical with the mental and the invisible. It is incumbent on us to avoid both physical and mental idols in rendering worship to the transcendental. The object of worship must not be identified with anything physical or mental both of which are articles 'made of clay'. The devotees know full well that Godhead cannot come, either directly or indirectly, under the jurisdiction of the senses. That which we see, hear or know by means of senses cannot be God. He has strictly reserved the right of not being exposed to the senses of man treading on the plane of three dimensions. The idol-worshipper regards the object of his worship as belonging to this plane of three dimensions. All speculation on the Godhead based on sensuous experience belongs to this category. The attitude itself is responsible for the blunder. It is not the attitude of worship at all. It is not possible to have the attitude of worship towards objects of three dimensions, because they are contained and exceeded by the senses. The senses cannot really bow to them for the reason that all objects of three dimensions can be approached and inspected by the senses on their own initiative. The material objects of this world lie passively exposed to the senses for the gratification of the same. They are by their very nature incapable of accepting our service but are made to apparently minister to our wants. As soon as we accept the sensuous gratification offered by them, we become by such act not worshippers of those objects but the slaves of our own sensuous appetites. It is impossible for the brain of man to devise a way out of this difficulty that stands in the way of the attainment of the genuine act of worship. That which is done in order to satisfy our hankering for sense-gratification is not worship or service of the Godhead.

The appearance of Godhead as the holy form.

Godhead mercifully takes the initiative of appearing to us for enabling us to serve at all. It is possible to eternally worship Him, because He is incapable of ever submitting to the jurisdiction of the senses. The mystery of the Godhead's 'appearance' in this world is explained by the famous shloka (1) of the Bhagabatam.

Godhead may appear in this world in the apparent likeness of a mundane person, but His parentage has no reference to mudane personages. The un-alloyed spirit is the cause (parent) of the Godhead's 'appearing' on the un-alloyed plane of the pure individual soul. He does not 'appear' to the senses at all. He always appears only to the pure soul and necessarily on the spiritual plane. The soul and his plane are categorically different from the mind and mental plane; both of which are a part and parcel of the phenomenal life. The mind has no access to the spiritual except on the initiative of the latter. The Lord is prone to take the initiative and appears to the mind and senses in total disregard of all constituent limitations of the latter. This is inconceivable to our limited judgment, but nothing is for that reason impossible for the Lord.

(1) सत्त्वं विशुद्धं वसुदेवशब्दितं यदीयते तत्र पुमानपावृतः। सत्त्वस्य तस्मिन् भगवान् वासुदेवो ह्यधोक्षजो मे नमसा विधीयते॥

But the fact that the Lord on His own initiative 'appears' to our senses, does not prevent the mundane critic from retaining his wrong ideas regarding the objective and subjective existence of the Fountain-head. He is at liberty to rely on those wrong ideas in dealing with spiritual manifestations and to suppose his object of investigation to belong to the category of objects which are a part and parcel of Nature. The inconceivable fact of the 'appearance' of the Absolute on the plane of the Limited is likely to overwhelm and confound his judgment, the resources of which are utterly inadequate for the purpose of enabling him to grasp the relationship of the worshipper to the Object of worship. Empiric judgment deceives itself by attempting to conceive and realise the inconceivable by argumentative speculations and imaginations. But the devotees do not subscribe to such artificial eliminations of the externalities, as such an attempt would defeat its purpose by the exclusion of all perceptual as well as conceptual products of the mind belonging equally and inseparably to the mundane plane. They accordingly abstain from ascribing any potential features to the Personality of Godhead when the Object of worship (अर्चा) manifests Himself on the transcendental plane in a Form that is visible to mundane spectators also.

Worship of the Holy Form is not Idolatry.

The Bhagabatam safeguards against idolatrous attitude by shlokas (2) which refute the idolatry of a non-Vaishnava. The Vaishnava is very careful not to designate himself as an idol-worshipper. But neither is he found to sever his connection with the positive Reality of the Self-existent. He does not turn his face away from the concentration of the Divine Personality in the Divine Form (श्रीविग्रह). As he beholds the Sri Bigraha, the holy Embodiment of the full Divinity, he considers that Krishna has unveiled Himself to him suspending all deformities of the world and his own perverted sensuous activities. So he need not accept the theory of Illusory Energy acting on him any longer. The gross idols and the broken idols do not puzzle him in his clear, perpetual sight ever existing on the transcendental plane.

Who is a Brahmana?

At persent all those persons who are born of Brahmana father and mother claim the exclusive right of being invested with the holy thread of sacrifice at their option and thereby acquiring the status of the twice-born as a matter of course. This is given out by these hereditary caste-Brahmanas as being in accordance with some Grihya Sutras and Dharma Shastras. These caste-Brahmanas affect to regard themselves as the authorised protectors and regulators of society by scriptural authorisation. They also contend that this arrangement has been eternal and has come down in tact from the time of the Rig-Veda, our available oldest record. It is necessary to consider the genesis of these claims in the light of actual religious history and scriptural evidence.

These caste Brahmanas profess to take their stand ultimately on Vedic texts. They affect to attach the highest sanctity to the Vedic Samhitas; but, as a matter of fact, they rely specially on the most recent compilations from the later Dharma Shastras. In Bengal the favourite authority for the claims of the seminal Brahmanas is Raghunandan Bhattacharya who was two generations younger than Sri Chaitanya deva. The caste-Brahmanas profess almost exclusive allegiance to the Smritis. But their practices cannot be reconciled with the provisions of the Smritis.

The hereditary position of the Brahmanas is recognised by the Dharma Shastras which were promulgated for the regulation of the worldly affairs of the masses of the people. But the provision of heredity itself is hedged round, even in the Dharma Shastras, by the most elaborate and apparently impossible conditions. The absolute purity of seminal descent is laid down as essential. The ancestors are required to be of the purest Brahmana descent. They must have lived and continue to live the life recommended by the scriptures for a Brahmana. The least deviation from such a course deprives them and their progeny of all privileges of Brahmana birth. These conditions are made light of by the commentators and have been shamelessly discarded by the cynical Smarta Pandits of our day who are shielded by spurious, conflicting interpretations of every text that presents any difficulty in the way of conduct unchecked by salutary principle. I put these facts at the very outset of this discourse for the reason that they alone are likely to be intelligible to the caste-Brahmanas who profess to rely on the letter of the texts and are given to hair-splitting arguments for defending the literal method that is so dear to all lovers of wilful ignorance for safeguarding their corrupt vested interests.

The scriptures recognise the hereditary principle for the purpose of the regulation of secular society but make ample provision for the prevention of its abuse. The hereditary principle is nowhere allowed any place in the higher, properly spiritual, concerns. The hereditary social arrangements are placed definitely under the absolute guidance of the spiritual group. Every care is taken to clearly distinguish between the two divisions. These safeguards are embodied in the regulations themselves. But the spiritual Dharma Shastras impose these rules on the community by the arguments of custom, antiquity and prospect of rewards, the argument of covetable material result being alone to the taste of the unthinking masses. The hereditary principle has to the limited mind an ostensible value in the promotion of material prosperity. It holds out the prospect of orderly progress. But it also provides an excellent preliminary training for the higher spiritual life. It does so in a negative way. It is not itself the spiritual life. It can, however, be successfully worked only if the leaders are prepared to eschew all motives of selfish worldly aggrandisement for themselves and their followers. Its leaders are not, therefore, the products of the system. It derives all its value from the higher life of its regulators, who must themselves be above the apparent worldliness that they impose upon their charge. The system escapes the defects of mechanical, lifeless contrivance by the exercise of constant and autocratic interference from above by the leaders who are endowed with the spiritual vision.

It is easy for most persons to be satisfied by an arrangement that is so so well calculated to secure the real well-being of society better than any other system. Even the most ambitious and turbulent have to submit to a curtailment of their freedom to be mischievous by pressure of convinced and alert general opinion. But if the general opinion itself declares against higher guidance and tries to set up for itself, then chaos is let loose, as it is never possible to maintain salutary order for long by those who do not possess the higher life.

The Indian mind early grasped the all important and categorical difference between material and spiritual living. This was due to the fact that speculative philosophy in India could be compelled from the earliest times to admit its inability to attain the knowledge of the Absolute by its own resources. Empiric knowledge in India wisely applied itself to the subordinate task of trying to ameliorate the material conditions of life within the scope allowed by the Scriptures without aspiring to dictate to religion. It had a due sense of its limitations and of the trivial nature of its achivements in comparison with the problems tackled by the spiritual Scriptures. It did not refuse to accept a subordinate position and to try to employ itself in the loyal service of the Truth.

The knowledge of the Scriptures acquired by mere study was declared to be empiric The sons of Brahmanas on the attainment of the age of eight years were admitted to the study of the Vedas. But they were made above all to lead a life of submission to their teachers. They were admitted to the submissive life of students of the Truth by being imparted the Gayatri mantram which tends to relieve from all aptitude for unguided mental speculation. This is the second birth.

These 'twice-born' students received the knowledge of the scriptures from their teachers with minds committed to be free from all empiric preposses sion and activities that might stand in the way of receiving the Absolute. As a matter of fact only a very small proportion of these pupils ever actually realised the process of perfect submission.

This is as it should be. No manner of aspiring effort from bellow can suffice for the attainment of the spiritual life. The attainment of the summum-bonum is not pre-ordained. Even the social institution of Varnasrama under the proper lead of pure devotees, ordained by Godhead Himself for the spiritual welfare of all concerned, can assure only worldly results. This assurance is in keeping with the limiting cosmic principle that joins and separates the jarring elements of the material universe. But no measure of stagnant material harmony can satisfy the needs of the soul. Material well-being is, indeed, a terrible misnomer and its fatal lure is most difficult to detect and to properly valuate. It is not possible to realise its utter uselessness for the soul till the mind is actually lifted to the higher plane. The Varnasrama system owes its value to the possibility of real disillusionment from worldly temptations following from absolute spiritual guidance. This successful result can also befall only the most fortunate individuals and can be by its nature only a very rare event. There is much greater chance of an aspiring soul being led astray from the protecting care of such guidance.

If the student continues to cherish the illusion that his purity of birth entitles him to the spiritual lead and to ultimate success, then this very attitude is sure to lead him away from the right track. It is specially difficult for born candidates to get rid of such prepossessions of the seminal claim. Purity of seminal birth can, at the most, only tend to produce a blinding material result. This is in keeping with the so called cosmic purpose. But for the same reason it is likely to add to the difficulties of the spiritual quest instead of lessening the same. The small number of those, who can really see through this need not be considered as the poduct of the system itself.

The second birth that is available by purity of seminal birth merely admits a person provisionally to the privilege of studying the Scriptures by the method of promised submission to the spiritual teacher. The explicit provision of recruitment of students from persons of any lineage by the teachers themselves was found to be imperative as the result of the experience of the actual working of the hereditary system. That system had tended to produce an unduly high estimate of the value of seminal birth and the consequent multiplication of unfit teachers. This led to the clear and definite enunciation of the spiritual principle underlying the whole system. The student was declared to possess only a probationary status to which he could qualify only by his disposition. If the safeguards for ensuring purity of seminal birth did not produce the requisite disposition in an individual the spiritual teacher is to disallow the claim of such individuals. The spiritual teacher is to adopt the test of disposition as the only test and should recruit individuals from all classes by this test alone.

The value of purity of lineage has not been denied by the above provision, neither has it been overestimated. But purity of lineage is not allowed to obscure the fact that the selection by the truly spiritual teacher is the one thing needful and that it alone confers the probationary eligibility for spiritual pupilage. This had always been so. Seminal birth alone was never the admitting test. The Upanayana of persons born of Brahmana parentage was a survival from the pre-varnasrama Age when there was socially only one Varna. The Varnasrama arrangement was intended to produce social well-being by embodying in an institution the necessity of submission to spiritual guidance in all matters. It did not by any means weaken the authority of the spiritual guide.

But society failed to remember this in the days of its delusive material prosperity. It learnt to pin its hope on such prosperity. It was confirmed in this disloyal dispositions by the teachings of the schismatic renegade Brahmanas. The inevitable result was seen in the deterioration of material civilization itself. The decline of society was maliciously attributed by the pseudo teachers to undue emphasis that had been formerly laid on the spiritual principle. Society once loosened from its stable moorings, was thus rapidly pushed on the path of increasing worldliness. The external frame of the Varnasrama system proved an excellent contrivance ready to hand for defeating its saving purpose. The pseudo-Brahmanas have had their unenviable triumph at last but at the cost of everything that really matters.

The Spiritual Community

SAMKIRTAN, the Divine Dispensation ordained for this speculative and critical Age as the only method of spiritual endeavour, means literally 'chanting in company by many.' The holy, transcendental Name, Form, Quality, Activity and Paraphernalia of the Divinity are to be chanted by congregation of the devotees. The holy Name is the first to be chanted. In order to realise the transcendental nature of the holy Name it will be necessary to receive the knowledge of Him from the pure devotee. The knowledge is not receiveable or imparable by argumentative communication. Logic cannot lead one to the transcendental plane. There is no logical reason why it should. The Transcendental Himself can alone admit one to His plane. The pure devotee is the agent of the Lord for admitting to the transcendental plane. He performs this function by the method of imparting the holy Name.

The devotee does not impart the Name to one who is not really willing to serve Him on the plane of the Absolute. The inclination is tested by means of the quality and degree of submissiveness to himself as the agent of the Absolute. The submission to the devotee is identical with submission to the holy Name. Submission to the holy Name is the necessary condition for receiving the knowledge of the Absolute The devotee imparts the holy Name to the person who really wants to function on the transcendental plane.

But all this is individual. A person may receive the Name from Sri Gurudeva and chant the Same in the company of devotees and thereby realise in due order the nature of the Form, Quality, Activity and Paraphernalia including his own specific service and thus be enabled to functionfully on the plane of the Absolute. This is declared to be impossible in this rationalistic Age.

There is a very good reason for such declaration. One who has heard the Name from the lips of Sri Gurudeva is no doubt entitled to chant the Same. But this chanting is not possible in an Age which is devoid of spontaneous faith in the statements of the Scriptures. The Iron Age is not permitted by the Creator to have any real instinctive faith in Godhead. Those who simulate such faith are either hypocrites or excessively credulous people in the worldly sense. Real faith is directed to the Reality and not to any fancy derived from the experience of this phenomenal world. Neither the idiot nor the scoundrel is specially entitled to the living and real faith in Godhead.

But it is sometimes supposed thoughtlessly that as faith in God is not attainable by logical discussion it can be only attainable by idiocy or want of conviction calling itself conviction by the method of hypocrisy. A little honest reflection should show that the transcendental has nothing to do with idiots and hypocrites any more than with the pedants and the virtuous of this world.

In a rationalistic Age one who tries to avoid to exercise his judgment will be punished by ignorance of a grosser type. When this ignorance is practised as service of God it is called superstition or hypocrisy. True faith must be distinguished from both of these. There are unfortunately large sections of the people in every country who belong to the classes of the superstitious and hypocrites by reason of their want of rationality and the foolish credulity and natural wickedness of these people are exploited by a corresponding class of knaves and fools who pose themselves as teachers of religion. In a rationalistic Age the most foolish people necessarily know more logic than is compatible with the instinctive faith of the right type. So it will not do for any person in this twentieth century to chant the holy Name on the strength of intuitive faith which he does not and cannot ordinarily possess. In other words if anyone begins to chant the holy Name on the strength of his possessing intuitive faith he should not only find that the process is another Name for idleness, and get quickly tired of it, or, if he is dishonest, he will try to exploit this really dle habit for securing honour and advantages for himself from the dunces, the hypocrites and the idlers. But no honest person in this rationalistic Age will long stick to the chant of the holy Name if this is to be the only form of activity that he is allowed as is the clear injunction of the Scriptures in regard to the chanter of the holy Name.

The chant of the holy name, therefore, is not possible for individuals in an Age that is naturally and necessarily devoid of intuitive faith in Godhead. It is not necessary to suppose that all Ages have been like the present one. The nature of the Age is not something made by man or anybody else except its Creator. If real faith is made spontaneously available to any Age by the will of the Creator, it need not be regarded as impossible by any one for the reason that he himself, belonging to a rationalistic Age, can form no idea of its possible existence in the circumstances with which he happens to be familiar. To ask him to believe in the possibility of a golden Age is not such a great demand on his credulity as he may be inclined to suppose if he takes into consideration the fact that faith itself is super-rational. The rationalist cherishes a secret pseudo-faith in the back of his mind that faith in God is identical with the worldly rational instinct.

But faith in God is not identical with the so-called rational instinct of this world. It is a gift from Above. We can have it only by grace. The rational instinct that is found in this world is a gross perversion of real faith. This is realisable by grace. The attitude that it is so realisable is implied in the rational instinct itself. The rational instinct, unless it deliberately stints itself, knows very well that it cannot really believe in anything because it does not know and cannot know the real nature of anything. I have purposely used the word 'believe' to express the position, because the condition of faith is not attainable by our present rational instinct.

Faith is not, therefore, identical with the rational instinct that prompts the various worldly activities. The rationalist cannot chant the holy Name because he is devoid of faith. Nor can the idiot and the hypocrite chant the Name, because of their ignorance and hypocrisy which also are all quite different from any function on the transcendental plain.

How may, therefore, the chanting of the holy Name be properly performed after He has been heard from the lips of a true devotee ? The Scriptures, says Sri Chaitanyadeva, have provided the right method, viz. congregational chanting as meeting the proper requirements of this rationalistic Age. The method of spiritual endeavour need not be supposed to be divisable by the human reason. It can be laid down and made available to us only by the grace of Godhead. It will no doubt satisfy all our instincts when we really attain to it. But the nature of such satisfaction is bound to remain necessarily and utterly unrealisable to us before we are actually enabled to attain the same by the grace of God-head.

The holy Name must be chanted without offence. The offence in this case means all conduct derived from the present rational or irrational instincts. The offence can be avoided only by discarding the society alike of so-called rational as well as so-called irrational persons and cultivating association with the really enlightened by the method of submitting to them to be taught the method of spiritual living that is at present utterly unknown to myself.

In order to be able to chant the Name without offence one must, therefore, live without offence. He must learn to live without offence by submitting to live under the complete direction of the devotees. This is very difficult, but not impossible for married persons. It should be easy and unobjectionable in the case of children and unmarried young persons. It should be most likely to succeed in the case of children. But as the success of the process is not really pre-ordained by reason of perfect freedom of will that is the eternal concomitant of the spiritual nature, allowed to all souls by the will of the Divinity, one is not entitled to speculate on the possibilities of redemption of particular souls. The whole process is left purposely open by God Himself. But no one in this world can be a loser by the effort to add to his or her spiritual experience. Everyone is likely to be mortally injured by keeping away from the society of pure souls.

But as there is no knowing as to whether a person will ever elect to accept the spiritual life, it becomes necessary to have an organisation that should enable all persons to have the benefit of the society of persons endeavouring to live the spiritual life under the direction of perfectly pure souls. This arrangement also exists in this world by the will of the Divinity and has existed as long as the necessity for it have been found to exist. The arrangement is laid down in the Scriptures. It bears the designation of 'the system of orders and stages' or 'the system of Varna and Asrama' in the Sanskrit language. The value of the spiritual organisation is thus explained in the Vishnu Purana—'Vishnu, the Supreme Transcendental Lord pervading the world, is worshipped by a person who practises the mode of living enjoined by the system of Varna and Asrama. There is no other way by which the people of this world may please Him'.

203 'Mother hear with an attentive mind the course of the individual soul,
The volume of sorrow that he suffers by not serving Krishna.

204 'Dying repeatedly he suffers again and again the misery of confinement in the womb,
His sin all the time manifesting itself in every limb.

205 'Bitter, sour, salt, everything tasted by the mother,
Affect his body and produce a complete stupor.

206 'The brood of seething worms sticking to all sides feed upon his tender fleshy limbs ;
Not having power to put them away he all the time burns with pain.

207 'Inside the hot ribs he cannot move about,
Yet his life is maintained for the ends of Providence

208 'Certain extreme sinners do not come out of the womb,
But, on the contrary, sojourning from womb to womb, suffer the pangs of repeated conception and dissolution.

209 Hear attentively, mother, the dispensation regarding the jeeva
In seven months the jeeva attains to self-consciousness in the womb.

210 'Thereupon he recollects his sins and repents ;
And prays to Krishna with constant sighs,—

211 "Save me, Krishna, beloved Lord, the Life of all the jeevas of the world !
To whom else except to Thee the jeeva
may tell his sorrow ?

212 "The Same Who binds, O Lord, may alone set free.
Why, O Lord, dost deceive one who is dead by his nature ?

213 "I wasted my life in the vain pleasure of wealth and sons.
I never worshipped these priceless twin Feet of Thine !

214 "I tended my sons by endless unnatural ways.
Where are they all gone by these deeds of mine ?

215 "Who is now to help me across this great sorrow ?
Thou art now the Friend to deliver me !

216 'Wherefore now I do know that Thy Feet are true.
Save me, Lord Krishna, I now throw myself on Thy protection !

217 "Discarding Thee, O Lord, Who art kind as the purpose tree,
I forgot thee by the intoxication of the path of untruth.

218 "This punishment is rightly the due of such conduct.
Thou hast punished, O Lord ! Now have mercy on me !

219 "Vouchafe this mercy that I may not forget Thee;
It does not matter where I may be born or die.

220 "Where there is no preaching of Thy glory,
Where there is no appearance of the Vaishnavas.'

221 "Where there is no high Festival of Thy worship,
I do not covet such place even if it be the celestial realm of Indra.

222 "Where there is no nectarine stream of the discourse of the Limitless,
And where no devotees of the Supreme Lord are nourished by the same,
Where there are no high festivals of sacrifices to the Lord of all sacrifice,
Should not be served even if it be the realm of the celestials.

223 "Even his misery of living in the womb,
O Lord, I prefer,
If my recollection of Thee remains at all time !

224 "Where there is no recollection of Thy lotus Feet,
Do me the favour, O Lord, of never casting me into such a place !

225 "This great sorrow, O Lord, through crores of births
Must have I suffered. It is all my doing,
O Lord !

226 "May all this sorrow and danger be mine,
O Lord, time and again,
If only I remember Thee, Essence of all the Vedas !

227 "May Thou, O Krishna, so ordain, by giving me the relationship of Thy service !
May Thou keep me at Thy Feet, making me be born of Thy hand maid !

228 "If Thou take me only once across this sorrow,
Then, O Lord, I will not again ask for anything else save Thee !'

229 'In this manner he burns constantly by his travails in the womb,
But he loves even this by reason of his recollection of Krishna.

230 'He suffers no misery in the womb by virtue of his prayer.
He comes out of the womb into this world in due time against his own choice.

231 'Hear attentively, mother, of the complete position of the Jeeva,
He loses his self consciousness only on touching the soil of this world.

232 'He now faints at times, sighs and cries.
He cannot express himself in language,
but drifts helplessly on the sea of misery.

233 'Jiva, the servant of Krishna, by His deluding power,
Suffers all this misery, if he does not serve Krishna.

234 'In due course by the agency of time he obtains the faculties of knowledge and intelligence.
He alone is, indeed, fortunate who thereupon worships Krishna.

235 'On the other hand if one does not serve
Krishna, associates with evil done,
One reaps death by sinking again into the depths of the sin of delusion.

236 'If on the path of this world the jeeva again takes his pleasure with evil-doers, Addicated to the activities of the belly and anus, he enters the realm of darkness as before.

237 'Death with ease, life without distressing wants,
How can these be obtained by one who does not worship the Feet of Govinda ?

238 'Death without agony, life free from misery,
Are only obtained by worshipping Krishna.
by the recollection of Krishna.

239 'Wherefore do thou worship Krishna by associating with His devotees ;
Think on Krishna with the mind, mother,
and with thy mouth say 'Hari'.

240 'No good comes of activity void of devotion to Krishna.
That work is without devotion which contemplates the injury of others.'

241 The Lord taught His mother after the manner of Kapila.
Sachi dissolved in joy as she listened to His words

242 Whether at meal, in bed or awake
The Lord discoursed nothing but Krishna.

243 The devotees on hearing this from the lips of friends
Discussed together and pondered over it
in their minds.

244 'Perhaps Krishna is manifest in His body
By association with His devotee or by the effect of His own previous activity ?'

245 All of them pondered over it in their minds in this manner.
They all experienced a gladdening mood
in their hearts.

246 The griefs of the devotees were cancelld, pashandis met their doom.
The Supreme Lord Biswambhar became manifest !

247 Lord Biswambhar impelled by Vaishnava mood
Constantly saw the world as full of Krishna.

248 In His Ears night and day He heard the Name Krishna,
With His Mouth unceasingly He said
'Krishna-chandra,'

249 The self-same Lord whilom forgetful of everything by the high taste of learning
Now liked naught with the sole exception of Krishna.

250 At earliest dawn the whole body of students
Gathered together for study.

251 The Lord of the three worlds then bestirred Himself to teach them.
Nothing except 'Krishna' came to His Lips.

252 'The graded sequence of the alphabets', said the students, 'is well established.'
The Lord replied, 'Narayana is established by every letter of the alphabet.

253 The students asked, 'How are the letters proved to be true ?'
The Lord said, 'By reason of Krishna's kind glance falling on them.'

254 The disciple urged, 'Pandit, be pleased to explain properly.'
The Lord said, 'At all time recollect
Krishna.

255 'I am telling you the service of Krishna
The entire body of the scriptures Explain the service of Krishna, at the beginning, in the middle and at the end.'

256 The pupils laughed on hearing the exposition of the Lord.
Some remarked, 'It is so possibly by the argument of insanity.'

257 The students said, Whence do you derive your present explanation ?'
The Lord replied, 'In exact accordance with the evidence of the Shastras.'

258 The Lord said, 'If you fail to understand this at present
I will gladly explain it to all of you in the afternoon.

259 I will also retire to some secluded place and look up the books undisturbed.
Let us all meet together in the afternoon.'

260 Hearing the words of the Lord all His students
Tying up their books disposed with a feeling of amusement.

261 All the students making their way to Gangadas Pandit
Related to him everything as the Lord had said.

262 'In all that Nimai Pandit now explains,
In the very words themselves, He explains
Krishna as their complete Meaning.

263 'Ever since He returned home from Gaya
There has appeared to Him no explanation of anything, except Krishna.

264 'He says Krishna at all time ; the hairs of His Body standing on end.
At times He laughs, speaks with a thundering voice and plays many a merry prank.

265 'In every word, taking its verbal root with the grammatical rule,
He applies Himself daily to explain
Krishna.

266 'We are unable to understand His ways.
Pandit, be pleased to direct what we are to do.

267 The Brahman Gangadas was the crest-jewel of Professors,
He burst into laughter on hearing these words of all the students.

268 The Ojha said, 'Go home all of you ; come again in the morning.
I will explain it to Him this afternoon.

269 That He may teach the texts well.
You may all come with Him in the afternoon.'

270 They set out for their lodgings with the greatest delight
And returned with Biswambhar in the afternoon.

271 The Lord took the feet-dust of His Guru on His head,
The teacher blessed, 'May you gain learning.'

272 The guru said, 'Dear Biswambhar, listen to my words,
To study is not a mean fortune for a Brahman.

273 'Your maternal grandfather is Nilambar Chakravarti.
Your father is Jagannath Misra Purandar.

274 'If by giving up study one becomes a devotee,
Were not your father and grandfather
bhaktas;

275 'There is no foot in either line of your parentage
You yourself is most fit in the exposition of the tika ;
276 'Remembering all this, practise your studies with good care,
One may be a Vaishnava-Brahman only by dint of study.
277 'How will an ignorant 'twice-born' know what is proper or not ?
Knowing this, say 'Krishna' and mind your studies.
278 'Teach well the shastras to your students
Swear by me that you will explain everything aright.'
279 The Lord said, 'By the mercy of your twin feet
No one in Nabadwip may withstand Me in controversy,
280 'Where is there in Nabadwip the person
Who can establish his view by refuting My exposition of the sutra ?
281 'I will teach publicly in the heart of the city,
I should like to see who has power to criticize.'
282 The Guru was delighted on hearing these words,
The Lord departed after greeting the feet of His teacher
283 Obeisance to the feet of Gangadas Pandit
Whose Disciple is Lord of the Vedas and Master of the goddess of learning.
284 What other object of attainment is there for Gangadas Pandit, Whose pupil is the worshipped of the fourteen worlds ?'

Ourselves

His Divine Grace—His Divine Grace paid a visi to Uttarparsha Math of Puri at the invitation of Srila Gobinda Ramanuj Das Mohanta Moharaj of the Uttarparsha Math on June 27.

Bhaktishastri and Sampradaya-baibhabacharya Examinations—Examinations for conferring the titles of Bhaktishastri and Sampradaya-baibhabacharya by the Vishwa Vaishnava Raj Sabha will be held at the Natyamandir of the New Buildings of the Gaudiya Math on the 7th and 8th of October 1930 respectively. The rules, regulations, Syllabus and text-books for the Bhakti-shastri and Sampradaya-baibhabacharya examinations are given below.

RULES FOR THE SAMPRADAYA-BAIBHABACHARYA EXAMINATION

Object—Extension of the scope of enquiry regarding the subject-matter of transcendental learning by removal of the veil of empiric erudition and grant of recognition to those teachers of the Shastras dealing with Spiritual service who are found really versed in the same.

Time and place—Natya-mandir of newly-built Sri Gaudiya Math, 16, Kaliprasad Chakravarty's Street, Baghbazar, Wednesday October 8, 1930.

Qualifications of candidates—All well-informed persons professing to be servants of Sri Chaitanya, irrespective of the consideration of birth, age, class or linguistic proficiency. Applications for permission to appear at the examination together with a certificate signed by at least three inner members of Sri Shree Vishwa-Vaishnaba-Raj-Sabha testifying to the sincerity of the candidates' profession of the service of Sri Chaitanya, must reach the Head of the Gaudiya Math within the 24th of September 1930.

Method of examination—Two question-papers will be set on selected works. The answer to the first of these will have to be given in writing in the Examination Hall within a limited period without taking any kind of extraneous help. Unless the use of any particular language is specifically mentioned the candidate is permitted to answer in any current language. The candidate is expected to be specially versed in the main group of the recommended text-book and to possess a general knowledge of the contents of the secondary group. The answer to the second Question-paper is to be submitted in writing before the 23rd of December, 1930. The candidate is permitted free consultation of any books for this purpose.

The result—Examiners will indicate the measure of the candidate's knowledge regarding the truth by reading through his answers and assigning appropriate marks The answer-book will not be returned to the candidate. Candidates will be divided into three groups in order of fitness. Those, who obtain 75 p.c. of the full marks, and above, will be put in the highest group, those who secure between 50 and 75 p.c. of the total marks will be placed in the intermediate division and those who get 25 to 50 p.c. of the full marks will be put in the general group. Those who fail to obtain 25 p.c. of the total marks will have to be considered as wanting in fitness.

Publication of result—The fitness of every successful candidate will be announced in the journals within three months after the examination under three divisions viz. the highest, intermediate and general, according to the position of the candidate. If any candidate is judged to be unfit, his name will not be given out. Names of fit candidates will be published in the weekly "Gaudiya", "Daily Nadia Prokash" and the Monthly Sajjana-Toshani or Harmonist.

Awards—Successful candidates will be awarded the diploma of Sampradaya-baibhabacharya. Acharyas who have been awarded the diploma will be entitled to medals, certificates of honor, Scholarships according to fitness.

Diploma of Sarbabhouma—Acharyas in nine subjects on obtaining the diploma of acharya in the tenth subject after being duly examined will be awarded the see and diploma of Sarbabhouma in recognition of his eligibility both as regards conduct and teaching in all the Shastras.

For further particulars an intending candidate is requested to communicate with the undersigned.

BRANCH MATHS

Sri Brahma-Gaudiya Math, Alalnath (Orissa)

The work of construction of the block of servitors and sloves of the Math is nearing completion. The building of the Temple of the Math will be begun shortly. The Sri Bigrahas of Sri Swarup, Sri Ramananda and Sri Gaursundar will be installed in the new shrine in accordance with the desire of His Divine Grace.

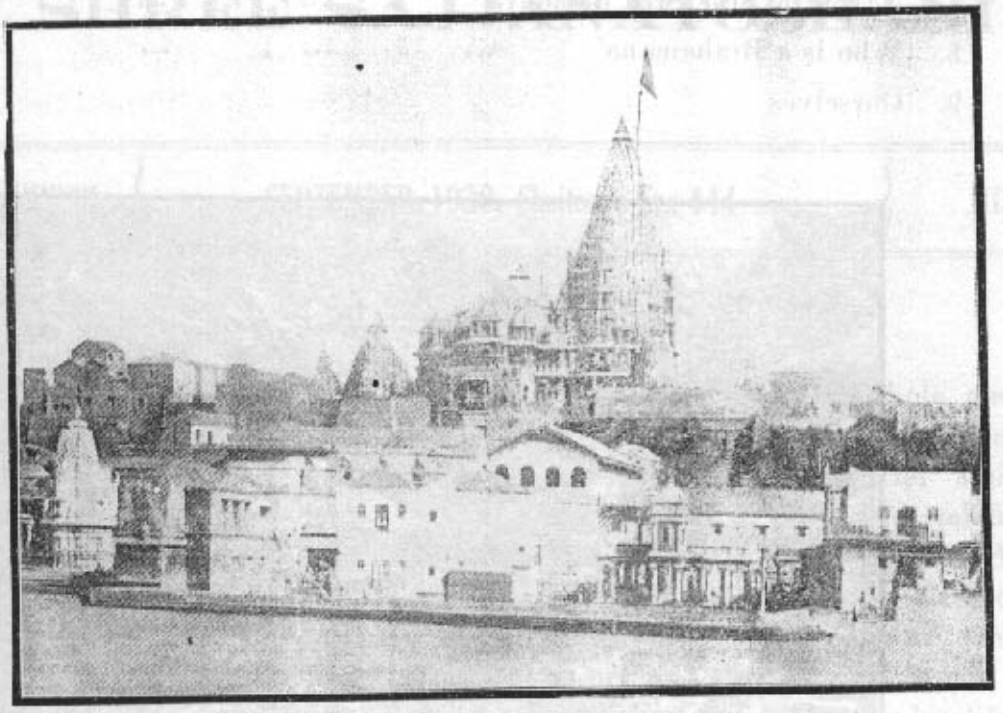
Handsome donations towards the restoration of the Alalnath Temple have been received from Mahanta Maharajas of Dakshinparshwa Math and Sri Raghabdas Math and also from Srijut Jogesh Chandra Ghose of Jalpaiguri. The active interest that is being taken by the Mahanta Maharajas of the Maths of Sri Kshetra will undoubtedly be backed up by suitable response from the Chiefs, Rajas and Maharajas of the country.

Sri Sachchidananda Math, Cuttack (Orissa)

The annual celebrations of Sri Sachchidananda Math, Cuttack took place from the 2nd to the 6th of July. The occasion was signalised by the auspicious visit of His Divine Grace and His most illustrious associates and followers to the town of Cuttack. His Divine Grace addressed gatherings of the public at the Sachchidananda Math (July 2) and the local Town Hall (July 3). Sripad Bhaktisaranga Goswami Bhaktisastri prabhu discoursed on the teachings and lila of Sri Goursundar with the help of magic-lantern slides at the Durga-mandap of Buxibazar on July 4 before a gathering of over two thousand persons. Magic lantern leetures were delivered in the Sachchidananda Math on the two following evenings by His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Pradeep Teertha Maharaj to large gatherings of the people. On the 6th all assembled people honoured the mahaprasad at the Math.

PROPAGANDA

In the Madras Presidency



Their Holinesses Tridandi Swamis Srimad Bhakti Hriday Ban Maharaj and Bhaktiranjan Bhakti Sar Maharaj, Sripad Ramananda Das Brajabasi B.A., Vidyarnab, Sripad Hayagriva Brahmachari and party are continuing their propaganda in the Presidency of Madras. From Berhampore (Ganjam) their Holinesses visited successively Dharkot, Mandasa and Parilukimedi where they had most cordial receptions from the Chiefs who expressed their desire that the movement might be carried on in a really effective and pure form in their states. The party then made their way to Simhachalam near Waltair. Arrangements were made for the erection of a Shrine of the foot-prints of Sri Chaitanyadeva within the Temple of Jior (Varaha) Nrishingha Deva to commemorate the visit of Sri Chaitanya to the Shrine. Necessary permission was most gladly given by the Maharaja of Vizianagram, trustee of the Temple. The Swamijis proceeded next to Cocanada. In this cultured town His Holiness Srimad Ban Maharaj delivered a series of learned lectures at the Theosopical Hall (June 30) Town Hall, (July, 2) Brahma Mandir (July 3) Veda Vidyalaya (July 5) and the Swamijis held learned discourses with various leading persons of different denominations interested in the movement of pure religion including Mr. J. B. Brown (Dt. Collector) Mr. C. D. T. Shores, Dewan Bahadur D. Seshagiri Rao Pantulu Garu, Principal Rao Shaheb Dr. V. Rama Krishna Rao M.A., L.T., F M U. Ph. D., Dewan Bahadur K. Surya Narayan Moorti Naidu and Sir Dr. R. Venkata Ratnam Naidu Garu Kt. M A, L.T., D. Litt Ex-Vice Chanceller. Meir U. The Holinesses and party then proceeded to Rajmundry (8 July) and there addressed large public gatherings at the Hindu Samaj Hall (9 July) a d Town Hall (11 July) presided over by Dewan Bahadur N. Subba Rao and Rai Shaheb C. V. Krishna Swami District and Session Judge, respectively. The party then crossed over to Kovvur on the opposite bank of the Godavari. Here Sri Chaitanya Deva had had His memorable meeting with Rai Ramananda, Governor of Maharaja Prataprudra Deva. The Swamiji spoke about the teachings of Sri Chaitanya to a scholarly gathering at the local Sanskrit College. The sympathy of the local public led their Holinesses to propose to His Divine Grace, the establishment of permanent preaching-centre at Kovvur under the designation of Ramananda Gaudiya Math.

A Temple of the Foot-prints of Sri Chaitanyadev was built at Kavvur M. R. Ray Ramchandra Rao Garu of Rajmundry made a gift of arsi table site for the Temple.

THE ceremonies of Samskara by the Gayatri and Diksha are described as the second and third births of a person. They are turning points registering stages of progress in the gradual conversion of an individual to the fully spiritual condition.

The seminal birth plunges the soul into this mundane world and its relationships. The word 'society' ordinarily means the aggregate of the natural relationships of an individual by reason of his physical body and mind which are the gifts of seminal birth. The society naturally includes the parents and their kindred by birth. It further includes the whole circle of persons and objects whose services are availed by the individual for satisfying the wants of his body and mind. To an ambitious disposition the world regarded from the point of view of the wants of the body and mind tends to appear as the mother from whose breast the individual sucks his life and nourishment and on whose supporting lap he finds his long rest. Nourished by the world children grow up into parents and are enabled by the universal Mother in their turn to propagate the species. The circle of relationships that arise in this way from the moment of seminal birth and by the sole reason of such birth forms the sphere of all social relationships in its most comprehensive sense.

But in practice an individual is seldom liberal enough to regard the whole world as forming the sphere of his social relationships. He ordinarily attaches himself exclusively to a particular locality and a more or less narrow organised group for the cultivation of intimate social relationships. But all such 'interests' and 'relationships' are none the less the result of the seminal birth.

These 'interests' and 'relationships' are the cause of all our misery. To the superficial observer they may not appear to be so or may even appear to be a source of unalloyed happiness. The seminal birth exposes us to the sorrows and so-called joys of this mundane life without our having to seek for either. They follow the seminal birth as a matter of course. Those who suppose this arrangement to be full of happiness overlook the hard fact that there can be even from their point of view no unmixed happiness in this world. By looking deeper into the cause of the mixed nature of their happiness they should be enabled to arrive at the conclusion that the constitution of the physical body and mind poisons the cup of their pleasures instead of being the cause of the pleasure itself. The pleasure of the body and mind itself is only a kind of pain. If we had a real choice in the matter we should not agree to be satisfied with this kind of happiness.

Our Shastras, therefore, call a person Sudra, that is subject to sorrow, by seminal birth. This is declared to be the natural and inevitable status of all persons born from the mother's womb; and by reason of such birth. The admission of this gives rise to the issue of the necessity of a second birth by a process of purification in order to get rid of the sorrowful state caused by the first birth. It is not till the seminal birth itself is eliminated that there is any prospect of the real cure of sorrow of which it is the cause.

The Samskara by the Gayatri is intended to endow the individual with a new body and mind, which are free from the taints that pollute the body and mind generated by seminal birth. Those who receive this second birth by Gayatri are relieved of their miseries, or in other words cease to be Sudras. The twice-born has, therefore, nothing to do with the seminal birth. The second birth is not also derivable from the first birth just as the first is not derived from the second. The two are completely independent of one another. It is, however, possible for a twice-born to lapse into the condition of a Sudra by the neglect of the duties of a twice-born. The status of the twice-born is, therefore, a temporary, conditional or probationary one. The Samskara by the Gayatri is also known as the process of Upanayana which literally means being taken to the proximity (of the Guru). Whenever the Guru accepts a person as a pupil for the study of the Veda his acceptance frees such a person from the sinful propensity arising from seminal birth. That propensity is nothing but an exclusive longing for the objects of this world for mental and physical gratification of oneself. As soon as a person is accepted as his disciple by the devotee he is thereby endowed with a new outlook in a new environment and is required to learn the conditions of the new life in order to be able to live the spiritual life on his own account.

The twice-born is, therefore, in the condition of tutelage, an unsure state. The study of the Vedas need not be understood as implying the study of any particular book or number of books in the ordinary manner. Neither need the Veda be supposed to be identical with any book in the literary sense. But the novice cannot have any real sense of the difference between the two. It is the function of the Guru to impart to him this sense during the period of the novitiate by making him lead the spiritual life in the measure that is possible for him at any moment. This makes it necessary for the pupil to be willing to obey the Guru unconditionally. The pupil has no standing ground of his own in the realm of the Absolute and can, therefore, never understand either the method or object of the Guru except to the extent that the Guru considers him fit to understand. This makes all the difference between the twice-born pupil taught by the devotee and Sudra students studying for a worldly purpose under a Sudra teacher.

The twice-born pupil has no 'social' or 'worldly' ambitions. It is, therefore, a very strange misreading of the purpose of the Shastras to contend that the 'ceremony' of 'upanayana' is the exclusive 'hereditary' (by seminal birth ?) right of an exclusive 'social' group for a 'social' or 'worldly' purpose. There is realy nothing 'social' or 'hereditary' about the Samskara by the Gayatry. The onus of proving that the Samskara has any social or caste implication lies on those who are disposed to put forward such an unphilosophical and anti-scriptural claim. The claim is the outcome of the unauthorised study of the Shastras by sectarians for a sectarian purpose and from ignorant teachers. It is for this reason that the choice of a non-sectarian Guru is the very first thing necessary if a person really wants to be admitted to the 'study' of the Vedas. The devotee of God is the only fit teacher of the Veda. The 'twice-born' who wants to lord it over the Sudras degrades himself to the condition of the latter by such unspiritual claim. He is sure to commit this blunder if he sits up as a teacher of the Vedas by his own authority. There is a second process by which the 'twice-born' is recognised as having passed the stage of probation successfully. This is known as the Diksha or enlightening and freeing process.

The novitiate which is identical with the status of the twice-born is thus only a preparation for Diksha or the attainment of enlightenment and free initiative. The novitiate aims at perfecting the pupils' submission to the devotee or Sri Gurudeva. Without real complete submission to the holy feet of Sri Gurudeva the eligibility for receiveing enlightenment and free service at his hands does not arise. The twice-born who is regarded by the Guru as prepared to accept spiritual enlightenment at his hands with the object of serving Godhead with a singleness of purpose is elected by the teacher for receiving such enlightenment. This process is known as Diksha and the twice-born who receives it undergoes a fresh new birth by reason of this process and becomes a 'thrice-born'.

The spiritual teacher confers spiritual enlightenment on such of his pupils as are found willing to serve God for the sake of serving Him under the absolute direction of the Guru. The willing pupil should be able to find out that there is no difference between the service of the Guru and that of Godhead. The two are really identical as the Guru does or commands nothing that is not cent per cent service of Godhead. The vision of this also is conferred by the teacher himself on such of his pupils whom it is the will of God to favour.

But spiritual enlightenment is not at all like anything that it is possible for a Sudra or a twice-born to imagine. It is to be understood by and in the process itself. God reveals himself to the fortunate soul in an ever-progressive revelation that is actually free from all trace of imperfection and ignorance. This makes the process categorically different from the evolution of empiric knowledge. The latter is not its own complete fulfilment at any stage. It may tentatively appear to be so to the learner but is not really from all defect at all stages. This is appreciable remotely by the logical faculty but not realisable in practice either in the Sudra or in the Dwija condition. This is also the raison d'etre of the unconditional nature of the service of the Guru.

There is nothing like finality, stagnation or imperfection in spiritual enlightenment. It does not stand in the way of anything nor is capable of being obstructed by anything. It is the perennial inundating rush of the fullest limitless tide of eternal bliss. The person who experiences it is forthwith divested of all worldly vanities. Such a person finds the whole world really his kin but in a wholly new sense.

It is no doubt both easy and, from the worldly point of view, also seemingly profitable, to speak the language of an imaginary fellowship with all creatures. This may be poetry but need not be, therefore, true or, indeed, any other thing than a piece of sheer hypocritical self-laudation, that 'last infirmity' from which worldly poets are by no means specially free. Such effusions of hyperbolical good will 'bake no bread' and help nobody. They are by no means a rarity in this world. Even the best of physical philanthropy is powerless to regard the objects of its so called charity without a feeling of compassion wholly unmixed with contempt. And all Physico-mental philanthropists must realise the utter impossibility of helping those who do not help themselves and also the pernicious superfluity of offering any 'charitable' help to those who possess the will to help themselves. As a matter of fact the physico-mental philanthropist himself is the real bankrupt. His charity is not really the valuable commodity that he is pleased to imagine it to be

There is really speaking no charity except the gift of the knowledge of the self. If you can help a person to find himself you set him free from all wants. If you keep him ignorant of himself you withhold the only gift that is needful. A bankrupt may be led by an ignorant vanity to proclaim his readiness of removing the wants of all needy persons But such a procedure will only prove that a bankrupt need not necessarily be above the most shameless and malicious hypocrisy. No eloquence, no casuistry or emotional display should be allowed to hide the utter worthlessness and extremely harmful character of such professions that have ever stood in the way of the real quest of the Truth by misdirecting the unwary on to the wrong track by a profusion of flowery language.

But there is a more mischievous group of pseudo-philanthropists than even the Poets, Philosophers, Scientists and so-called charitable persons of this world. The pseudo-religionists are the worst of all mischief mongers in as much as they employ the symbols of religion to misguide those who imagine themselves to be above the seductions of irreligion. Those who try to avoid the road recommended by the professed wordly-wise are liable to fall into the pits dug for them on the wayside by the wily knaves who are ever ready to exploit the distress of those who seek the aid of religion for the purpose of obtaining for themselves the same kind of relief that is promised by others. It is only the sincereseeker of the Truth who is not likely to come to the ground between these two stools But how many of us really care at all for the Truth ? Where, indeed, is the person who does not really desire the things of this world ? Although no one knows why, he nevertheless seeks for them for the purpose of gratifying his petty vanities.

Malice masquarades in this world in an infinite variety of forms to work mischief among those who seek the gratification of their vanities. Unless we are really prepared to give up malice we cannot expect to do good either to ourselves or to others. Malice to others is malice to oneself. Compassion for oneself is compassion for others.

Those who are hoping to improve the condition of so-called 'Hindus' by a process of wholesale 're-conversion' should do well to take these facts into account. They hope no doubt to gain a worldly purpose by the process, but should it really appeal to anyone to use the spiritual weapon for a worldly purpose ? Will it not be productive of the greatest possible mischief by the spread of a false theory of spiritual conversion ? Should a person be 're-converted' to 'Hinduism' in order to swell the 'number' of Hindus ? Conversion can only mean reversion to the non-sectarian condition of absolute unworldiness. The word 'Hindu' is a misnomer as a designation of pure souls to whom all the world must be equally sacred as being a means of serving Sri Sri Radha-Govinda on the perfect plane of the soul in his natural state of absolute freedom from all worldly hankerings.

Let us open our hearts fully to the Truth and be prepared to admit that there can be only one commuuity of really pure souls. Let our sole ambition be to find out our own proper selves and by the light of the self-luminous soul find our proper relationships with the whole world. If we are inclined to contract any relationship with any thing of this world under the urge of selfish, sensuous hankering we will, thereby, be deprived of our vision of the Truth by reason of our adoption of the policy of deliberate malice towards ourselves and others. The Biblical canon viz., 'Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you' has been said only of the pure soul. But if the maxim be applied to the soul who is under the spell of the deluding energy such application can only result in the dissemination of conduct inspired by malice. One should never think of converting another to any position that is less than universal. But no position will be universal unless it is really so. Deluded persons may advertise the necessity of conversion to a sect or creed but the seeker of real enlightenment should carefully avoid being caught by phrases coined by hoary iniquity for entrapping only such souls as are spontaneously inclined to wicked counsel.

Hindus may be disposed to quarrel with Mohamedans but the Vaishnavas have no quarrel with anybody. They are opposed to all quarrel and propose to eliminate every form of discord to which an individual is liable, by his conversion to spiritual life. The pure soul cannot do any harm to anybody. The pure soul bears no malice against anybody. The pure soul possesses such perfect judgment that he is enabled in every act of his to serve nothing but the Absolute Truth. The pure soul finds an infinite number of purer souls eternally engaged in the service of Truth and naturally disposed to serve their fellows by helping them to serve the Truth in every possible manner. This is the ideal of the Vaishnava. The Vaishnava is the exclusive servant of the All-pervasive Truth. To him there are no groups or compartments, no favoured beings or sects, no narrowness of any kind, simply because he is content to receive his enlightenment from the source that sees everything with an equal eye. But he is anxious that the language of the Vaishnavas should not be merely accorded a hypocritical assent but should be carried out in actual practice by the loyal acceptence of all its implication. This insistence for absolute sincerity in the service of Truth appears to the pseudo-liberals as dogmatic and illiberal. But no one should be prepared to be liberal at the expense of Truth. Such liberalism is one of usual forms in which inveterate aversion for the Truth masquarades among us for promoting discord and malice. Let us beware of the wolf in sheep's skin. Neither Jesus, nor Muhammad, nor Sankara, nor Buddha are to blame. The Truth is neither good nor bad. It is our own deluded 'thinking' that makes 'Him' seem to be either. Unless we are prepared to give up our admittedly perverse way of thinking that idolises the things of this world under the delusion that it is the duty of man to gratify his impure worldly hankerings by their means we should not advertise our intention of converting others to the spiritual life which is utterly unknown to ourselves. Let us be wise and try to know ourselves and then, and only then, we cannot be false i. e. malicious, to any one.

The mere external ceremonials of Upanayana and Diksha cannot confer the inclination for spiritual life. They are of help as real 'symbols' having been devised by truly enlightened souls for our benefit from their own spiritual experience. These 'symbols' should be cherished by all but their nature and use should not be wilfully misunderstood, or misrepresented. They should not be abused for maliciously exploiting the credulity of thoughtless persons for leading them into any theory of malice towards themselves and their fellows.

AGENDA OF ALL-THEISTIC CONFERENCE

The All-Theistic Conference for the consideration of matters connected with the highest universal good will be in session at the Gaudiya Math from Friday Oct. 24 to Nov. 1, 1930. The Assembly will sit everyday in the evening from 7 to 9 P. M. The agenda of the topics is given below. The views of all sincere souls on them are earnestly solicited as they will be of great help for the purpose the conference have in view. With this object a list of questions bearing on various relevent topics is attached herewith for eliciting needful information. The undersigned will thankfully receive all communications from any person embodying the views of himself or of the particular religious community to which he belongs on the subjects to be considered by the conference, in the form of connected written statements which should reach them before the 17th Oct. 1930. The presence and participation of all persons at the Conference are also most cordially invited.

Sri Atul Chandra Bandyopadhyaya Bhaktisaranga Goswami, Bhaktishastri, Sri Nishi Kanta Sanyal (M.A., Bhaktisudhakar, Bhaktishastri).

Sri Kunja Behari Vidyabhusan Acharyyatrika, Bhagabatratna, Bhaktishastri.

THE SUBJECTS OF THESES ON EACH SUCCESSIVE DAY.

Oct. 24 Regarding Reference To consider the following by the analysis of the principles of cognition and non-cognition, viz.—the source, instruments, conclusion, corroboration and retention of knowledge (Epistemology).

Oct. 25 Regarding Reference—Enquiry regarding Self, Reality and Environment ; differentia of non-self ; regarding potency or non-potency of the absolute ; specification of the subjective nature.

Oct. 26 Regarding Reference—The categories of object of worship and worshipper ; the knowledge of real and nonreal entities.

Oct. 27 Regarding Process—Different methods of quest generated by the sensuous impulse and the determination of their respective positions (general consideration of the following, viz.—conduct not regulated by any principle, fruitive action, knowledge, communion with the Oversoul, austerity and devotion.)

Oct. 28 Regarding Process—Different forms of intimate spiritual service.

Oct. 29 Regarding Process—The subjective nature of devotion.

Oct. 30 Regarding Object—The principle of spiritual need or determination of the highest object of endeavour.

Oct. 31 The solution of the issues of Reference, Process and Need by the analytical method.

Nov. 1 The solution of the issues of Reference, Process and Need by the synthetic method.

QUESTIONNAIRE.

REGARDING REFERENCE.

1 What is the subjective nature of the Knowledge of the Reality ?
2 What is the subjective nature of the Object of Knoweldge ?
3 What is the measure of the duration of the maintenance of the existence of the object of knowledge ?
4 Who is knower ? What are the analytical components of the knower ?
5 What is the nature of the relationship of the individual soul with perfect knowledge ?
6 Is full knowledge possible in the case of individual soul ? If not who is the possessor of full knowledge ?
7 Is it possible for the possessor of full knowledge to be subject to ignorance ?
8 What are the respective spans of life of the gross inhering entities of knowledge, object of knowledge knower, and their corresponding subtle form ?
9 What are the quantity and degree of the difference between pure knowledge unadulterated with ignorance and consciousness subject to ignorance ?
10 What are the proper conceptions of God as Controller of the Universe, the individual soul, phenomenal Nature, Time and action ?
11 What is the duration of the relationship of the observer of the phenomenal world with the object of observation ?
12 What condition ensues, whether the state of absence or presence of knowledge, on the destruction of the triple texture ; the cessation of observer, observed and observation : the unification of the nose, smell and odorifrous object, the elimination of the distinction between the tongue, taste and mellowness ?
13 Is there any difference between the principles of matter and spirit ? Or are they identical ?
14 Is there any distinction between the individual soul and Brahman (the Great) ?

15 Do both states viz. those of bondage and freedom exist in the case of the individual soul ?

16 What is the mutual distinction between the Brahman (the Great), Paramatma (the Oversoul) and Bhagawan (Possessor of all excellence) ?

17 Is there any constitutional difference between the Supreme Lord and His dependents and Super-dependents ?

18 What different kinds of miseries are suffered by the individual soul ? Who undergoes the suffering ? Is there any possibility of redemption from suffering ?

19 What is the location of the redeemed soul ?

20 In what states there exists harmonious and discordant relationship respectively between the real and perverted natures ?

21 Does the phenomenal world really exist ?

22 Is there any distinction between the phenomenal world and the realm of the absolute ? If there be any, what is the nature of such distinction ?

23 What is your conception regarding the triple mundane quality and the absence of all mundane quality ?

24 What is the nature of the world located beyond the triple quality ?

25 Is the abode of the Brahman (Brahmapur) spoken of by the Upanishads eternal or transitory ? Is it formless or distinguishable ?

26 What is your conception regarding the limiting energy ? Is it eternal or temporary ?—independent or dependent ?—an entity or non-entity ?—shadow or substance ?—If it be shadow, whose shadow is it ?

27 What is the final evidence of the Reality ?

28 What is the real significance of the Vedanta ? Which of the mutually conflicting commentaries of the Vedanta appear to you to be safe to accept as consistent with the principles that are sought to be established ?

29 Are the Vedas, the Srutis, the Puranas, the Pancha-ratras different or identical in their significance ? Is Purana different from the Veda ?

30 How are the conflicting views of the Tamasa, Rajasa Nirguna Sattwika, Puranas to be reconciled ?

31 If there is conflict between Srutis and Smritis the view of Sruti has to be accepted ; if there is conflict in the determination of the significance of the Srutis the true meaning is to be sought in the Vedanta ; If again there arise differences of opinion in regard to the meaning of the Vedanta which view is to be accepted as infallible ?

32 What is your opinion regarding appearance of the Divinity on the lower plane of physical phenomena (Avatara) ? Is such appearance phenomenal and temporary ? What is the difference between such appearance and its source ? What is the nature of the source of Divine appearance ?

33 What is the significance of the expression 'constituted of the principles of existence, cognition and bliss' ? Is the entity so constituted featureless or distinguishable ?

34 Is Godhead one or many ? If He be one, can devatas be styled as 'Supreme Lord of all Lords ?

35 Do the infinite Name of Godhead and the various names of the devatas express one and the same meaning ? Is there any such distinguishing consideration in regard to the Name of Godhead as 'Primary' and 'Secondary' ? Will the supreme object of the service of Godhead be realised by regarding the name of any devata as one of the Names of Godhead ?

36 Is Godhead possessed of universal supremacy ? Is the possessor of universal supremacy All-powerful ? Can there be the absence of any power in the All-powerful ? Can there be any power opposing in the All-powerful ?

37 Is there any difference of body and possessor of body, function and possessor of function, in the Absolute ?

38 What is meant by Vedic mantra 'He is verily Rasa' ? What is the specific nature of the entity Rasa ? How can the person designated by the Sruti mantra 'He is verily Rasa' be non-specifiable ?

39 Can the highest truth be settled by reasoning alone ? What difficulty is experienced if the method of reasoning alone is adopted without admitting the evidence of transcendental sound ?

40 Is Godhead an Autocrat above all regulative principles and possessed of a perfectly independent will ? Or, is He an improvised instrument of a particular brand for the realisation of temporily stopping the mental function or the attainment of any object of desire ? If He is proved to be fully self-willed is any evil to be ascribed to Him or is there any chance in Him of disorder ?

41 Are the Name, Form, Quality, specific Personality of His servitors and Pastimes of Godhead eternal or temporary ? Are they different from one another or identical ?

42 Are the Name, Form, Quality, Pastimes of Godhead concocted by Jeeva, or are they spontaneous in Godhead ? What is the difference between Leela (Divine Pastimes) and Karma (fruitive actions) ? Is the birth of conditioned souls similar to the Advent of Godhead ?

43 What is the subjective nature of the object of worship ? What also is the subjective nature of the worshipper ? Are both of them eternal ?

44 Does the eternal nature of the worshipper suffer any abrogation by admission of difference between conditioned and liberated states ?

45 Can the seeker of the non-differentiated Brahman be regarded as eligible for the position of Teacher (Guru) in conformity with the dogma of illusion ?

46 What defects arise by admission of difference between Jeeva and the Brahman ?

47 How is it ascertainable that there is escape from the clutches of illusion by knowledge of the identity of Jeeva with the Brahman ?

48 Is there any difference between material space and the corresponding spiritual manifestation ? If there be any, what is the nature of the difference ?

49 Has the process of determining the Reality been evolved from the hypotheses of Anthropomorphism and Apotheosis as its source ? If not, what is then the source ?

50 Is it condemnable to attribute motherhood, daughterhood, wifehood and sisterhood to the Divinity ?

51 Are the status of a male Lover, a Son, a Friend, a Master and absence of relativity respectively possible or impossible in the Divinity ? If they are possible, how can it be so ?

52 In determining the Absolute, which of the following categories appears to you to be the nature of the real entity viz. Subject to doubt, unknowable, void, possessed of quality, devoid of attribute, Neuter, Male, Twin, Married couple and bonafide loving Consort ?

53 Are the Pastimes of Krishna a concoction of the mind ? Or, are they a product of the natural blind faith of ignorant people ?

54 Is 'Form' attributable to the non-differentiated Brahman by mental concotion ? Does Godhead come down into this phenomenal world by being adulterated with the limiting principle ? Can His Divinity be maintained in doing so ? Are the Pastimes of the Divinity allegories ?

QUESTIONNAIRE

REGARDING THE PROCESS.

1 How is knowledge obtained ?
2 What are the respective subjective natures of fruitive action, knowledge, communion with the Oversoul (yoga), austerity (Tapashya) and devotion or service ?
3 What is meant by inaction i. e. state where there is no aim at any fruition ?
4 Is there any appreciable difference between loving devotion and study of the Vedas, communion with the Personal Godhead, austerity and renunciation ?
5 Is there eternal difference between enjoyment (bhukti), liberation (mukti), and loving devotion
6 (bhakti) ? Where lies the origin or source of the propensities of lust, anger, etc ? What is the difference between them and loving devotion ? How can liberation be attained ?
7 Is the term "devotion" applicable to any other entity than the ultimate principle of complete Rasa specified by the Sruti in the mantra 'He is verily Rasa' ? Does the process of devotion manifest its nature as it is if the term is applied to the other devatas or to the material limiting Energy etc. ?
8 Is there any difference between the service of the unlimited entity and limited entity ? And is the result of the service of these different entities different or the same ?
9 Describe the different planes where the knowledge of the undifferentiated Brahman, communion with the Oversoul and devotional service of Godhead as Possessor of all supremacy, retain their respective distinction and their adaptability.
10 In what manner and to what extent can the method of argument based on sense-perception of mental speculationists be of use on the supersensuous plane ?
11 Can the eternally conditioned souls become ever free from their nature and liberate themselves for ever ?
12 How can the quest of the ultimate desideratum be possible in this life ?
13 Is apathy to this world necessary ? Can there be the gain of any eternal good by the abuse of either renunciation of the world or worldly attachment ?
14 Which of the following is admissible and on what grounds, viz. the theory of (1) one universal guru (spiritual guide), (2) saints as universal gurus, (3) so-called family-gurus or customary gurus or gurus who desire any other object than the service of Godhead e. g. fruitive-worker guru, empirically wise guru, guru who is joined to the Oversoul, guru who practises mental control, guru who practises magic, guru who is a mortal ?
15 Is the theory of aversion to or denial of spiritual guide (guru) either avoidable or acceptable ? On what grounds is it avoidable or acceptable, respectively ?
16 Is the theory of saints as spiritual guides liable to be swallowed up into that of a hereditary class ?
17 What arguments can be adduced respectively in favour of or in opposition to the theories of arriving at the Truth by the process of working up from the known to the unknown or by the descent of the targeted Absolute to the plane of the knowable ?
18 In what portions and how does the system of exclusive monism differ from those of pure non dualism (Suddhadwaitabad), distinctive monism (Vishistadwaitavad), dualism cum non-dualism (Dvaitadvaita-vad) and pure dualism (Suddha Dvaitavad) ? By what principle can their mutual conflict be satisfactorily reconciled ?

19 Is the principle of inconceivable simultaneous distinction and non-distinction only one of rival and opposing theories like the above ? Is the term 'inconceivable simultaneous distinction and non-distinction' as applied to this system, deluding ?

20 Why and how do differences of opinion arise ?

21 What is the significance of the term 'harmony' ? Is it another name of assenting to all contending opinions of all persons ? Is the Truth many or one ?

22 What harm is there in admitting the theory of metempsychosis ? What good and harm in regard to the subject-matter of the summum-bonum accrue from ideas based on sensuous enjoyment and sensuous abnegation ?

23 If a concocted image is worshipped how does or can such worship reach the object of worship ?

24 What is your opinion or conclusion regarding Divine Descent in the form of symbolical image (archa) ?

25 Why does misery of the Jeeva arise ? By what method may liberation from misery or appearance of the state of happiness be rendered possible ?

26 What should be the process of spiritual quest ?

27 In what manner is the social life of the religious to be led so as to be conducive to the highest good ?

28 Is the eternal good of society, world or individual secured by every kind of religious opinion current in the world ? And, further, whether the measure of the good attained by every such opinion is the same ? Which of the different bodies of religious opinion have been made by man and which of them has been made by Godhead ?

29 What is the meaning of sect and sectarianism ? Are good and bad sectarianism identical ? Is liberalism the habit of doing whatever one likes to do ?

30 What is your corroborative opinion regarding throwing oneself on the protection of the Holy Name ? What is your judgment regarding admission or denial of the proposition that the necessity of all other forms of spiritual endeavour has been completely repudiated by the word 'Kevalam' in the text 'Harer-namaiba Kebalam' ?

31 What is the subjective nature of egotism and humility respectively ?

32 What is your judgment regarding 'following' and 'imitating' the conduct of a sadhu ? What is the respective gain by either process ?

33 Is fame acceptable ? What fame is the most acceptable of all ? What are the advantages and disadvantages connected with fame ?

34 In what manner is either of sport (vilas) and renunciation (virag), acceptable ?

35 In what manner should the solution of the problem of human life be effected ?

36 Is the superiority of religion measured by the majority of votes of the people ?

37 Is there any necessity of association with the devotees (Sadhus) ? The elevationists, empiric sages, those who profess to be joined to the Over-soul (Yogis), performers of vows, those who practise control of the mind, who desire anything else than the service of Godhead,—are all of these sadhus ? Whether the highest result of association with sadhus may be gained by associating with these persons ?

38 By which of the two viz. one's own effort or mercy of Godhead may our desideratum be gained ?

39 What is your opinion regarding function in accordance with one's varna (quality) and asrama (stage) and that of a paramahansa (one who has realised the vision of the unity of Divine Dispensation) ?

40 Who is called 'paramahansa' ? Is the state of 'paramahansa' attainable on the path of non-devotion ?

41 Which of the two, viz. function in accordance with varna and asrama and that of paramahansa, more eligible for the intimate service of Hari ?

42 Are varna and asrama the object of attainment of spiritual endeavour ? Whether paramahansa is subject to varna and asrama ? What is the satisfactory solution of the opposition between worldly life and asceticism ?

43 Under what kind of regulation may social conduct and relationship produce the maximum good of the world ?

44 What is your corroborative opinion about regulations regarding the funeral of the departed ? What is the satisfactory solution of the conflict of opinion regarding funeral regulations represented respectively by the Brahman Charvaka and Jaimini ?

45 Who is to perform the funeral rite and of whom ? By means of what materials is it to be performed ?

46 Should degrees of eligibility be considered ? What is the final object of the consideration of difference of fitness ?

QUESTIONNAIRE

REGARDING OBJECT

1 What is your impression regarding object of the ultimate end ? Are attainment of svarga (heaven) gain of greater power, extinction, liberation and love,—all of these, the same ?

2 Which of the following viz. religious observance (dharma), utility (artha), satisfaction of sensuous desire (kam) or enjoyment of material entities which are non-God, or quest of the Brahman conceived as identical with oneself, is the eternal need of the jeeva ?

3 What is your idea regarding liberation (mukti) ?

4 Is there any distinction between love of Godhead and the four worldly goals (chaturvarga) ?

5 Are the attachment of animals and love of Godhead the same thing ? Is the former the cause of the latter ?

6 Is love of Godhead inferior to its preliminary viz the bliss of merging in the Brahman ? What argument or scriptural evidence may be adduced on this point ?

7 Is there separate existence of enjoyer and object of enjoyment in Brahma-bliss ? Is the joy of Brahma-bliss eternal or temporary ?

8 Is there any difference of degree in the object of spiritual endeavour due to differences of circumstances and fitness ?

9 What is the measure of the bliss of those whose minds are set on the unmanifested cause of the phenomenal world ?

10 Is there only difference of degree of misery, or does there also exist difference in the quality and nature of the objective, as between the methods of spiritual endeavour of those whose minds are set on unmanifested cause of phenomena, on manifested phenomena and on the active play of the pure cognitive principle, respectively ?

11 Is it possible to be in enjoyment of the bliss which is uninterrupted and attended with eternal and perfect knowledge by either of the alternative methods viz the exercise of the worldly senses or allowing the mind to do whatever it likes ?

12 Is blissful activity of the principle of pure cognition admissible ? What is the difference between spiritual and material blissful activity ? Should one desist from the service of the blissful activity of the principle of pure cognition by the realisation of the unwholesome nature of material pleasurable activities ? What is the relation of the phenomenal world to the various blissful transcendental acitivities ?

13 What are the necessity and object of human life ?

14 If love of Godhead be the object of life, why do not the majority of people eagerly seek for the same ?

15 Are realisation of oneness with the Brahman and love of Godhead the same thing ?

16 Is the highest love (mahabhava) a kind of physical or mental disease ?

17 Are the results of both the real indications of love and similar indications acquired by mechanical practice of same, the identical ?

Enlighteners Regarding Aspersions

The true devotee is not persuaded to dismiss the Personal Existence of Godhead neither to accept the idols of the breakers and makers of physical articles.

The manufacturer and breaker of physical articles and the designer of mental activity can no longer impress upon a true dovotee to dismiss the personal existence of Godhead. He is convinced that the designers and manufacturers cannot build their castles on temporary regions and cannot idolize the personality of Godhead in their particular prejudices ; that Godhead can take the initiative and He was found to appear as Nrisingha Deva before the demon Hiranyakashipu who was firmly impressed of the non-existence of Godhead and that He has the power of removing the delusions of the limited human brains.

The 'Object' of worship (अर्चा) is necessary for worship. Those who want to worship without admitting the objective existence of their Object of worship, contradict themselves. In their anxiety to avoid idolatry they, indeed, worship nothing. This does not materially improve their case. Such attitude is positively mischievous as it represents a fundamental misconception of the nature of the Object of worship. Godhead has His own separate and independent existence much more so than any of His creatures. By the current theory of idolatry, for which the empiricists are wholly responsible, God is confidently supposed to be a product of the human brain. This is the inevitable element of self-contradiction in the empiric (current) theory of idolatry. This theory has to be smashed on the head in order to clear the issue from long-cherished prejudices. If idolatry is to cease, the brain of man must give up the attempt of manufacturing the Divinity. Whatever emerges from the workshop of the human brain should be unreservedly admitted to be an idol which cannot be the object of worship for the brain that produces it.

The next point which it will be necessary to bear in mind is that the Personality and Form of Godhead are capable, on His own initiative alone, of appearing on the mundane plane without becoming an idol or a commodity of this world. The Holy Form worshipped by the pure devotees is a manifestation of the Divinity to make possible His worship in this world by fallen souls, although this is necessarily inconceivable to our minds if we want to understand the 'Archaavatar' अर्चावतार with the resources of our limited intellects. We can realise the truth of this, if we submit to the guidance of the pure devotees who understand perfectly the misconceptions that prevent us from understanding the nature of our relationship with Godhead.

This holds true even if we fail to understand it or even if it may seem to be opposed to the testimony of our senses. We see the Archa made of clay or stone or wood and by the hand of man. We see that the Sri Bigraha is made in the likeness of the mundane body of a mortal being. We see that the holy Form is devoid of life. We see that he Archa does not accept anything offered to Him and that it is only to be imagined He accepts. All this stands in the way of our believing in the reality of Archa-manifestation and of all worship, because the two are inter-involved.

The Archa does not possess the Divine potentiality in the form that is intelligible to our limited judgment. The Archa seems to be a bit of clay that can be fashioned and broken at our sweet will. Tnis is the cause of our disbelief. We look for a miracle. But Godhead never stoops to remove our doubts by any comprehensible abnormality. Those who are sincere obtain the spiritual vision which alone enables one to see and hear Godhead Who is the Fulfilment and not the Anti-theism. To the devotee this world exists as much as it does to us, but to his clear vision it appears in its true perspective. This is the only miracle. That which shakes our faith in the reality of this world is magic or deception, not miracle. Those who look for magic to be convinced of the reality of spiritual events are not unfrequently found to be the most vociferous, opponents of all magic. It is necessary to guard ourselves against the blunders of deceptive verbiage of the most apparently innocent kind.

The devotee alone is not an idolator. All the rest cannot but be worshippers of idols. The devotee does not assert himself against the Divinity. All the the rest go by their erring judgment. Those who have been long habituated to grope in error fall into love with this function and acquire a trick of unconsciously reverting to the familiar function, even under cover of protest against such trick. The devotees are not liable to such blunder. They are always prepared to help those who are sincerely desirous of getting rid of their unnatural state of tricky ignorance. But pedantry or stiff ignorance under the guise of wisdom is the evil that is most difficult to cure and most ready to take offence when its cure is really attempted. The dovotees, however, luckily for us, possess perfect tact and patience and are in a position to deal with us in an effective manner. But it takes time to imbibe the new habit, even after we suppose ourselves to be convinced of its truth and natural neceesity.

The old habit ever tries to recover its hold on us by the most insidious approaches. It is only the pure devotee who, because he happens to be himself thoroughly established in the new function, can detect and give us timely warning against the approaches of the old evil. But it is for us to accept his advice which is opposed to those very things that we are accustomed to hold most dear. No one bereft of the accepted support of Divine Strength can hope to attain the spritual life. 'नायमात्मा बलहीनेन लभ्यः। The strength that suffices for the attainment of the spiritual life is not any form of the forces with which we are so familiar in this world. It is the spiritual power of the Divinity that helps us to acquire and retain the spiritual life against the otherwise insuperable opposition offered by the forces of Ignorance, that is assigned to the deluding function by the All-wise Providence for facilitating the redemption of fallen souls. Godhead supplies the strength that can alone enable us to withstand the process of chastening by the destruction of all self-created idols. The most effective form in which the help is offered is that of the worship of the holy Form of the Divinity.

The Holy Form that is worshiped by the devotee is not a concoction of his brain. The Holy Form (Sri Bigraha) is not an Idol. He is Godhead Himself in Whom the Form is identical with the Possessor of the Form. The Possessor of the Holy Form manifests Himself for accepting the worship of the devotee, because Godhead ever allows Himself to be ruled by unalloyed love. The devotee can make the Divine Form visible to mortal eyes for the redemption of fallen souls.

Spiritual Nature of the Worshipper.

If we want to believe in the Holy Form, we can do so only by believing in the spiritual personality of the pure devotee of Godhead. Godhead can be worshipped only by the soul who is in the full state of grace and on the plane of the Divinity Himself. This function is located beyond the range of the faculties of human mind. It is the inconceivable case of the transcendent manifesting himself in the likeness of the mundane, while remaining necessarily and absolutely free from any mundane taint, for the benefit of individual souls whose power of spiritual vision is obscured. It is the devotee alone who can worship the Holy Form in the proper manner even when He makes His appearence in this world in response to his prayers for the deliverance of fallen souls. To the fallen soul the Holy Form appears as a symbol or Image made of mundane elements. So he is naturally indisposed to believe in the Divinity of the Form. But Godhead never removes the doubts of a person who is not prepared to take the trouble of correcting himself by availing of the advice and example of His devotees.

As a matter of fact we need not know Godhead at all, unless we are really prepared to serve Him. If we wish to serve Him, we accept His dispensation. It is no doubt our duty to accept nothing as a dispensation, unless and until we are perfectly satisfied of its Divine nature. But no one who is sincerely anxious to serve Godhead, can object to the unconditional acceptance of the Divine dispensation. The Divinity is the Supreme Person, the Lord and Master, the One Object of our loving devotion. The individual souls are His servants whose service is of the likeness of natural exclusive, overpowering, causeless loving submission to the pleasure of an autrocratic Master, Husband and Lover.

Those who do not sufficiently realise the nature of the Divine Personalty and the perfect purity and fullness of the love that binds the individual soul to his Lord and vice versa, can alone object to the lead of His devotee. To believe the devotee is the natural and only method of entering the realm of spiritual Love. The cognitive principle untouched by Divine love leads to sterility and sheer self-annihilation.

It is, therefore, necessary on the threshold of spiritual life to try to understand the nature of the devotee of Godhead as the person by following whom alone we can ever obtain the spiritual service of the Lord, which is located beyond the reach of the faculties of the limited mind of man but which is real, truly rational and full of perfect bliss. The worship of the Holy Form under the lead of His devotees can alone enable our souls to regain the personal connection with Godhead. Those who object to the holy Form deny thereby the personality of Godhead, the spiritual nature of His devotees and the personal nature of their service. All this is no doubt inconceivable to our limited understanding, but is in perfect correspondence with the principle of rationality. It does not offend the sense of rational consistency, if the worship of the Holy Form on the spiritual plane under the unconditional lead of the true devotee be admitted as the fulfilment of all rational aspiration possible to man in this world.

The designers and manufacturers of idols cannot escape the necessity of paying worship to the non-Godhead in the form of their particular prejudices. This has produced all the pseudo-forms of the religious worship. By the pseudo-religionists the transcendental Form is misconceived as the subnormal, abnormal or phenomenal which are the grossest forms of idolatry.

Godhead has the power of initiative to deal with unbelief in ways that are inconceiveable to the avowed atheists. Sri NrisinghaDeva and Hiranyakashipu.

The empiric rationalists, in their vain endeavour to steer clear of idolatry in the grosser forms fall, back upon refined idolatry in the form of the worship of their mental prejudices. The thorough-going pseudo-rationalist becomes the avowed atheist. But all these speculations cannot prevent Godhead from taking the initiative and baffling all their calculations by bursting upon their vision in His absolutely novel Form, as NrishinghaDeva appeared before the demon Hiranyakasipu who was firmly impressed of the non-existence of Godhead.

But Godhead ever presents His terrible Aspect to the view of non-believers. He appears to them as the Destroyer of everything on which they pin their love and reliance. This terrible disillusionment is the form in which the causeless mercy of Godhead ever 'descends' into this world to serve and vindicate His persecuted and maligned devotees. If the devotee is set at naught we thereby cut away the plank from under our feet and fall into the bottomless pit.

It is not possible to remain neutral in this matter. The greatest disillusionment no doubt awaits the greatest of athiests; but the disillusionment can only destroy his cherished illusions. It is a great but negative mercy. The 'descent' of the destructive mercy is brought about by the sufferings of the devotees.

The positive mercy, in the shape of the worship of Godhead, cannot be obtained by the method of opposing the devotees. Sri Gaursunadar has established this by His teachings and conduct. He has proved the superiority of the worship of the devotees of God to the worship of Godhead Himself. The worship of the Holy Form accordingly loses all its meaning, nay becomes a means of destruction, if it does not take the form of the worship of the pure devotees. The only worship that is acceptable to the pure devotee is that of the Holy Form in the manner laid down by Godhead Himself. The pure devotee alone can teach and impart this worship to the fallen soul. Those who stand in the way of this mission of positive mercy are dealt with by Godhead Himself in His terrible Form as Destroyer of the opponents of His devotees.

But Sri NrishinghaDeva is ever persuaded by His devotees after the pastime of destruction to shower His positive mercy on the vanquished. The worship of the Holy Form of Sri Gaurasundar is the worship of Godhead in the Form of His Devotee. This is the only expiation by which the general redemption of fallen humanity can be obtained. Let its import be not misunderstood and misrepresented by this most corrupt of all the Ages and thereby invite the terrible mercy of Divine wrath for the negative cure of the most wicked perversity, by the method of mere destruction.

Advent of Sri Sri Baladeva

Thakur Brindaban, the first poet of spiritual Gauda has sung the praise of Baladeva Who is the source of all power in the beginning of his masterly treatise. There was necessity for the poet and biographer to sing the praise of Baladeva Who gives the power of uttering the Truth (kirtan). Baladeva can make the dumb speak and enable the cripple to cross mountains. Sri Gurudev wields the power of Baladeva.

In these days, 'power' or 'force' (bala) is the absorbing topic throughout the world. Those who have studied the history of the western countries are aware that a system bearing the name of Bolshevism came into existence in Russia in the year 1917 A. D. and it has been a subject of much heated discussion to this day. The principle of Bolshevism has existed since the creation of the world.—the designation was different but the fundamental principle is the same. The power of the masses, which the system represents is tending to dominate the society in all civilised nations who are all in favour of the ultra democratic principle. If one talks against it, he is likely to find no audience. What the Mahatmas of Sri Gaudiya Math have been speaking to the world for the last twelve years is taken in certain quarters to be their sectarian views as it does not claim to be the views of the masses. It is accordingly confidently maintained that it will not beneifit us or the society in the least because we are of opinion that the voice of masses alone possesses lasting and effective power. Therefore, we say to the social person that if he wants to do any good to his society he must have patience for the opinions of the masses. It does not, however, lie in one's losing oneself in the stream of temporary emotional excitements to which the mass is very liable. But if with patience and perseverance, we surrender ourselves to the feet of Sri Baladeva Who can make us strong and powerful that real power to do good will be given us. Thakur Brindaban has said that if you are really anxious for power to serve God then you should endeavour to obtain the power of uttering the Truth (kirtan), otherwise you fail to secure the real thing. In India, the land of the Upanishad, where there should be no dearth of real power, it is very stange, indeed, that we do not understand how to obtain the same. Is it sectarianism to say that no one but a Brahman has a right to the study of the Upanishads? No, it expresses a great truth if it is properly understood.

Two persons—Birochan on the side of the Asuras (demons) and Indra on the side of the 'devas' (Gods)—went to Brahmma to know about the truth of the Upanisads. When with offerings in hand, they came to Brahmma the latter said to them, 'You have got some initial work to do. You will have to live in the house of your Guru (preceptor) and serve him for a period of thirty-two years.' Acting on this advice both of them accordingly began to learn the knowledge of the Brahman. After thirty-two years of study with the Guru, Brahmma said, 'The Brahman is the gross body. To this Birochan said, 'Well, I have known that and finished my study.' Thinking that the soul is identical with the gross body according to the Upanishads, Birochan began to preach it to the atheists, (asuras). Indra, however, enquired if there is any other underlying meaning. After another thirty two years of service of Gurudev, Brhmma told him in reply that the 'mind' is identical with the Brahman. Finding Indra to be devoted to the service of Gurudeva, after another thirty-two years Brahmma informed him that the Jiva after being liberated from the physical (gross) and mental (suble) bodies attain to his effulgent spiritual body. It is this excellent person who participates in the enjoyments, pastimes and pleasures of the spiritual world. According to the Vedas this is the best of all forms of salvation.

On perusal of the first chapter of the Gita we may think that we have been advised to engage in war. When we have read the second chapter, we understand that the knowledge of the soul is the object to be aimed at; but we do not enquire how to know him. On a reference to the third chapter, we think, that 'to do religious works' is the ultimate conclusion of the Gita; but we do not enquire of the Gita as to what kind of work is meant. We have not the patience to learn what the Shastras are repeatedly indicating by their introduction, conclusion, repeated recitals and unprecedented effect. If we patiently read the Gita and try to ascertain the final object of its concluding Shloka, we understand that we have been advised to give up all forms of religion and surrrender ourselves to the Feet of Sri Krishna alone. In order to fully grasp the purport and the true intention of the Shastras, we must have to hear with patience, understand with patience and act with patience. If, in course of serving our Gurudev with patience, we pray at his feet for strength, then only we can expect to obtain it by the grace of Sri Baladeva.

Where does the power lie ? Sriman Mahapravu has said that all the powers of Godhead are concentrated in His Name. But we do not admit this to be so because we do not find its support in the voice of the masses, as we consider power to be identical with general concurrence.

What was the nature of the power that Hiranyakashipu got ? He obtained the power of Baladeva in a perverted form. In the Puranas there was an 'Asura' of the name of Baladeva who was killed by Indra and from whose bones came out jewels and pearls. This 'Asura' Baladeva co exists in competitive opposition to that Baladeva in whose lotus feet the entire principle of Divine transcendence and immanence and that of serving souls are centred. We are worshipping that perversion viz. the Asura Baladeva at present. It is our Sri Gurudev who can take us to the real power giving-God. Now-a-days attempts are being made by woman te be treated on a footing of equality with man. But we can only hope to be able to protect both with that spiritual power for which we should rightly aspire. You are aware that Dhatri Panna, Durgabati and Karmadevi possessed more than masculine courage and strength of purpose ; but how long could it protect even them ? If this power can-not save any of us for good is it worth our while to strive for such an uncertain protection ?

He alone is powerful who attains realisation of self and becomes established in the self. We can-not gain strength unless and until we get rid of inconclusive mental speculations. What apparently enormous strength Napoleon gained ! But he had to yield feebly to a weak female. Does it prove the excellence of the power of Science that it decapitated millions the other day ? The intellectual giants of the West declared the other day that the time is not distant when we shall see the great conflagration of a suicidal war between capital and labour. Is this the real fulfilment of our aspiration for power and is such power by the exercise of which men can destroy everything that which we are seeking ? Or, is that the real 'power' of which the Sadhu Mohatmas speak and which can make a man fully wise and free ? But we are evilly disposed to prefer the acquisition of the gross material force. The Upanishad has said that the soul can not be realised by one which is devoid of true power. The soul cannot be realised by brute or physical force. Party-factions will bring us no good. Then and then only we shall be in a position to acquire real strength when we shall be in the attitude of service towards the real power-giving-God Sri Baladeva and his alter ego Sri Gurudeva. But we shall fail in that if we keep aloof from Him by the abuse of our 'free-will' as amply testified to by history and science. Therefore if we want to acquire actual strength, we must take shelter in Him who is the Repository of all power.

By sucking the self-same water of the river, a neem-tree and a mango-tree on the bank of the Ganges produce fruits of different tastes Ignorant people take the word 'power' in the sense of something gross and material. Guided by the ordinary conventional meaning they take it in the sense of physical or mental strength, while those guided by the truly rational meaning understand it in the sense of soul-force. He who desires to obtain the soul-force can attain to it by the grace of Sri Baladeva. But the present world will ask, 'What good will come of the worship of Baladeva? The Sruti has said, 'The soul can not be realised by one who is powerless'. We shall have to know the Thing through service, and if we agree to surrender ourselves to the guidance of Sri Gurudeva then only we shall know the purport of real power.

By means of the external garb some have tried to identify the state of surrender to Sri Guru Deva with Sannyas (renunciation of the world). No good will accrue to us unless we brand ourselves with the mark of the whole time service of Sri Gurudev. By 'sannyas' is not meant the wearing of a saffron robe. It will not do unless we take leave of the attitude of reliance on the vox populi. The learned and intelligent person who, being thus branded, will make the attempt through atonement, penance and service of Sri Gurudeva, will be in a position to enter that spiritual realm of Baladeva, the abode of His eternal pastimes where there is nothing unwholesome. Sri Baladeva, the power-giving-God, appeared in this world to infuse strength into all of us to give away the Divinity in the form of transcendental sound or the holy Name the Fountain-head of all strength, to conditioned souls from door to door. Baladeva is the same as Nityananda and is no other than the alter ego of Sri Krishna, the Supreme Godhead, and exercises the plenary power of Krishna. It is not that He can-not pose as the husband of many wives or as a thief of apparently the worst type. He possesses the nature of the Spiritual Despot who can perform 'Rasalila' and He is on a footing with Krishnachandra Himself and can drink the wine without offence The power of the Absolute rests with Baladeva and nothing can defile Him who is the repository of all power. He who is reluctant to acknowledge the absolute freedom of will of Godhead has no faith in Him. People may wonder why after taking to Sannyas (renunciation of the world), Nityananda again married twice without committing the deadly offence of lapse into worldliness thereby. He performed the 'pastime' of an abadhuta (super-ascetic) but He is nevertheless the receptacle of all power. He can indulge in amorous dalliance with millions of spiritual milkmaids. Nityananda Pravu came into this world to give freedom to all sentient beings, a power that transcends all power of this world and is the power of Nityananda, the power of 'Sabda Brahman', the power of Kirtan. But the pity is that we may have no faith in this. He gave away the free gift of spiritual love to high and low and even to beasts and birds, a thing which was not given before to the Gods, Brahmma and his peers. But why is not even a drop of the ocean of love showered upon us? Because we do not surrender to Him with open hearts free from all hypocricies. It is for that reason that Sri Gurudeva, the inseparable associated counterpart of Nityananda, come to us at times and admonish us to endeavour to obtain the real strength. Nrisingha, Vamana and the other Appearances of the Divinity are but the partial although Divine manifestations of the Fountain head Himself. When the greatness of Lord Nityananda will be proclaimed at the door of every conditioned soul, only then will the real good of the world come, not only in Bengal but all over the universe. The first Gaudiya poet has sung, 'One who intends to dive deep into the ocean of devotion by crossing this mundane world, let him serve and worship Nitaichand. Even we, the people of Bengal, care very little for this advice. We are striving after brute force but do not care to obtain the real power. What could Prahlad not do by the grace of Nrishingh deva, a partial Divine manifestation of Sri Baladeva! He was not in the least agitated by the frowns and ferocities of Hiranya Kashipu, the mighty king of the 'asuras'. By the grace of Nrishingh deva all the obstacles to his devotion were completely eradicated.

If we desire to become the real conquerors of the world and be saved from the hands of impious athiests, the real demons, then we must engage in the worship of Nityananda Pravu who is no other than Sri Baladeva Himself. When the people of this world will so engage themselves, it will be then and then only that real peace and happiness will reign all over the world, that real swaraj will be established and real freedom will come. Therefore, we should take care as to how we can secure the grace of Sri Baladeva and his other self Sri Gurudeva.

Who is a Brahmana ?

The regulations embodied in the Varnashrama system provide for the literary education of the people under proper safeguards. The scriptures were also taught as literature. Such study of the scriptures under a competent teacher enabled the most successful student to appreciate the Truth up to the level of the teachings of the four Vaishnava Acharyas who preceded Sri Chaitanyadeva. The empiric method by proper handling may impart a symbolic idea of the nature of reverential service of Godhead in terms of the conditions of this world. But the empiric method can never lead to the actual plane of the Absolute which is situated beyond mundane reference.

But it was only the most successful of the twice-born pupil who could be made to reach this lofty altitude of imperfect but genuine reverence for transcendental Godhead. The natural tendency of the empiric study of the Scriptures is to sink the aspiring learner into the depths of intellectual nihilism. This tragedy is set forth in the writings of Sri Sankaracharya.

The aspiring candidate for the empiric knowledge of the Scriptures cannot avoid the fatal fascination of the subtle appeal to the pervert instinct that is inherent in us. But the theory of merging in the undifferentiated One cognition has done a great negative service to the cause of true religion. The theory of the undifferentiated Absolute cognition does not really deny wholly the rationable of theism. It has effected most useful destructive work under the constructive guise. The theory itself was, indeed, called forth by abnormal needs. Under the garb of extending a general, rational and scriptural support to all forms of worships and speculations the system dealt the mortal blow to the fundamentals of all materialistic speculation by the agency of itself. The principle that it tried to establish was that it is not possible for the limited understanding of man to cross the line of the temporal world and that mental speculation can, indeed, usefully destroy its own constructions but cannot build any permanent structure.

Those who suppose that the theory established complete merging with 'the undifferentiated Great' as the only inactive cognitive existence as the desideratum of all spiritual endeavour, miss the essentially negative quality of such conclusion which the theory itself declares to be inconceivable that is, from its point of view, unsatisfactory. It shows successfully that the empiric method may be used to establish a different conclusion from the finality of matter viz. the finality of one undifferentiated cognitive existence instead of the resolution of the cognitive principle itself into the featureless causal material existence devoid of cognition. This is fighting fire with fire. The empiric rationalistic process involves this eternal self-contradiction within itself, representing the antagonism between featureless gross and subtle (mental) material existence respectively into which it is inconclusively assumed to be desirable to merge. These are the two apparently contrary poles to which the path of empiric wisdom tends equally to lead. The two poles are represented by the materialistic systems of the finality of the material and mental state respectively. Of these two the former is the properly atheistic and the earlier system. The application of the method for proving the other co-alternative is later and was really suggested by it. This is always possible, nay inevitable, in empiricism and, therefore, need cause no real surprise.

The average student of the Scriptures, unless his study leads him to discover the impossibility of attaining the Absolute by means of the relative, is bound to be landed by such study in the quagmire of gross or subtle material nihilism. The Scriptures themselves contain numerous warnings against the study of the Shastras by the aspiring method. The empiric study of the Scriptures is termed the path of (pseudo.) knowledge (jnana marga) leading to self-destruction or merging with the one undifferentiated material or cognitive principle. The Scriptural knowledge acquired by such study is classed as secular knowledge (aparavidya) by the Upanishad. The twice-born, who included the three intellectual classes of the Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaishyas, were taught all subjects including the Scriptures in the academies of the Brahmanas but under a promise that they were not to confound such empiric knowledge with spiritual enlightenment.

The theories of the finality of the undifferential material and mental state agree in denying the existence of any such line of demarcation between empiric knowledge and spiritual enlightenment. Both regard the empiric process as the sole and sufficient method for attaining the Truth. Both regard the Truth as undifferentiated existence. Both regard the individual cognitive process as a passing phase which is bound to merge into one undifferentiated existence. The earlier system holds that this ultimate state is identical with the primary and final causal state in cosmic evolution. The contrary system maintains that the cognitive principle survives the material and is the real undifferentiated finality but is then devoid of all activity. This theory does not attach any positive value to any form of activity. Its attitude is one of utter indifference towards all activity. It holds that activity itself is the delusion and must cease to be pursued to avoid its perpetuation. It, however, sanctions all activities as they happen to be unavoidable on condition that the attitude of internal indifference is simultaneously cultivated as the real disideratum. The older theory is less cynical, more ethical and more grossly materialistic. It does not hold the material world to be a mere figment of the imagination as the other does. It, therefore, insists on the necessity and value of positive and specific conduct. But the indifference to form inculcated by the other system appealed to the people and enabled indifferent persons of rival creeds to fraternise with one another to retain amicably the externals of their contrary forms of worship. All variety of form of worship has thus been preserved and even elaborated under the negative sanction of the philosophy of the undifferented cognitive finality. It succeeded in patching up a sort of religious and social peace by tentatively conserving in an internally demolished form all existing popular practices. An appearance of social peace was produced by a policy of worldly expediency backed by an elastic philosophy. There is necessity for such a policy in exceptionally abnormal circumstances. But no positive good can be expected to follow from the pursuit of such a course.

I have thought it necessary to dwell at some length on the effect of the polemical and social activities of the materialistic schools because even the debased Varnasrama system under the tutelege of the pseudo-Brahmanas thougt it convenient to fall into line with the system of cognitive inactivity to strengthen itself for its social victory over Buddhism. The system of inactive cognition extended the scriptural support even to the system of caste which came to be identified with the varnasrama institution after the latter had been hopelessly disorganised by Buddhism. This fact will enable the reader to form an idea of the nature of the practical consequences of the theory of unification with the undifferentiated inactive cognitive finality. It would not be exaggeration to say that India of today is under the grip of this deadening philosophy more completely than it ever was in any other period of its history.

There had been formidable antagonists of the materialistic systems in the middle Ages especially in the south. Sri Ramanuja and Sri Madhwa are historical personages who vigorously opposed the influence of the materialistic schools by their literary and social activities. They employed the method of polemics which those systems had employed in their attempt to re-establish the theistic interpretation of the Scriptures. Both were giant intellects and their influence continues to this day in the form of a healthy prejudice against materialism in either form especially in the south of India. But even in the South, for want of systematic culture, the systems of Ramanuja and Madhwa have lost much of their original vitality and have even made unconscious approaches in the hands of pseudo-exponents to the heterodox idealism of Sankara, a process which has been distinctively expedited by the influence of Western culture which in the form in which it has spread in this country has proved to be of the negative idealistic brand.

Sri Chaitanya did not preach the amelioration or reform of secular society. He treats of the eternal spiritual issue which lies wholly beyond the range of mundane interests. Sri Chaitanya restored the spiritual life to such individuals as were disposed to receive it by the method of unconditional submission to the teacher of the Absolute Truth. The associates of Sri Chaitanya accomplished a stupendous quantity of literary work that constitutes the latest and the most significant addition to the revealed literature of the world, mirroring the actual life on the highest transcendental plane. It is not for us to say whether that fortunate day will ever dawn for the world when the living service of the Absolute made available by the causeless mercy of Sri Chaitanya Deva will be accepted by all persons by the method of unconditional submission to the transcendental Acharya.

Sri Chaitanya and His associates abstained from trying to change or reform the practices of society. This sensuous life cannot be reformed into the higher life. One has to enter the higher life by wholly discarding the mundane. Sri Chaitanya enjoins the method of persuasive propaganda by word and conduct to wean the people of this world to the higher life. The literary work of His associates and followers embodying His teachings have come down to us. But the movement has been exploited from an early phase by ambitious worldly persons for antisocial purposes. This departure from the teaching and practice of Sri Chaitanya proved necessarily unfortunate in its results and is even now a great stumbling block in the way of a right understanding of their real nature.

True to the spiritual purpose of the Varnashrama institution Sri Chaitanya authorized the process of initiatory admission into the spiritual life. This was rendered practicable by the simultaneous appearance of a very large number of transcendental teachers in the company of the supreme Lord. They taught the Truth to all those who were attracted by their supermundane personality to receive Him at their hand by the method of unconditional submission. Those who were so inclined were admitted by them into the spiritual life by the samskaras (purificatory ceremonies) of Diksha and Upanayan prescribed by the Pancharatra (the section of the Vedic literature containing the rational treatment of the five-fold spiritual knowledge). Sri Chaitanya did not follow the hereditary method of the Dharma Shastras which they themselves declare to be unsuitable for the present highly polemical Age which is given to hair-splitting arguments for defending rank materialism. Sri Chaitanya and His associates did not try to supplant the hereditary Brahmanas as leaders of secular society. The Lord vanquished their leaders in controversy and in the immortal literary works of His associates and followers transmitted to all succeeding generation a complete and systematic presentation of the life of pure service of the Lord.

Sri Chaitanya recruited His followers from all ranks of the people irrespective of caste, creed or colour. They were initiated into the spiritual life by the ceremonies of Diksha and Upanayana, by the rationalistic method of the Pancharatra. The test of disposition alone was accepted by Him in determining eligibility for Upanayana. The claim of heredity was ignored as being unsuitable and forbidden by the Scriptures for the Iron Age. Thus was formed a vast association of individuals, recruited from all classes of the people, who were admitted into the spiritual life by submitting to receive the same by the method of unconditional submission to the bonafide transcendental Acharya. All this is in strict accordance with the special scriptural dispensation for the Iron Age. All recruits were hereby automatically lifted to the status of a Brahmana in the real sense of the term as possessing the proved spiritual disposition by the testimony of the bonafide transcendental teacher. This is the spiritual varnashrama institution (Daiva Varnashrma Dharma) which can contain, as in the Satya Yuga only one Spiritual Varna Viz. that of the Brahmanas, all the rest being Shudras. It is also an association of individuals and is wholly outside and independent of the hereditary social or domestic arrangements which are the products of history. It is the actual realisation in the life of the individual of the pregnant principile of the Geeta which may be rendered by the beautiful words of the Christian Gospel, "Leave all and follow Me." Ourselves.

His Divine Grace—His Divine Grace with party arrived at Allahabad on the 22nd of August and stopped at the residence of Babu Monmohan Saanyal, retired District and Session Judge at No. 5 Fort Road, George Town. His Divine Grace paid a visit to the village of Arail on the opposite bank of the Jamuna on the 25th of August. Allahabad has special sanctity for the Gaudiya Vaishnavas on account of its intimate associations with Sri Chaitanya Deva. It was here that Sri Chaitanya instructed Rupa Goswami in the principles of pure devotion and authorised him to put them in writing Srila Paramahansa Thakur has established Sri Rup Gaudiya Math in commemoration of this great event. It is the desire of His Divine Grace to make Allahabad a centre of propagation of the teachings of Sri Chaitanya. During his short stay of about a week His Divine Grace passed his time in discoursing on the highest form of loving devotion taught by Sri Rupa Goswami. Ballabhacharya who was a contemporary of Sri Chaitanya visited the supreme Lord during His stay at Allahabad and persuaded Him to visit his native village of Arail. Sri Chaitanya accepted the invitation of Ballabhacharya and was his honoured guest at his house at Arail for a day. Ballabhacharya had an opportunity of listening to the discourses on the nature of Amorous love of the milkmaids of Braja from the lips of the Supreme Lord Himself. There is a great difference between the ideas and practices of the present day followers of Sri Ballabhacharya and those of Sri Rupa Goswami, notwithstanding their apparent superficial resemblance. The question whether the current principles and practices of the followers of Sri Ballabhacharya can be treated to Sri Nimbarkacharya, presents very grave difficulties. It is our purpose to treat the subject fully in future issue of this journal. It will suffice for the present to state our conclusion that the system of Bheda-bheda philosophy in the practical form in which it is presented in the works of the followers of Sri Ballavacharya is of comparatively modern origin and younger than the system of Sri Chaitanya. There exists very strong evidence to prove that the current creed—claimed to have been taught by Sri Ballabhcaharya, is a later offshoot of the system of Sri Chaitanya although it has even been represented as the original source of the latter in order to explain its resemblances to the teachings of Sri Chaitanya. A thorough study of both systems should help to remove all doubts on this point. There may come a day when the followers of Sri Ballabhacharya will realize the real relationship of their Acharya to Sri Chaitanya Deva and by unreserved acceptance of the teachings of Sri Rupa Goswmi will merge in the Church Universal as the humble followers of the Supreme Lord, Who is the original propounder of the religion of pure love. The schismatic differences engendered by time should be capable of being hated by the same agency. The present degeneracy of the church of Sri Chaitanya is mainly due to utter neglect of the study of the works of Sri Rupa Goswami both in U. P. and Bengal. His Divine Grace has been trying actively to break once for all the stupor of a couple of century by his vigorous propaganda embracing all India. Real and eternal Swaraj can be based only on the Truth Absolute. This has been the Teaching of all Scriptures. The writing of Sri Rupa Goswmi have made the Truth available to those of the present Age, who want to know the Absolute by the only method that is laid down by the Scriptures themselves. His divine Grace is the one perfectly loyal and convincing exponent of the teachings of Sri Rupa at this moment by his words and his activities. The salvation of the whole world lies in being enabled by Divine Grace to recognise and accept his exposition of the Truth. The way to Truth is only one being identical with the goal.

His Divine Grace is accessible at all hours to persons of all conditions. He talked almost continuously during his stay at Allahabad to those who came to him. Many of the best minds of Allahabad felt the attraction of his personality and paid the homage of their respects to his feet. Among those who were fortunate in being present at these discourses, we noticed the following well-known gentlemen :—Srijukta Harimohan Rai, Advocate Allahabad High Court ; Srijukta Nilmadhab Rai Vakil ; Srijukta Umanath Mukherjee, Excise Commissioner Allahabad ; Srijukta Ganesh Chandra Deva of the U. P. Agricultural Department ; Justice Dr. Sarendranath Sen of the Allahabad High Court ; Srijukta Mahendranath Sen ; Srijukta Umesh Chandra Ghose, M. A. retired Professor of Mathematics of Allahabad M.Sc. College ; Babu Chintamani Mukhopadhyaya famous educationist and founder of the Kasi Anglo-Bengali School ; Srijukta Jatindra Nath Sen M. A. the well-known author ; Dr. P. K. Acharya M.A. Ph. D (Leyden), Head of the Sanskrit Department of the Allahabad University ; etc. etc.

PROPAGANDA

In Chhotto Nagpur.—His holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhaktibilash Gabhastinemi Maharaj delivered a series of erudite lectures at Ranchi during the month of August in course of which His Holiness addressed public meetings at the local Hari Sabha and Durgamela and also in Hinu and Doranda quarters of the town. Among numerous topics of everyday importance His Holiness dealt with the difference between pure and adulterated devotion, between the mahamantra which is the priceless gift of the supreme Lord and doggerel concocted by erring mortals, the difference between the religion of pure love and the cult of Sakhi-bhek between lust and prema, between the holy Name, the dim reflection of the name and offence against the Name, and other cognate matters. These discourses have set the cultured classes at Ranchi to begin to think seriously about the urgent need of getting rid of these fatal errors that are passing under the name of religion.

His Holiness had during the previous month showed the benefit of his enlightening discourses on the fortunate town of Jamshedpur. The public conscience at these two headquarters of the Division has been aroused from the altitude of indifference by the revelations of His Holiness.

In the united Provinces. His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Sarbaswa Giri Maharaj addressed a large public gathering at the great temple of Bijnor U. P. on the subject of the Bhagabat religion. Swamiji spoke eloquently in English and was most highly appreciated by the audience. His Holiness was pleased during His stay at Bijor to accept the hospitality of Param Bhagabat Thakur Shahib Srijukta Tikam Singji. His Holiness also expounded the Bhagabat at the residences of Rai Bahadur Srijukta Karam Singji, Superintendent of Police ; Srijukta Kaliprasadji District Judge ; Srijukta Dwarakaprasadji, Zemindar and at the Panchamukha Temple. Srijukta Dwarakaprosadji has been so much impressed with the necessity of the propaganda that he is actively trying for the establishment of a permanent preaching centre at Hardwar.

In the District of Midnapur.—His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhaktipradip Tirtha Maharaj in collaboration with pandit Sripad Aprakrita Bhaktisaranga Goswami Prabhu descended from Sri Nityanananda, carried out during August a tour of lantern lectures in the interior of the District of Midnapur. At the special request of the Regent of the Malighat Estate, His Holiness was pleased to address a vast public gathering called by the Regent on the 9th of August on the subject, 'the teaching of Sri Chaitanya,' which was illustrated by lantern slides. The assembled people expressed their highest admiration and gratitude for the instructive lecture of His Holiness. His Holiness visited the following places in courses of his lecturing tour,—Kolaghat, Ranichawk, Midnapur town, Malighati, Narajole, Bhabanipur, Dubrajpur, Piljang, Purusottampur Bilashpur Satsukia, Chandipur and Sangdona.

In the Madras Presidency.

Their Holinesses Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Hriday Ban Maharaj, Srimad Bhaktiranjan Bhaktisar maharaj, Pandit Sripad Ramananda Brojobasi Vidyarnab B. A. and party continued their vigorous propaganda in Vizianagram and its neighbouring villages for a fortnight and returned to Kovvur where the building of the shrine of the foot-prints of Sri Chaitanya deva was now completed. Kovvur is hallowed by the memory of Rai Ramananda, and is conveniently situated for being the main centre of propaganda in the southern Presidency. The interest of the local public has been strongly aroused in favour of the establishment of a suitable memorial of the famous meeting between Sri Chaitanya and Rai Ramananda on the bank of the Godavari, in the form of a permanent preaching centre of the religion of unalloyed devotion taught and practised by Sri Chaitanya deva for the lasting benefit of all animated beings.

The Gaudiya Math

THE Gaudiya Math is the embodiment of the highest service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda made manifest in the modern urban environment by the Grace of the Acharyya. But the Gaudiya Math is not, therefore, any product of the multifarious mundane interests that engage the energies of the modern anthropomorphic City. It has not been brought into existence in the democratic or urban way by the consensus of opinions of any body of individuals of this world. It is the embodiment of the ideal of service of a single individual who does not belong to this or any Age, nor to this world. By the self-sufficing wish of this single individual the ideal of his service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda has been manifested in the busiest City of this country in the form of an institution for the practice and propagation of the most perfect service of the supreme Lord.

This institution which owes its existence both as regards initiative and growth to His Divine Grace Paramhansa Srila Bhaktisiddhanta Sarswati Goswami Maharaj is steadily winning recognition as the visible manifestation of the congregational service by the method of distinctive, cause-less, spontaneous, unconventional, loving devotion of individuals for the Supreme Lord, the eternal and only function of all individual souls revealed by all scriptures which were practised and taught in the country about 400 years ago by Sri Chaitanyadeva and His eternal associates. It is being steadily recognised that the spontaneous loving devotion to the lotus Feet of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda is the summum bonum on the highest plane revealed in a progressive and more or less explicit form by all the different Scriptures. The summum-bonum is capable of being actually realised by sincere Souls by the grace of of the Gaudiya Math as the unconditional active spiritual existence on the transcendental plane.

The materialistic activities of this world are not leading the nations towards the universal desideratum but are actually taking them away from it inspite of their seemingly promising appearance. The Gaudiya Math has undertaken the task of demonstrating the practicability of deflecting the course of all activities of individuals and communities towards the Truth by subordinating them properly to the spiritual service of the Supreme Lord. All worldly activities are capable of being brought into time with causeless spiritual service on the transcendental plane manifested in the activities of the Gaudiya Math.

The Gaudiya Math is the principle branch of Sri Chaitanya Math of Sridham Mayapur. The distinction between the Gaudiya Math and Sri Chaitanya Math is all analogous to that between one lamp lighted by another. The Gaudiya Math is the expansion of the Chaitanya Math in a visible form into the heart of this world. Sri Chaitanya Math is eternally located as the original soruce even when it is manifested to the view of the people of this world, in the transcendental environment of the eternal Abode of the Divinity. The activities of the Gaudiya Math and of the other sister branch Maths are, however, essentially identical with those of Sri Chaitanya Math and are categorically different from the ordinary activities of this world. They are also different from worldly activities that are conducive under the sanction of the scriptures to the attainment of spiritual service. The activities of the Gaudiya Math are the transcendental function itself to which the worldly functions have to be subordinated for the gradual attainment of the summun bonum. The Gaudiya Math is, therefore, a truly unique institution. It is different from all secular institutions and also from all religious institutions that practise worldly activities under spiritual sanction.

The Gaudiya Math is also identical with its founder Acharyya. The associates, followers and abode of His Divine grace are limbs of himself. None of them claim to be anything but a fully subordinate limb of this single individual. This unconditional, causeless, spontaneous submission to the Head, is found to be not only compatible with, but absolutely necessary for the fullest freedom of initiative of the subordinate limbs. This makes the Gaudiya Math as regards its constitution and function different from all other institutions.

Any service that is rendered to the Gaudiya Math has a peculiar power of assimilating the person who renders such service into the spiritual body of the congregation. The congregation of the Gaudiya Math and its sister Maths consists of an inner and outer body. The Maths and their inmates form the inner body. The sincere followers of the Maths form the outer body. The Maths form the regulating body. Those followers of the Maths who are engaged in various worldly activities under their sanction form the regulated body. There is an infinite series of gradations as regards aptitude and sincerity of devotion of individual members. The distinction between the regulating and regulated bodies is merely one of form of function. The degree and quality of voluntary and sincere submission to the Head is the measure of devotion of an individual occupying any position in either group. The want of sincere submission to the Acharya is the measure of one's aversion to the service of the Supreme Lord.

It is not possible for one who is not completely free from all taint of worldliness to understand the nature of spiritual service or to practise the same by mechanical submission to the Acharyya. The reason is simple. Such a person is cut off from the source of all enlightenment. Plenary spiritual service is performed by the supreme Lord Himself. It is because the supreme Lord happens to be His own Servant that it is possible for such service to exist at all and to be available to the conditioned soul by His grace. The Acharyya is not, however, to be regarded as a conditioned soul. He is the Predominated moity of the Absolute Integer. Or, in other words, the Acharya is the inseparable associated counter-whole of the Lord though he may class himself as a fragmentary part.

The nature of the Acharyya is Divine. As Acharyya the Lord is the source of the aptitude of the service of all conditioned souls. The conditioned souls are enabled to serve the Lord by the grace of the Acharyya. The Lord is pleased without cause to use conditioned souls in His service of Himself. Those conditioned souls that refuse to serve the Lord by the direction of the Acharya and prefer to follow their own unguided inclination, miss the service of the Lord and find themselves engaged in the various activities of this world for a selfish purpose.

But the Acharyya has power to reclaim conditioned souls to the free service of the Lord. As servant of the Supreme Lord the Acharyya exercises this function of his causeless mercy in perfect accordance with the Divine Dispensation revealed in the spiritual Scriptures.

There is an eternal chain of Acharyyas. The Divine preceptorial succession is a spiritual process. The real nature of the activities of the Acharyya is not comprehensible to a conditioned soul except by the grace of the Acharyya. Those who are mercifully enlightened are relieved from all doubts and apprehensions which are the offspring of ignorance born of aversion to the service of the Lord under His own direction as Acharyya. It is not possible to make the nature of Divine service comprehensible to those who are not actually in the state of grace just as it is not possible to convey the idea of light to one who is blind from his birth. By his very constitution the conditioned soul is but conditioned. He is wholly dependent on the Absolute Lord for his existence and function. He is constitutionally incapable of serving the Lord by his own right. But he is also constitutionally capable of being made to serve the Lord by the power of Divine Grace. He is also so made that he may or may not avail of Divine Grace when it is actually offered to him.

There are thus two uncertain factors on which the redemption of the conditioned soul depends viz. (1) the causeless grace of the Acharyya which is identical with Divine Grace and (2) the voluntary acceptance of Divine Grace by the conditioned soul. There is distinction between the grace of Godhead as Master and Acharyya. Godhead as His own servant or Acharyya can enable the conditioned soul to accept the Grace of Godhead as Master. The Acharyya is eternally engaged in imparting to all conditioned souls the inclination to accept willingly the Grace of Godhead as Master.

The Acharyya does not compel such acceptance. But it is nevertheless in his power to grant the inclination to the most undeserving and disinclined souls. The present activities of the Gaudiya Math and its sister Maths are a manifestation of this special grace of the Acharyya. This phenomenal world and its activities are also Divinely ordained to enable conditioned soul to realise the necessity of the acceptance of causeless Divine Grace for being freed from the conditioned state. But in the arrangement of the phenomenal world the conditioned soul is left to the method of residual discovery by being allowed to follow the bent of his unguided inclination by his own voluntary choice, which necessarily takes a long time to succeed and whose success is not pre-ordained. The activities, inmates and the Math itself are thus identical with the unambiguous form of the spiritual service notwithstanding their liability to being mis-understood by the misguided judgment of worldly-minded people.

They may be spontaneously intelligible by actual participation in them by complete submission to the Acharyya. This is what is being done in the Maths of pure devotion for their inmates. Everyone is being asked to become an inmate of the Maths for good by free choice. Everyone is being taught in practice the real meaning of the life led by sincere servants of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda by the manifested activities of the inmates of the Maths.

The Service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda is the highest form of spiritual service. It is the desire of Sri Goursundar to make available to all of us nothing less than this highest form of the Divine service. The Supreme Lord Himself taught this only function of every perfectly pure soul in all its gradations by precept and example. The esoteric meaning of devotion is expounded by Sri Rupa Goswami Prabhu. The words of Sri Rupa are further explained by Sri Jiva and the succeeding Acharyyas. Thakur Bhaktivinode in our Age has been most consistent and lucid exponent of the principle of unalloyed devotion manifested to this world by the writings of Sri Rupa and the Acharyas. Sri Chaitanya Math and its branch establishments have made available to all the opportunity of the complete realisation of the state of pure devotion to the lotus feet of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda in our present life.

No other institutions profess to teach the unalloyed service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda. Every other institution teaches something else than such service. This need not be so. It is practicable and desirable to bring about a change in the spirit of every institution so as to make it into a practising centre of the service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda.

The life led by the inmates of the Gaudiya Math is a matter of Supreme interest to every one of us. It is not possible to convey the adequate idea of it by description. It is necessary to live under the roof of the Math with a perfectly open mind to realise the spirit of its atmosphere of pure service. The Gaudiya Math is not the place for those who are disposed to be merely critical. They will not find anything that is flattering to their passion of destructive criticism. Those who are sincerely desirous of learning to live a life of service and are prepared to put forth their serious endeavour in all real humility for this purpose are sure to be benefited. It is easy to be disappointed. Only the superficial aspect of life is open to the inspection of our material senses. Our own superficial view may be hastily mistaken for the thing itself. Patience and sincerity for the purpose of knowing the Truth when He chooses to appear to us are necessary if one is really desirous of serving Him.

Sri Sri Radha Govinda is the centre of all activities of the Gaudiya Math. The inmates have no other duty excepting the service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda. The service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda consists of two distinct functions viz., (1) kirtan and (2) Archan. The Archan is the ordinary form of worship. It appeals directly to all the senses. The Holy forms of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda stand manifest to our view ready to accept our service. This is effected in a very simple way. The worshipper regards himself as the servant of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda. The house belongs to the Lord. The food is prepared for the Lord. Money is employed for the maintenance of the household of the Lord. The servant may accept only after the Lord has been served whatever the Lord is pleased to allot for his maintenance. The servant must have no relationships except for the service of the Lord. He must own no master except the Lord. He has to procure the necessaries for the service of the Lord by begging from door to door as it is the only duty of every person to give voluntarily their all for the service of the Lord with no expectation of any return. They are to offer to the Lord, whatever is obtained in this way and reserve nothing for their own personal use. They are to accept whatever may be given to them from day to day by the Lord for their maintenance. But they must not have any thoughts for their own maintenance. This is realised in practice by unconditional submission to the Acharyya. Every institution should try to approach this model set by the Gaudiya Math. But the ideal cannot be fully realised so long as every worldly relationship is not actually subordinated to the worship of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda.

For example there need be no arrangement for the teaching of the physical science for the amelioration of the worldly condition of those who do not serve the Lord to prevent their consequent physical discomfort. The service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda is capable of relieving every form of distress. The study of the sciences must not be allowed to be abused by intending the same for offering a semblance of relief to those who refuse the offer of real relief. The Science should serve Sri Sri Radha-Govinda by placing themselves at the disposal of the Acharyya. By the grace of the Acharyya it should be feasible to employ them in the service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda, if we are really convinced of its supreme necessity. But even if say a medical College is placed at the disposal of the Acharyya as Medical College it will not, thereby, become a Math. It will no doubt be prevented from going against the purpose of the Math. But whether any of the physicians or patients of such Medical College will ever choose to give up all connection with the feeder-institution by entering one of the Maths for the wholetime service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda will still depend on the grace of the Supreme Lord.

The institutions of this world go astray as soon as they ignore their constant and complete dependence on the source of them in the realm of Truth. It is this latter that is made manifest in this world by the grace of the Acharyya to serve as controlling centres of all world-activities. The Gaudiya Math is such controlling centre. There is no chance of all the institutions of the world being ever converted into so many Gaudiya Maths. They are capable only of placing themselves under the spiritual guidance of the Acharyya and being thereby made to serve his secondary purpose viz. of supplying need of a real objective in the workings of those institutions. These institutions will exist in their present forms as long as there is such a function to be performed by them in the complete scheme of Providence. Their existence would also be justifiable from this point of view. But they cannot be coverted into so many Gaudiya Maths because their function is superfluous on the higher plane which is free from all defect and want.

The Illusory Energy of God-Head.

(By Srijut Kishori Mohan Paul B. L.)

IN the Gita, addressing His bosom friend Arjuna, Bhagaban Sri Krishna has said, 'My dear friend, this Illusory Energy consisting of the threefold mundane quality is supernatural and may hardly be overcome. Even the gods and the sages (Rishis), not to talk of men and other lower beings, can hardly get rid of her infatuating influence. Only those who make absolute surrender to me may overcome her. Hence it is that Srila Narrottam Thakur has said, that the Illusory Energy though vanquished can not be got rid of, except by the grace of Shadhus. Barring the devotees who have completely surrendered themselvs to the feet of Sri Krishna, no one has the power to get rid of this Illusory Energy of Godhead consisting of the threefold mundane qualities of 'Sattwa' 'Rajas' and 'Tama'.

In the Srimad Bhagabatam we find that when by the charning of the ocean ambrosia was obtained, a violent quarrel arose between the gods and the demons as to the distribution of the same. Anxious to have the first taste of ambrosia, when the parties came to blows, thereby igniting, as it were, the all destroying universal conflagration, Lord Vishnu, in order to deceive the demons and preserve His creation, appeared in the form of a fascinating woman by His Illusory Energy. This wonderfully beautiful woman captured every heart by her fascinating side-glance and sweet smile and infatuated the whole world. With a most melodious accent and winning smile, this lady whose beauty surpassed that of the god of love, addressed the gods and the demons thus : 'O ye gods and demons why have you lit this deadly fire of war? Let me mediate between you and settle your disputes'.

Not to talk of other insignificant creatures, the whole universe and even the great-great-grand father Brahma was fascinated by the Illusory Energy of Godhead. The Devas (Gods) and the Asuras (demons) charmed with her sweet words agreed to her proposal. Most wonderful is the influence of Vishnu's Illusory Energy. Not only the Gods and the demons but all animate and inanimate beings of the whole world being fascinated by her influence mistake their gross bodies of flesh and blood to be their real selves, forget Godhead, consider their fragile wife, son, daughter, friend, wealth to be their life-long companions and thereby burn within themselves with the threefold misery attending upon birth and death, fear and disease etc.

In the Gita Lord Sri Krishna has said that residing in the hearts of all Jivas and overpowering them with the influence of His Illusory energy He is grinding them like machines. It is only those that have surrendered themselves to the feet of the spiritual guide who can extricate themselves from the influence of the deluding power. The spiritual guide is not like one blind man leading another blind man and ultimately both of them falling into the ditch. He who has obtained full realisation of the Vedas and completely surrendered himself to the God-head is alone the proper guide.

In this world of delusion no pleasures are real, because they are all transient, and like the water bubbles or the mirage in the desert disappear in the twinkling of an eye. No sooner is one desire satiated than another takes its place to burn the hankering heart with fresh tortures like the throwing of clarified butter into the sacrificial fire.

A man may be blessed (?) with every worldly fortune but he is not free from the pangs of sensuous desires which are sure to pinch him every now and then. Hence he who wants to get rid of this hardly-to-be-overcome Maya, must surrender himself to the feet of a Sat-Guru. Otherwise under her deluding influence, he will sometimes by doing virtuous deeds, ascend Swarga, and at other times by doing sinful deeds, come down into hell, and thus revolving in the wheel of births and deaths, burn with the pangs of sensuous desires. The characteristics of a 'Sat-Guru' being understood it becomes necessary to grasp the right meaning of self-surrender at his feet.

In the Gita we find that we should make humble obeisance to the 'Guru', serve him wholeheartedly and submit reasonable spiritual questions to him in order to get at the Truth Who will enable me to know 'who I am,' 'what my real nature is', 'where I was,' 'why I have come into this world and where I shall go.—I am very, very mean. I beseech the Guru to kindly enlighten me with a right understanding of these spiritual issues so that I may cross this ocean of the world in safety. When the sincere disciple in the spirit of full submission drinks with his ears the nectar of spiritual instructions from his Gurudev and renders him whole-hearted service, all his gloom of ignorance, due to Maya disappears and he becomes immune from the influence of the Illusory Energy.

The sight of this charming lady created a strong carnal desire in the hearts of the demons, on the other hand, it excited a sense of devotion in the hearts of the Gods who looked upon her as the mother-goddess of the whole universe. A child when placed on his mother's breast, sucks out the most sweet milk therefrom, but a leech, if placed theron, extracts blood in place of milk, according to its inherent nature. Infatuated with Vishnu-Maya, the demons like the leeches, instead of finding anything Godly in that charming lady, took her to be an object of their sensuous enjoyments, passed side glances to her and in a laughing mood, addressed her thus, "Beautiful lady, come to us. We are your servants and we will submissively carry out what you will be pleased to dictate to us".

But, on the other side, the Devas (gods) looked at this enchanting lady with the eyes of a baby looking at its affectionate mother. The result was that in the long run, these wicked demons, like the leeches being carnally enamoured of her, were deprived of that rare heavenly nectar which they were fighting for. While the Devas like the children were allowed to taste the same, gained strength thereby and began to roam about merrily.

The whole mundane universe is in the clutches of Vishnu Maya. This world is a prison and the Jivas are the prisoners. Under the infatuation of 'Maya' some are posing as kings others as subjects, some as masters others as servants etc. Just as on the stage the sweeper Rama Bagdi sitting on the throne plays the part of Maharaj Haris Chandra, and Shama Dom of the same class, playing the part of the queen Saibya may shed tears for the sake of her snake-bitten child and thereby simultaneously excite both pleasure and pain in the hearts of the audience ; but again in another moment both appear in their true characters as sweepers behind the scene, so on this worldly stage under the influence of 'Maya' some jivas are acting as 'Devas', some as demons, men, animals, birds, insects, serpents etc. When the gods Nala-Kuber were busy with their ribald sports in the water with the celestial nymphs (Apsaras) they attracted the notice of that great Vaishnava, Narada Muni who cursing their beastly conduct in atonement for the offence committed in his presence, changed them into the likeness of two Arjuna trees, (Jamalarjun) of Brindabon. Ahalya Devi was changed into stone by the curses of the great Rishi (sage) Goutama. Jivas due to their aversion to God-head, beguiled by the influence of Maya, pass through eighty-four lacs of different births as the result of their atheistical worldly activities (Karma). They sometimes ascend to heaven and there after fall down into hell. When wondering from birth to birth, if on any occasion by good luck, any of them happen to come in contact with the 'shadhus' (saints), they receive spiritual lessons from them which dispose them to render services to krishna and His associated counterpart, the Guru (spiritual preceptor). It is then and then only that such fortunate individuals are enabled to escape from the clutches of this Illusory Energy of God-head.

The power of Vishnu possesses two distinct aspects viz. 'Para' and 'Apara'. The former is the esoteric eternal or real aspect and the latter, the external or illusory aspect (Maya). This Apara energy fascinates the Jivas and bind them fast in worldly chains. While the internal energy or 'Para' sakti cuts away these worldly chains and imparts devotion to God.

Empiric knowledge can earn for us only a transitory sensuous living which vanishes into nothingness like a nocturnal dream in no time. Educated in the knowledge of money-making in empiric philosophy, sciences, arts, astronomy, medicine &c. we may vaunt as erudite scholars or as successful persons. But all our glee quickly vanishes into the womb of time. In a short time every success becomes lamentable and unsatiating confusion. The knowledge that inheres in attachment to Krishna is the only real knowledge and is called 'Para-bidya' or Brahmma-bidya (सा विद्या तन्मतिर्यया). In the Gita, Lord Krishna has said to Arjuna that earth, water, fire, air, ether, mind, empiric understanding and the perverted ego are the eight varieties of my external energy (Apara Prakriti) besides which I have got another superior internal energy (Para Prakriti) which, like the thread of a garland of pearls, supports the universe. This is the spiritual energy of which the Jivas are the manifestations.

Jivas under the shell of Maya act in diverse ways on this world-stage. Like a puppet in the hands of a skilful juggler being made to dance within different gestures and postures according to his will for the satisfaction of the spectators unsuspected by them, Jivas enamoured of the threefold attributes (Sattwa, Raja and Tama) of the deluding Energy of Vishnu, laugh, dance, weep, and shout like men possessed without being able to see the hand of the Enchantress pulling the wire from behind by the will of God-head.

Therefore he is the most wise and intellectual person who instead of playing the part of a mere acting doll on the world-stage is able to catch the purpose of this life which is to know and serve Sri Hari. Otherwise our performances are like the frantic attempts of delirious patients struggling to get at the tub of poisoned water to allay this unappeasable thirst of worldly desires. At these derelious activities of the conditioned souls, the spiritual doctor, Sri Guru deva sheds tears of pity and by the chant of the Name of Sri Hari, invites them to the protection of the Same.

As soon as a child is born the relations and neighbours rejoice as if it will remove all the sorrows and afflictions of every body But alas ! no one of them think of the inevitable end as they join the merry-making with light heart. But before perhaps a few months have passed, the child is carried away by the cruel hand of disease and in place of joy, the gloom of sorrow darkens the home and neighbourhood. The neighbours come to sympathise with the parents, curse the god of death, as being unaccountably jealous of their happiness. It appears to them to be a great pity that the god of death is no good dispenser of justice because he does not look to the equity, i. e., convenience and inconvenience of men, in disposing of cases under his care, but strikes the mortal blow in and out of season, according to his cruel whim. They are forced to content themselves with the poor consolation that these are all the dispensations of Providence which happen to the lot of all, hence we need not be sorroy for the inevitable.

Therfore the Scriptures say that in this world of illusion, barring the eternal service of Godhead, everthing is transitory and no permanent relationship can be established between any two mundane entities. Forgetting His service and falling under the clutches of 'Maya' in consequence thereof, the 'Jivas' are found to be suffering the three-fold miseries in this world. Forgetting Godhead and their own real nature and mistaking as their propers selves the mask supplied by 'Maya' in the shape of the physical and subtle body, the 'Jivas' pose as kings, queens ministers, judges, butlers, methars, rich, poor, high and low, etc. Devotion to Godhead being eliminated, evrything is illusion under her influence, the Jivas are made to look to their cloaks of flesh and blood as objects of their permanent concerns, thereby bringing all the miseries of this world upon their heads. There is no other royal road to get rid of this 'Maya' save and except the grace of Him who is her Lord. On coming into this world of 'Maya', the Jivas, instead of considering Sri Krishna to be the sole Enjoyer of all things and of their own selves, themselves pose as sole enjoyers and in attempting to do so, incur the punishment of misery. When by the grace of the spiritual preceptor, the influence of Maya is dispelled, the Jivas are enabled to see with their souls' eyes that they are the servants or objects of enjoyment of the one Omipotent Godhead. Like a matchmaker establishing relationship of husband and wife between the bridegroom and the bride, the spiritual Preceptor establishes their relationship of eternal service between Jivas and their master, Sri Krishna. Sri Krishna is the only object of our worship (सम्बन्ध). Devotion to Him is the only means of attaining Him (अभिधेय). The attainment of Prema or spiritual Love to His feet is the final goal to be arived at (प्रयोजन). The spiritual Preceptor is instrumental in making the 'Jivas' realise this whole hearted devotion to their Lord Sri Krishna. As in the case of a poor man seeking the favour of a millionaire, it behoves him to have recourse to his agent who is conversant with the ways and means by which he (the millionaire) can be satisfied, so in order to be admitted to the grace of the Lord of the universe, one must take recourse to the spiritual Preceptor who, as Agent or associated counterpart of the Lord is fully authorised to bestow His service and who is himself completely immersed in His constant service, and seek for initiation from him.

In this world of ours, the relationship that subsists between objects is of a transitory character. There can be no permanent pleasure here. All our joys are ephemeral and all our attractions towards one another, that of the father towards the son, of son towards the father etc., are actuated by selfish transitory motives, as the result of which sometimes we see a husband showing an utter disregard for his once loved wife and even considering her to be merely an object of his sensuous enjoyment, or the wife in her turn simulating a false devotion for her husband in order to secure ornaments etc. We even find a son imprisoning his dear father to secure the throne and the faithful servant running away with his master's hoarded wealth after applying the knife to the latter's throat. One friend sometimes poisons the other to misappropriate his all In this world of 'Maya', all the sentiments and relationships are of the unwholesome and transitory order and being based on unwholesome material interest cannot afford real or lasting pleasure.

Therefore, when by the grace of the true spiritual Preceptor we are enabled to get rid of the enthralment of 'Maya' and have an insight into the nature of God head and His absolute realm, it is only then that we have the taste of that eternal bliss which is Divine and free from the circumscribed functions of the physical senses and where there is no unwholesomeness of this mundane plane. There the five varieties of mutual relationship viz 'Santa', 'Dashya', 'Sakhya' 'Batsalya' and 'Madhoora are altogether wholesome and eternal. The threefold miseries of this mundane world due to birth, death, disease etc., have no place there. The realm of Vaikuntha is not lighted by the earthly sun, moon, stars, fire or lightning but is self-effulgent with the light of billions of original suns. There all are extremely happy in the service of that Divine Personality of all embracing knowledge and bliss, Srikrishna and all are there His eternal exclusive servants. Mundane sorrow has no place in the land of the eternal and those whose devotional eyes have been opened by the grace of Sri Gurudev can see with their help the eternal pastimes of Sri Krisrna in Vaikuntha. There Sanaka, Sanandan and all the Holy sages worship Sri Krishna as 'Para Brahma'. Raktaka, Patraka and other servants serve Him as Master. Sridama, Sudama, Vasudama and other cowherds tend Him as friend. Nanda and Jasomati serve Him as their Son. Sri mati Radhika, Lalita, Bishakha and other spiritual maids of Braja wholeheartedly serve Him as His eternal consorts.

It is devotion to the spiritual preceptor and no other method that can alone extricate us from the bondage of Vishnu-Maya and secure for us the eternal service of Sri Krishna in the eternal realm of Goloka, where Sri Krishna abides with His servitors and all His Divine Paraphernalia and eternal bliss which flows from the service of the Divinity.

The spiritual community of individuals possessing the higher life can have no organisation nor objecive that are definable in terms of limited, mundane relationship. Complete freedom of the individual is the distinguishing characteristic of such a society. In the spiritual community one individual is related to another exclusively by the bond of service. No one seeks to dominate over another. The humblest of servants possesses the highest natural authority which does not require to be defined and declared by any code of so-called written 'laws'. The pure heart instinctivly recognises the need and accepts the helping guidance of another pure heart in rendering unconditional, exclusive service to the common Master. The daiva varnasrama 'institution' thus consists of one varna or class viz., that of the spiritually disposed (Brahmanas).

It is irrelevant to oppose the arrangement on the ground that it possesses no apparent worldly utility nor even any tangible formulation of its own constitution. Its advocates never claim such demerits for the system. It is only the fleeting institutions promising deluding worldly advantages that strive mischievously to go against their inevitable mortal nature by the construction of shady dams and dykes which strangle them to assured death at the moment of the greatest transgression.

The great point that has to be borne in mind and which is to be honestly and consistently applied in practice in order to be able to enter into and continue the higher life is that the present worldly life with all its million tempting concerns has no positive value for our souls. In this world we can but be only usufructuaries of seeming possessions and we can never be real proprietors. If we choose to forget this fundamental condition of our usufructuarial position that it is not destined to become possessory we are punished for such wilful transgression by having to suffer all the evils of an unnatural position. The camp life of this world cannot be converted into the natural eternal life by any kind of modifications. Any plan that is directed to this wrong end is bound only to multiply the difficulties of a radically irrational existence The worldly life is a probationary period to test our fitness for being relieved of its necessity by the substantive tenure.

Every 'stable', 'organised' institution of this world tends to obscure the essentially unstable and dissolving nature of the concerns of this world and thus perpetuate our ignorance of the really stable and natural life whose very existence is perfection and which requires no artificial props and helps for its continuance or improvement. But if the experiment to live the eternal life delineated in the Scriptures be made by worldlings it is bound to end in Chaos. The impure mind cannot be made pure by merely disowning its salutary conventions. So long as the corrupt mind is not fully prepared to behave rationally in every way it is bound to find itself surrounded on every side by impassable barriers to all its activities.

The ideal is, therefore, not to be sought in the direction of a perpetuation of the slavary of untruth which is the real nature of the physical and mental expectation, but to recognise and try to learn and by learning remove the cause of the present miserable state. This is not pessimissm although a section of the materialistic philosophers are never tirred of dinning into our ears that it is so. The truly pessimistic attitude is one of despair regarding attainment of the higher life. The incurably pessimistic attitude is that which is not even prepared to admit the possible existence of any higher life that is categorically different from that of the average worldling.

The terribly silly cant that holds in eternal bondage the intellect of aspiring humanity is the familiar sibboleth of the conquest of Nature by man. The barren implications of this shallow mis-conception require to be fully laid bare before the world can agree to see things as they are. The pursuit of the wild goose must cease. It is not pessimistic to believe in this consummation. Dishonest speculation can never provide the remedy for the fell disease of worldliness and is for this very reason deliberately resolved not to recognise the disease itself. From this attitude it is only one step to begin to hug the disease.

Let us once for all get rid of the irrational perversity that prefers the bondage of untruth to the service of truth. The service of truth, indeed, always appears in its plain garb of service. The bondage of untruth presents itself as in the garb of mastery over Nature. The vain tiny intellect of man is impelled by its innate littleness to over-estimate its own magnitude. This constitutes the offence of of its rebellion against the Truth. The same impulse that leads it to go aganist the Truth induces it to accept the bondage of untruth by reason of its impotent and irrational desire for domination which is held out by the latter. Thus the hyprocritical and truly ignorant life is born and nursed to its destruction.

This tragedy must be properly realised we are really disposed to seek the Truth for the purpose of serving Him. Then and then only shall we be able to avoid the pitfalls that have been provided by the false prophets of worldliness to encompass our ruin. The Truth does not offer Himself to us for our passive acceptance. He offers us only His willing service. He has to be wooed and won. If we choose to be indifferent to Him He fights shy of us. We must not suppose that it is the business of the Truth to appear to us of His own accord and also make us recognize and welcome Him. This cannot be the attitude of service. It is the attitude of the master. Slavery is not the denial of mastery but of service. There can be but one Master because no one can serve more than one. The show of service that is rendered to many masters, as in this world is no service at all but slavery.

The seekers of 'freedom' also would go astray and end in slavery if they choose to prefer untruth to the Truth. It is worth every body's while to try to find out, that is to say to see the service of the real Truth. He who will not do so, will not earn 'freedom' but 'slavery' by his aversion to the Truth.

The only freedom is the service of the Truth, the service of godhead. It is necessary to realise this and to try seriously to find Him. It will not do to say that it is not possible to find the Truth. Any person who will deny the possibility of our being able to know the Absolute should be set down as the real enemy of the Truth and the only pessimist. No good can come out of the advice of such a person which is a counsel of despair. If we ever take notice of his warning it will be for the negative purpose of being on our guard against his specious fallacies.

One who is disposed to seek the Truth is led by the Truth Himself to His servant who alone can instruct him regarding the search. The truth cannot be found by any person who is not prepared to search for Him. So the novitiate under the spiritual guide who is no other than the servant of Godhead is the only method of finding the truth. One who repairs to the spiritual Guru for finding the Truth with the object of serving Him is admitted by the latter to the study of the Scriptures by the method of serving submission. In proportion as the disposition to serve the Truth manifests itself in the learner the meaning of the scriptures is realised. In other words it is not the information contained in the scriptures that is of value, but only the disposition that all the body of information inculcates. If and when the disposition is actively established the necessity for acquiring knowledge by any indirect method is eliminated. In the self-realised state there is no trace of ignorance which requires to be removed by the process of study.

When the disposition to serve the Truth fully manifests itself then and then only the Spiritual teacher is in a position to impart the Spiritual vision to the disciple. The Spiritual vision is thus closely associated with the dispositon to serve. The Spiritual vision cannot, indeed, be had except by grace. The disposition to serve implies this. Hence the necessity of Diksha or initiation by the Spiritual preceptor. But the Diksha should not be supposed to be a limited worldly process. It stands for the eternal and continuous necessity of grace by which alone our spiritual vision can be obtained and kept up. Diksha, therefore, belongs to the category of eternal entities and the substantive process is not really intelligible except to the initiated.

Diksha, therefore, marks the high-water level of spiritual pupilage to which the ceremony of upanayan seeks to introduce. Diksha is the higher process and implies upanyan as its preliminary. The disposition is the only thing that matters. The upanyan of a person after Diksha by the Pancharatra method brings out clearly this true meaning of the ceremony of investiture with the Holy thread. It demolishes the theory of seminal i.e. hereditary spiritual community. It puts the whole system into relationship with the spiritual guide by vindicating the supreme necessity of grace as the only sanction underlying all arrangements.

The student prior to his attainment of the grace of the spiritual preceptor in the form of Diksha has only a probationary status. The student who is admitted to the study of the scriptures after Diksha occupies the higher plane to which the probationer has no access. This makes the Daiksha Savitra ceremony categorically different from the Shoukra savitra. The second birth ceremony of one who has already attained his third birth is merely doing over again what has already been done before. The Daiksha Brahmana is alone entitled to perfrom direct spiritual service. The twice-born student who has received only the Savitra Sanskara by reason of his seminal birth is not entitled to the worship of Vishnu which is the only function of all Brahmanas. Finally the Savitra Sanskara on the strength of seminal birth permitted by some of the Grihya sutras and Dharmashastras, is forbidden in the Kali Age due to the degeneracy of the hereditary Brahmanas. The Diksha provided by the Pancharatra confers the tentative vision of spiritual service which is perfected by a course of training under the spiritual preceptor represented by the process to which the candidate for spiritual living is introduced by the savitra sanskara. This is the only dispensation authorised by the scriptures for the present controversial Age.

It is now possible to deal with the popular fallacy that one can be a Vaishnava without being a Brahmana. This castial view of Vaishnavism and Brahmanism requires to be discarded once for all if one is sincerely inclined to understand the true spirit of those institutions. The Brahmana is not a person of this world. The true Brahmana must be a constant and exclusive worshipper of Vishnu i. e., Vaishnava. The mere twice-born is not a Brahmana. The Brahmana is the Vaishnava in embryo. The Brahman is the disciple of the Vaishnava. But he is not entirely above all activities of this world as the latter is. The Brahmana has still got to discharge a duty to the secular society. This duty consists in instructing all classes of society in the principles of the Truth. This is the practical side of his discipleship under the Vaishnava preceptor. But all this also applies only to the spiritual or Daiksha Brahmana and not to the hereditary Brahmana who is not recognised by the scriptures as possessing the spiritual nature especially in the Kali Yuga. (To be continued)

At the lotus feet of the Divine Master.

1. I humbly greet My Master's feet
By this tribute of reverent joy ;
May he inspire The song that aspires
To tell of things he knows.

2. It is no idle dream But the Divine theme,
That wakens the sleeping soul ;
The Master's feet May alone admit
To the vision of the goal.

3. My very good friends, May you all extend
To me your right good will ;
That I may reach, By your helping wish,
The sight of the Master still.

4. And the glory sing Of his feet Divine
That are no mortal clay ;
So the Scriptures assure They ever appear
To those who pray.

5. The feet of my Master Are my only care :
May I never forget
By the Master's grace This knowledge may impress
As my soul's eternal quest.

6. It may seem so strange To this modern Age,
So antique and so stale,
That your right good will May not take it ill
If I choose this truth to tell.

7. My Kindest Master Is, indeed, no other
Than the servant of the Lord.
To serve his feet, Let us candidly admit,
Is to serve the Feet of God.

8. He is our Master Who is the bearer
Of the mercy of the Lord,—
To inform those Who pray to know
Their duty to their God.

9. Has the Lord no servant ?— Who dares assert ?—
Are we not agents of His will
The souls of men And all animation
Do His biddings still.

10. It is the Lord In the Forms of His Word
And Bearers of Divine command,
That one may know When Himself does show
The way by His Beloved.

11. This only Truth In very sooth
All Scriptures do declare :
That souls that serve Ever strive to live
In communion with one another.

12. So I humbly greet The Master's feet
By this tribute of praise ;
May he ever inspire The song that aspires
To tell the truth by grace.

Hinduism in Harmony with Buddhism

[By Dr. H. W. B. Moreno]

The writer follows Sankaras philosophy in his interpretation of Hinduism. There is a great resemblance between the methods of Buddha and Sankara. Neither the Buddhistic view nor that of Sankara attempts to describe the function of enlightened soul or the transcendental Personality and Activities of Godhead. In this sense both points of view may be regarded as essentialy speculative. Their special excellence consists in their masterly analysis of the deluding nature of mundane existence. Their analysis follows the direction of Vaishnava philosopy in a remarkable degree without, however, coinciding with it fully. The conclusions drawn by them from the analysis of relative existence are not accepted by the Vaishnavas in so far as they are incompatible with the eternal relationship of spiritual service that unites the pure soul to his Master and Beloved in the realm of the Absolute.

—Ed.]

In all Religions there is essentially harmony; for they go to make up the different chords that vibrate to the Music of the Divine. In Hinduism and Buddhism there is harmony more pronounced, more striking, than can at first be realised. After all, these two religions have arisen from a common source, the Vedas, or the Sacred Scriptures of the East. Buddha was a great Philosopher as was Sankara, the Teacher, who may have come centuries after. They both drank deep of the same Fountain of Wisdom; and each in his turn, gave a rich stream of knowledge to mankind.

To understand more fully the Philosophy of these Faiths we must probe the foundations of the two Religions. The essentials of Hinduism are: The Universe and all that is contained in it is illusion, falsity; that to understand this falsity (Maya) one must look for the Real that transcends the Unreal. This is achieved by meditation or concentration. The Reality is one, besides it there exists nothing, in the Universe (Sangshar). The state of bliss is achieved by the light of Wisdom, which is eternal rest and peace (Anamda). The three pathways to supernal bliss is by Good Works, in not looking for reward, either here or hereafter, by Devotion or Love, by True knowledge or Wisdom, which includes Meditation or Concentration.

In Buddhism these great principles are similarly outlined. In this world there is suffering. The Cause of Suffering is Desire. There is an Ending of Suffering and the way out of suffering. The way out or the Eight-fold Path consists of Right views, Right Intentions Right Speech, Right Conduct, Right Livelihood, Right Effort, Right Concentration, Right Rapture or Bliss. In seeking to explain these Truths, the greatest difficulty lies in the interpretation of the words used in Buddhism. Most of the Religions of the East suffer from a mistranslation of the words commonly used in them to embody certain principles ; hence it is very difficult to translate the Mahomedan salutation at meeting or parting "Salaam Alaikum" which is interpreted : "Peace be with you", "God's blessing rest on you", "May peace and safety be with you" and so on and as forth ; yet these translations convey only a fraction of the meaning found in the salutation. Again take the word "Maya". It is translated as illusion, Delusion, the falsity of the Universe around, yet not a single translation conveys the full significance of the term.

In Buddhism as well the word "suffering" (Dukkha) has more in it than is conveyed by the English translation. The knowledge of Suffering should mean, that the whole Universe is topsy-turvy, upside-down. We do not see things aright in this Universe. Like the rails on a track, which have been contorted, owing to some train having been wrecked on it, the rails are all awaya nd unlike the level parallels they were before. We see things all twisted and turned about ; this is what the Buddhist means when he speaks of Suffering. We suffer because things are all worng around us. Why do we suffer and go away ? Because Desire or Passion makes us so ; attachment to the world and its surroundings enmesh us in this Falsity and makes things appear to us real which are false. How similar is this to the theory of maya or illusion in Hinduism. Does not Desire for this Sanshar or Universe tie us to this Falsity ?

The Hindu in the outlining of his Philosophy states that the great Truth is to know the Real, who is one for all else is nought. So says the Buddhist, but in more elaborate language, enunciating his theory of definite principles. He holds that we must have right views of the things around us, which are false and unreal. We must then have right intentions to release ourselves from this bondage. We do this by right speech, by a right form of conduct and by a right manner of living. To attain to the One, we again need right effort and right concentration ; when we have so meditated we have right Rapture or Nirvana, which is a state of complete negation of all that is in the Universe ; it is the blowing out of all the flames of false desire and false knowledge. We then become the Buddha or enlightened. We are in Wisdom and in Bliss with the infinite. This is what the Hindu means when he says that by Good works, by Devotion or Love, by Divine wisdom we are in union with One Whom to know is to be.

There is one elaboration that has to be understood in Buddhism in relation to the true understanding of the One. Sankara, the Teacher, held thatto arrive at definite proposition, one had to deny that it belonged to anything that was within the bounds of human knowledge. "It is not, it is not, it is not," he says, (Neti, Neti, Neti,) to all you imagine that it is ; and when you have exhausted the list of attributes you advance and have received a denial for each one, you arrive at a glimpse of the Knowledge of the Infinite.

Buddha says, It is neither a fixed Reality nor an unalterable Entity ; but is always in flux. If It were fixed It would yet be conceivable as an Entity and comprehensible to human understanding. "It is not even a Reality", says Buddha, and leaves the bewildered mind, stupefied in amazement. It changes as all things change ; not for a moment can it be understood ; nor can the mind reach It in comprehension. Such a conception of the Infinite leaves again the mind staggered in amazement. Sankara, the Teacher's definition is elaborated to the summit of human intelligence. Buddha lifts us to the broad expense beyond, where the intelligence can only dimly look on what is below and gaze in wonder at the endless heights above. Both have their own methods of elaboration of the underlying principles ; Buddha, however, transcends what the human mind can scarcely reach or realise.

Is there not then harmony, deeper than we imagine in these two great Religion ? Indeed there is ; and the discord we find between the holders of each Faith is man-made and is, therefore, puny and pusillanimous. What is Divine lies in both Faiths and shows a unity that comes from above, beyond what narrow minds cling to in blind prejudice and error.

Taking Refuge in God.

LONGING FOR SERVICE.

(XII)

1. Gurudeva !
When will that day be mine !
When composing my mind Seated in seclusion,
The Name of Krishna I will sing.
The tumult of the world Will not penetrate the ear
And malady of body will keep afar.

2. As I say "Hara-Krishna", By chanting the song
Tears will flow in my eyes;
The horripilation of joy Will manifest on the body
And overwhelm with love.

3. Voice pressed at the throat Will issue from the mouth,
My body will tremble;
Sweating every moment Pallor will appear
And death-like stupor.

4. Oh ! When without guile, Such will be any state
I will constantly sing the Name !
Remaining pervaded within, Performing the functions of body,
I will gain thy mercy ;

(XIII)

1. Gurudeva !
When by the manifestation of thy mercy,
The Pastimes of Sri Gauranga Are eternal varieties
In this firm conviction,
Reciting the Name of Hari, 'Mid the garden of Godruma,
I will roam for their sight.

2. Nitai, Gauranga, Advaita, Sribas,
Gadadhar,——all five,
By the liquid sweetness of the Name of Krishna, Overflood the world,
Singing the high chant in unison.

3. The Pastime of dance, Playing on the Mridanga,
I will hear with my own ears ;
By the constant vision Of the Beauty of that Leela,
I will be borne on the flood-tide of love.

4. And presently again missing the sight Of the treasure of that Pastime
As I weep and cry aloud the Name of Gauranga,
The worldlings Proclaiming me mad
Will throw the dust at my body.

LONGING FOR REALISATION.

1. When in the wood-lands of Gaura By the bank of the celestial stream
With the cry of 'Oh Krishna, Oh Radha !'
Shall I roam weeping, Renouncing the pleasures of the body,
Under all diverse creepers and Trees ?

2. At the homes of the basest By begging I will feed,
Sip the water of the Saraswati,
From bank to bank I will roll on the ground
With the tumult of cry of Krishna ?

3. To the denizens of the Abode of God Making obeisance
I will beg for the trace of mercy :
With the particles of dust from the feet of the Vaishnabas
Anointing my body,
Assuming the garb of the wholly free ?

4. The denizens of Braja and Gauda I will not deem as different,
I will be a dweller of Braja ;—
Dhama's own beauty Will manifest to the eye,
I will be the handmaid of Radha !

Matters of Moment

Religion and State :—The democratic ideal of the state is based on the so-called common will of a people. As soon as the worldly advantages of co-operation are realised, number of individuals may tend to combine and form themselves into a community for securing such advantages. The State is one such association. The most distinguishing characteristic of the state is that it is closely connected with a particular country. This Geographical basis of the State renders practicable the provision of military and naval regulation and defence which cause general insecurity and warfares on a big scale. Any principle that is opposed to belligerent territorial patriotism and thereby tends to reduce the danger and evils of war is regarded by 'Statesmen' as opposed to the 'interests' of peace and progress, and, on that account, worthy of being hampered, discouraged and even altogether suppressed by the sheer brutal force of the community placed at the disposal of the State for promoting general well-being.

The services to humanity that are ordinarily claimed to have been rendered by the despotic territorial State ruling by brute force are as difficult to prove as any claim of utility on behalf of any other worldly institution. 'Statesmen' and 'anarchists' differ hopelessly on almost every point and it is impossible for the reason of man to decide on the issues.

Therefore, the argument that in consideration of the undoubtedly great services that are, and have been, rendered to man by the despotic territorial State its imperfections which are neither serious nor irremediable should not weaken the general loyalty of the people to the institution, need not produce a final and satisfactory conviction.

The object of religion is wider than that of the secular State. 'Statesmen' are so enamoured of the latter that they sometimes go even so far as to declare the very existence of religion as a menace to the safety of the State and accordingly to advocate the suppression of religion in the interests of the State. These 'Statesmen,' who are never tired of advertising their own toleration, liberalism and every other good quality would not like if any one in pursuance of the same logic have the hardihood of fighting them with their own weapons by advocating the wholesale suppression of the State on the ground of its being incompatible with the higher object of religion.

The subordination of the Church to the State is regarded by modern statecraft as sacrosanct in the interests of both. If A is subordinate to B there can of course be no want of unity in a world inhabited only by A and B. But can this unity be also in the interests of A in the same way as of B ?

The ideal of non intereference with religion once regarded by statesmen as the best theoretical policy is now considered as not always admissible even in theory. If religion do not interfere with the State in any way it is only then that the State may try to be indifferent to religion. But if State and Religion both claim our undivided allegiance, as they really do the theory of a policy of indifference at once breakes down. Those who favour the subordination of the Church to the State cannot indeed consistently oppose the virtual suppression of religious institutions. The alleged policy of the Bolshevic State is indeed, the logical outcome of the despotic State that seeks to regulate everything by its brutal force.

Jesus's attitude, 'Give unto Ceasar the things that belong to Ceasar and to God the things that belong to God' is somewhat similar to that of Sri Chaitanya Who desired to keep religion outside politics and did not relish the request of one of His followers, who had incurred the royal displeasure by squandering public money, to intercede with the king for his protection, remarking that as the culprit had actually misspent the royal treasure He should not interfere to prevent what He regarded as his just punishment. But in this case the king on being apprised of the intention of Sri Chaitanya to leave Puri where He was exposed to such requests from worldly people, in order to propitiate the Lord, set the culprit free not only without any punishment but rewarding him richly in order to make amends for the anxieties that a protege of the Lord had suffered at his hands. Sri Chaitanya apparently took the conduct of the king in a favourable light by agreeing to continue to reside at Puri.

We know that Christ was crucified by the State for teaching religious doctrines that were not to the liking of the popular teachers of current creeds. The State in this case asserted its authority in a matter that was purely religious being guided by the political motive of propitiating local opinion in employing its brute force against Jesus. King Pratapa Rudra was a devoted follower of Sri Chaitanya and was actuated in the instance mentioned above, by his reverence for the Lord Whom he believed to be God-head Himself. King Prataparudra's conduct shows a causeless deference to religion in a matter that was not apparently regarded as falling within the sphere of religion by Sri Chaitanya Himself. It was certainly logical conduct on the part of the king who believed the pleasure of the Lord as the supreme standard of all right conduct.

The authority of religion would appear to be certainly superior to that of politics on a consideration of the purely logical issue. The Absolute Truth is all-inclusive and as such is the only standard of perfectly rational conduct. The Absolute Truth cannot also for the same reason stand in the way of the real well-being of any person or institution. The Voice of Truth must always prevail over every other consideration including reasons of state. This is the theoretical position ; and its reasonableness should be potent to all unprejudiced minds.

The real difficulty arises in connection with the practical application of the principle. In this world we are hampered by the co-existence of a vast number of conflicting departments of knowledge. The knowledge is also of a highly specialized kind but admittedly imperfect and unsure. But it is allowed to serve at present as the rule of practical conduct at any rate in theory, in all spheres of worldly activity. Should all this knowledge be prevented from influencing our practical conduct ? Would not empiric knowledge run the risk of vistual suppression in practice if it be really subordinated to religion as representing the Absolute Truth ?

Is there any satisfactory way in which these apparently incompatible claims of theoretical necessity and practical difficulty may be reconciled ?

The political method that prevailed, till quite recently, in all Oriental countries, subordinated everything to religion by requiring the sanction of religion to the whole range of secular knowledge. But this domination of religion over the empiric sciences proved a fruitful source of difficulties in practice. For one thing religion seems to have set itself decisively to block the path of progressive scientific enquiry. Empiric science became a part of dogmatic religion and ceased to be alterable except by the method of stretching and twisting interpretations of the already exisiting texts. The difficulty was not cured by authoritative relaxations of the principle of regidity in praticular instances. Such attempt to solve the problem by the practical adoption of the principle of superiority of religion has bequeathed an after-crop of a multitude of well-known difficulties in our own country.

The Western Countries now almost unanimously seem to favour subordination of the Church to the State at least in regard to subjects of real controversy between the two. This is no doubt in flat opposition to theoretical consistency.

This method also has its practical drawbacks, especially in its application in the Orient where the people are traditionally sensitive in favour of religion and disposed to support the cause of religion against the State. The impending consequence of the adoption of the principle of subordination of Church to State in Western countries is anticipated by the alleged attempt to suppress religion by Bolshevic Russia and the growing anti-religious tendency among the masses of the people of Western Countries.

285. Lord Biswambhar went on his way in the company of His students ;
He looked like the full Moon surrounded by the stars.

286. He came to the home of a townsman and seated Himself at his door
There sat the Lord Whose Feet are implanted on the bosom of Lakshmi.

287. Tying up His cloth in the manner of a yogi
The Lord engaged in refuting and defending the Shatras.

288. The Lord said, 'He who lacks knowledge to conjoin alphabets
Is styled a Bhattacharya in this Iron Age !

289. 'Who has no knowledge of etymology approves the method of argument
There is indeed no one who may enlighten Me.

290. 'That which I refute, what I establish,
Is there one who may really alter the same for the better ?'

291. Biswambhar, Lord of the Universe, Spoke in this manner.
Who has power to answer His challenge ?

292. All the Professors used to repair to the Ganges for a light of the holy stream.
The pride of all was pounded to dust on hearing the challenge.

293. Who in Nabadwip had power To confront Biswambhar with any positive arguments ?

294. Under such Divine imposition Biswambhar expounded the Shastras.
And did not cease even when the evening had progressed by the hour.

295. The Lord happened to pass the door of another townsman
Where dwelt a worthy Brahman of great good fortune.

296. His name was Ratnagarbha Acharya of high renown,
The companion of the Lord's father and born in the same village.

297. His three sons who were even as bees clinging to Feet of Krishnachandra,
Were named Krishnananda, Jiva,
Jadunath Kavichandra

298. The good Brahman held the Bhagabat in the highest esteem
And read the Shlokas of the Bhaghbat with great affection—

299. 'Of a dark colour in yellow, in dancing costume
Decked mith garland of wild flowers, the peacock's feather, precious metal and pearl
With one of His hands resting on the shoulder of His chum and other plying with the lotus
His ears adorned with the lotus, His tresses clustering down either side of His face,
His lotus mouth lighted up with a smile.

300. He was reading this Shloka with devotion and feeling the highest satisfaction,
As the Sound of it reached the ears of the Lord,

301. He halted and by the power of listening to the utterance of Devotion.
The Lord bereft of all external consciousness and fell down in a swoon on the spot.

302. All the students were filled with amazement.
The Lord manifested His external conciousness after a short while,

303. After recovery Biswambhar still said, 'Speak on'
The Lord continued to roll on the ground.

304. The Lord told him to speak on and the good Brahman did the same.
There was manifested the occean of Krishna-bliss that steals the heart.

305. The earth was drenched with the tears of His eyes
Tears, shivering, horipilation, all these were well perceived.

306. The good Brahman observed His supreme joy.
And read shlokas treating of devotion with devotion seasoned with fuh.

307. On finding him practise reading with devotion
The Lord was much pleased and bestowed on him His embrace.

308. Having received the embrace of the Hero of Vaikuntha
Ratnagarbha was filled with loving devotion.

309. Ratnagarbha wept aloud clasping the Feet of the Lord
The Brahman was caught in the meshes of the love of Chaitanya.

310. He read the Shloka time and again in the ecstacy of love,
The Lord thundering His entreaty to him to go on.

311. A sense of wonder grew in all persons on beholding this.
At sight of the Lord all the citizens made obeisance.

312. 'Read no further' said Gadadhar.
All of them sat in a circle round Lord Biswambhar.

313. Lord Gour presently manifested His external conscionsness
The Lord constantly said, 'Tell Me, what it is ?'

314. 'What waywardness', said the Lord, 'did I commit ?'
The students replied, 'Thou art of perfect deeds.'

315. 'What may we say ? What power have we ?'
Friends prevented them,—'Do not indulge in praise.'

Ourselves.

His Divine Grace Paramhansa Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj—His Divine Grace who had been preaching the religion at Prayag for over a week left for Naimisharanya on the 30th of August. The party was accompanied by Srijukta Manomohan Sanyal, retired district and Sessions Judge. From Nimsar His Divine Grace and party proceeded to Bijnor on the 2nd of September. His Divine Grace left Bijnor on the 4th and after a short stay at Hardwar reached Dehradun on the 5th afternoon. His Divine Grace and party started from Dehradun on the 6th and arrived at Mussourie on the 7th in the morning. His Divine Grace returned to Calcutta on the 12th of September after a three weeks' tour in the United Provinces. Srijukta Manomohan Sanyal M. A., L. L. B, on being initiated into the Vaishnava life by the Grace of Srila Paramhansa Thakur accompanied His Divine Grace to the Gaudiya Math of Calcutta. His Divine Grace was received with great ovations by the leading gentlemen at all the places that have been sanctified by his auspicious visit.

Propaganda

In the Madras Presidency.—Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhaktiranjan Bhaktisar Maharaj accompanied by Pandit Sripad Ramananda Das Devasarma Vidyarnab and Sripad Haridhan Brahmachari visited the town of Tanku at the invitation of the local people. Sripad Vidyaranab Prabhu addressed a large meeti g convened at the town-Hall by the President of the local Hindu Sabha and other leading gentlemen. Panditji spoke in English for over two hours on the life and teachings of Sri Chaitanya. His Holiness Srimad Sar Moharaj Presided.

The advent of Thakur Bhaktivinode—The anniversary of the Advent of Thakur Bhaktivinode was celebrated at all the Maths on the 6th of September.

Visitors at the Gaudiya Math, Calcutta.—The following gentlemen paid their respects to His Divine Grace at the Gaudiya Math during the month of September. Srijukta Dhirendra Nath Sen, Shyamapada Bhattacharya M. A., Makhanlal Bandyopadhyaya M. A. B. L., Debendra Nath Mukhopadhyaya M. A. B. L., Rajarshi Srijukta Nafar Chandra Pal Choudhuri Bhaktibhusan, Srijukta Manoranjan Ghosh B. L., Pandit Sri Kshitish Chandra Sarkar M. A., Panchatirtha, Rai Bahadur Jaladhar Sen, Dakshinaranjan Ghose B. A., Venkat Rao Garu, Mrinal Kanti Ghose, Sitenath Tattwabhusan.

Srijut Mrinal Kanti Ghose informed His Divine Grace that it had been the heart's desire of Sisir Babu to build in Calcutta a suitable temple for the worship of Sri Chaitanyadeva. He said that Mahaprabhu had now brought about the fulfilment of His purpose through the agency of His Divine Grace. It will be, he said, a great solace to him and to all who desire to practise devotion to Sri Chaitanya to have this opportunity of serving the devotees of the Gaudiya Math as the Math-Buildings have been built close to their doors.

Principal Heramba Chandra Maitra.—Principal Heramba Chandra Maitra on learning about the activities of the Gaudiya Math from the lips of Sripad Sundaranand Vidyabenode, Editor of the Gaudiya, observed that Gaethe had extolled Christianity above all regions because he did not know that no religion in the world except that taught by Sri Chaitanya assures the complete well-being of the fallen. Christianity is divided on the question of the salvation of the sinner. Sri Chaitanya teaches us that the worst of sinners may attain the highest service of the Divinity by the causeless grace of Godhead. Chaitanya declares that Godhead does not pre-ordain eternal perdition as the lot of any sinner. But there have been very few persons who have paid proper attention to the teachings of Sri Chaitanya. Sri Chaitanya Himself confessed to Sri Advaita Prabhu that there was no customer in the market for His commodity. What rank immorality, Principal Maitra observed, is nowadays being passed off as the 'religion' of Sri Chaitanya. The Gaudiya Math is doing immense good by its attempt to revive the religion of the loving service of the Divinity taught by Sri Chaitanya in its really pure form.

Acceptance of Tridanda Sannyas.—Pandit Srijukta Ramendra Chandra Bhattacharya Vidyarnab, Bhaktishastri, B. A., received the favour of Tridanda sannyas at the feet of His Divine Grace Paramhansa Parivrajakacharya Sri Srimad Bhakti-sidhanta saraswati Goswami Maharaj on the the 24th of september. His Holiness has been awarded the scriptural designation of Srimad Bhakti Rakshaka Sridhar Maharaj in the Madhwa Gaudiya Sampradaya.

The Theistic Conference

THE Theistic conference was in session at the new Buildings of the Gaudiya Math at No. 16. Kaliprasad Chakravarty Street, Baghbazar, Calcutta, from October 24 to November 1. The date originally fixed for the conference had to be changed several times on account of unforeseen circumstances due to the present abnormal state of the country. This uncertainty stood in the way of many intending visitors from joining the conference in time. It will therefore, be necessary to have a supplementary session as soon as there is the needed improvement in the out-look of affairs of the country.

The address of the conveners referred to the above circumstance in suitable terms. It was, nevertheless, felt necessary to proceed with the conference for the purpose of trying to indicate in outline for guidance of supplementary sessions the positive nature of the business that is necessary to be handled by it and to test the suitability of the procedure that had been devised for the purpose.

The presidential address contains a brief reference to the procedure that had been finally adopted after the most careful consideration. In view of the immense scope of the business to be transacted and the necessarily limited amount of time that it was at all possible to allot for the purpose it had been decided to disallow all extempore speeches. In lieu of such speaking an attempt was made to elicit the considered opinions of persons of all denominations in the form of written statements by the circulation of a number of questions on the likely topics of discussion. These have been published in the previous issue of this journal. The answers received were next analysed for finding out the valuable suggestions for being dealt with in the conference. The Presidential address made it clear that it cannot be the intention of any bonafide preacher of the Absolute Truth to look for enlightenment from any quarter save the unbroken chain of of the spiritual teachers. Those who are on the track of the Absolute are self-surrendered souls who have no ambition of propounding any original suggestions of their own. Neither do they expect to obtain any accession to their knowledge of the Absolute from the speculative discussions of those who have not been enlightened by complete submission to the Absolute. The scriptures themselves, however, provide various methods for the benefit of those who are given to abstract speculation or desirous of improving the prospects of worldly living. In pursuance of this method of the scriptures acted upon by the former Acharyas it was decided to collect and analyse the independent individual opinions of speculative thinkers with a view to use them negatively in the exposition of the Absolute at the conference.

The preliminary address deals with the reason why the vision of the Absolute is not open to empirical speculation. It was stated that most of the answers received showed that the questions that had been circulated were not properly understood and that this was not unexpected. There was however, quite a large number of persons who had given their serious attention to the matter and had sent their real opinions which would be dealt with in their proper place in course of the discussions.

The difficulty of expressing the Absolute with the vocabulary at our disposal was also touched. The audience was assured that that difficulty is capable of being automatically solved in the measure in which any discourse could be really directed towards the Absolute. The vocabulary thereby acquires the proper significance and becomes a help and not a hindrance.

After this brief preliminary the business before the conference was formally commenced in the order laid down in the programme. This was done day by day from 7 to 9 P. M. for the nine successive evenings. All relevant points that had been raised in written answers to the questionnaire previously circulated from different quarters were referred to and dealt with as the treatment of the whole subject progressed in a systematic manner. This method of exposition of the subject left no question wholly untouched although the time that was available to the speaker was no more than a couple of hours for nine evenings.

The English translation of the preliminary address appears on a separate page. It is our intention to publish the English translation of the whole series of the discourses in due course in the pages of this journal.

THE Archan is the means by which all institutions of this world are enabled to participate in the service of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda by means of their worldly activities. But the Archan is not maintainable in its purity except by means of the Kirtan. Spiritual service is capable of being expressed in language. On the spiritual plane there is no qualitative or quantitative difference between one function and another like those that prevail on the phenomenal plane. There is distinctiveness without disruptive difference on the higher plane. There is simultaneous distinctiveness and non-distinction in all spiritual relationship. Spiritual language is therefore identical with the object expressed by it. In this world the language is symbolically expressive of an object, but never identical with the object. But this phenomenal world is a symbol of the spiritual world. Everything here symbolically means the absolute. The world is one immense volume which if read aright reveales the Absolute through its every letter. The Archan is symbolical of spiritual worship available in this world for those who have no proper access to the spiritual plane. But the Archan is not therefore wholly symbolical. It is the reality itself appearing as symbol for our benefit. The Archan is different from ordinary activities of this world, because it is directed to Godhead and is performed under the direction of the devotees and the scriptures.

But in Archan the holy Forms of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda do not in this Iron Age always hold actual communion with Their worshippers. It is the symbolic view that is available to the novice when he is graciously permitted by the devotees to perform the Archan. It is possible to hold actual communion with the devotees of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda. These latter are capable of communicating to us the tidings of of the spiritual world in an intelligible although symbolical form. They can tell us whether Sri Sri Radha-Govinda is actually pleased with us and also the right method of worship. They are in a position to inform us of this because they themselves are privileged to have the actual sight of the Absolute Reality.

The Kirtan is the manifestation of spiritual service by the devotees by means of spoken language. The Truth is pleased to appear in this world in the form of words spoken by his devotees. It is, therefore, necessary to listen attentively to the words of the devotees. In Archan also the worshipper communes with Godhead, by means of Scriptural language. In Archan the worshipper says in effect to the Lord, 'I am offering to you flowers etc. with humility for Your gracious acceptance of the same. I venture to make the offering by direction of your beloved devotee who knows Your wish to have it from me. But if one goes on saying so for eternity is it likely for the Lord to make any real response of His acceptance? There is no reason why the Lord will respond to such offering; or, rather, why the worshipper will be enabled by his symbolical activity to rise into the sphere of responsive service.

The Lord makes actual response to His true devotees. If the words of His devotees are listened to with the faith that they are identical with the words of the Lord Himself, one is thereby enabled to receive mediate communication from the Lord. If in his turn he can communicate what he hears from the devotees in words that are approved by them, he can thus be gradually enabled to hold conversation with the Lord symbolically and mediately. A person can thus be enabled in a way that is somewhat intelligible to communicate with the Lord. This symbolically responsive state is the highest level of service that is available by the grace of the devotees to the conditioned soul during his sojourn into this world. The fully responsive spiritual service of God-head is not attainable in the flesh.

The discourses and chants of the devotees, therefore, provide the only opportunity for conditioned souls for holding indirect communion with the Lord. The Archan is properly performed only if it be constantly kept alive by means of the Kirtan. The Gaudiya Math provides for the constant Kirtan of the Name, Form, Quality, Activity and the specific service of the devotees of Godhead. They are simultaneously distinct and identical and also inconceivable except by grace. The Kirtan thus constitutes the fundamental activity of the Gaudiya Math.

All activity of the Gaudiya Math emanates from His Divine Grace Paramahansa Srila Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj, the spiritual successor of Sri Rupa Goswami who was originally authorised by Sri Chaitanyadeva to explain the process of loving spiritual devotion for the benefit of all souls. The reality of the whole activity of the Gaudiya Math depends on the initiative of the Acharya. Sri Chaitanya Math of Sridham Mayapur reveals the source of the Gaudiya Math. The Acharya dwells eternally with the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya in His transcendental Abode in Sridham Mayapur, White Island of the Scriptures. From there the Acharya manifests his appearance on the mundane plane for the redemption of souls from the grip of the deluding energy and conferring on them loving devotion to the Feet of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda. The off-shoots of Sri Chaitanya Math are an extension of the centre of the bestowal of grace for the benefit of souls in all parts of the world. The recognition of the connection with Sridham Mayapur is vital for realising the true nature of the Gaudiya Math and the grace of the Acharya.

It is only the votaries (?) of indistinct and undifferentiated, concocted ideals of Godhead who are on principle unprepared to admit the reality of specific Divine realm and personality. The deluded worshipers of unknown and unrealisable Magnitude as Godhead (Brahma) suspect the reality of the worship of the holy Forms of the Divine Pair Sri Sri Radha-Govinda. They are not permitted to realise that the worship of the Divine Pair is identical with that of Sri Gaursundar under the guidance of Sri Nityananda in Sridham Mayapur. In Sri Chaitanya Math Sri Gaursundar manifests Himself as the Source of all His Energies who serve Him as Sri Sri Radha-Govinda by means of their reciprocal animation of the principle of free loving devotion apalogous to the spontaneous amour of lovelorn females for their only sweet heart.

Loving devotion to the Feet of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda is the fulfilment of the process of the true service of the Divinity. This is not comprehensible to our present understanding on account of our irrational affinity with temporary objects and interests. From our present standpoint we find it unprofitable and harmful to admit any form of actual specific subordination to Godhead. To avoid really and definitely obeying Godhead we become the votaries (?) of the un-known unknowable (?). Such a theory possesses the advantage, which we desire above every other thing, of leaving us free to do what we like. This freedom to follow our own liking is extolled by those who practise it as the highest form of service of the Divinity. It is contended that such freedom is the sole, self-sufficing, self-progressive guarantee of its own truth.

But a very little reflection should show all sincere souls the utter deceptiveness and hypocrisy of the whole position. Can it be described as a theistic attitude at all? Where is the admission in it of the superiority, or even existence, of Godhead apart from our ever-changing (not provably progressive) apparent self? The position commits us wholly to the mercy of our apparent self. The worship (?) of the un-known unknowable (Brahma) is for these reasons more repugnant to a theist than any form of avowed atheism.

There are diverse forms of atheism. The most easily comprehensible is that of refusal to admit anything as true except our present perception of the phenomenal world. This leads to the worship of the phenomenal world or select aspects or objects of it as Divinity. Atheism, idolatry, polytheism, pan-theism belong to one and the same category and are very closely interconnected. There is the sceptic who professes to doubt everything but does not find it convenient to act up to his profession and is, indeed, very fond of the things of this world under protest.

All these attitudes lie entirely off the spiritual plane. The bonafide spiritual sense always seeks a definite function that should be able to satisfy the real requirements of the higher self. It rejects as trivial and irrelevant all pursuit of ephemeral and irrational whims that spring from the fundamental defect of total absence of any hankering for the real Truth. But to every loyal nature the Truth unfolds Himself by spontaneous progressive revelation.

The realisations of the sincere seekers of the Truth are embodied in the spiritual literatures of the world. It is not possible for the conditioned soul to recognise the Truth even when He actually reveals Himself in the Scriptures. The reason of this is that the conditioned soul is necessarily insincere being constitutionally indisposed to receive the knowledge of the Truth from any extraneous source as sole authority. But one who is sincerely desirous of finding the Truth should not be anxious either to discard or accept any real help from any quarter. He should remain fully open to all possible, or even apparently impossible sources of enlightenment. The difficulty is in regard to those persons who are under the delusion that they are partially cognisant of the Truth. But fortunately the most distant glimmering of the Absolute happens to possess the nature of the Absolute. The whole experience of the Absolute from its first beginning is characterised by fullness of knowledge without shutting out the process of progressive revelation. The Truth carries with Him His own light by which He reveals Himself to our vision. He is self luminous. He cannot be seen except by means of His own light. He cannot be seen by any of the faculties of our dwarf consciousness. These faculties are made by grace to see what they are constitutionally incapable of seeing independently. The Truth is both the seen and seeing. It is as if one person could communicate his own vision to another without losing the same himself, retaining the option of recalling the gift at his will. The conditioned soul is anxious to see with his own eyes. He is satisfied with whatever he sees by their means. He has no hankering for seeing the truth unless it is possible to do so through his own eyes by his own desire. He may be willing at times to be helped but not to be perfectly helped. He wants to retain his own vision and desires only an extension of the same process along lines that are liked by himself. This he regards as his individuality and he values this above every thing else. The loss or modification of this supposed individuality appears to him to be identical with self-destruction.

In other words the consistent mentalist is constitutionally opposed to acceptance of the Truth by the only method viz. by the unreserved recognition of his own utter ineligibility for understanding the same. Such humility can arise only in the heart that has a spontaneous irresistible hankering for the Truth. This humility cannot be produced by any amount of mental cogitation. It may be present in the dullest mind and be absent in one who may possess the most agile mind. It is not all mentality but the superficial disposition that is in love with itself which refuses to be put down by the Truth. The mentalist, one who sets all store by the achievements of the mind, cannot comprehend the tragic condition in which he is placed by his sole dependence on the mind in his quest of the Truth.

It is necessary to stop this supercilliousness of the mind before we are in a position to lend our soul's ear to the voice of the Truth, content to receive the enlightenment ab initio from the Source Himself. If the mind is disposed, by the controlling power of the soul awakened to the consciousness of his own real nature by the grace of the Acharya to admit the initiative of the Truth and to follow closely the progress of the process of enlightenment with his receptive faculties he finds himself insensibly and without his own synthetic effort, raised to the transcendental level of the spiritual function, by the gradual amelioration of his grosser proclivities. But although the mind undergoes this elevation it is at a loss to communicate its new experience to other minds that have not been similarly raised to the higher level. The new vision cannot be communicated properly by the old vocabulary and there is as yet no other suitable medium that is available to it for the purpose. As a matter of fact the enlightened mind itself can have only a symbolic view of the Truth Whom it can accordingly describe in symbolical language to others who are not too dense or too perverse to receive the tidings with all necessary reservation of such communication.

The present treatment of the subject is symbolical in the above sense. It is the symbolical description of a symbolical realisation. The writer does not claim to understand more than has been made available to him by the grace of the Acharya. He can really express nothing regarding the Truth even symbolically except by grace. But he can also communicate his imperfect experience, without being misunderstood, only to those who are prepared faithfully to accept the reservations of the position in trying to formulate any judgement regarding the same.

The first view of the Truth as He reveals Himself slowly to the awakened soul is that of a person, a male Figure, attended by other male figures. This is the first positive spiritual experience. The supreme Person is symbolically seen in the actual figure of a person resembling any persons of this world who are in the physical body. The servitors of the Divine person are found to be of a different colour and clad in a different garb. The vision itself is, however, different from any vision up till then available through the physical organ of sight. The difference consists in this that the vision automatically dispels all ignorance and worldly desire.

Presidential Address.

By Divine Grace Paramahansa Paribrajakacharya Sri Srimad Bhakti Sidhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj.

Time—7 9 P.M. Oct. 24, 1930.

Place—Natyamandir of Sri Gaudiya Math.

Lord Chaitanya is the combined Personality of the Predominating and Predominated Moities of the Absolute. We, individual souls, are endowed with a mixed aptitude. Our consciousness possesses a two-fold potentiality. It takes cognisance of the material categories. It is open to the influence of the spiritual, as distinguished from the mundane. Lord Chaitanya is our only support and the source of our animation. He is the only Object of our worship. As a matter of fact every activity of ours owes its possibility and existence to His initiative and as the corrollaries of his Activities. Lord Chaitanya displays the pastime of seeking Himself. All through His Manifestation He is found most anxiously devoted to the exclusive quest of the Absolute Godhead, His Predominating Moiety, viz Krishna. We, His eternal proteges, are conditioned to follow His lead in this matter. If we do so we shall be doing the right thing. By doing so we would obtain the knowledge of the realm of the Absolute. We would no longer have to remain penned within the narrow material scope of three dimensions.

But we are hampered by our mixed aptitude. We have the option of meddling with the material as well as the spiritual. As soon as we indulge this mixed aptitude by mistaking it to be our real function we are obstructed by the process. We find ourselves forthwith subjected more or less to the handicaps of insurmountable disqualifications. These disqualifications have been analysed and classified into four groups. They are liabilities to (1) blunder, (2) inadvertance, (3) deception, and (4) grossness of the senses. These are very serious defects. They make it impossible for us to obtain even a glimpse of the transcendental. Hence there arises the imperative necessity of seeking the help of those who are free from those defects.

Our present sense-function does not give us any knowledge of the whole Truth. On the contrary it always keeps us away from the Full, the Eternal, the Blissful. We are prevented from all access to uninterrupted existence, uninterrupted knowledge and uninterrupted bliss. These constitute the Reality. But we can find no method of approaching this Reality by the exercise of our present faculties. We obtain instead the so-called knowledge of the things of this world. We perceive only matter. We can imagine the condition of material negation. But neither of these is the Reality proper. We cannot avoid the consideration of distinctions. But it is not possible to entertain any proposition regarding distinctive entities except on the plane of the four-fold defects mentioned above. It is, however, incumbent on us to try to be perfectly free from those defects. The method based on sense-experience is useless for this end. It can never free us from those defects.

Those who live on the resources of the mind express themselves in language. The vocabulary used by them is more or less defective and mutually conflicting. The experience of the moment is different from true experience. We try to gain admission in the realm of true experience. We desire to make progress in such experience. It is our purpose thereby to gain the love of the Real Entity. This is the supreme desideratum.

We are now interested in the acquisition of all kinds of worldly facilities. We find it useful to study those sciences that deal with objects that we require. But we need not remain confined to such investigations. We are fit to be attracted also by the science of super-mundane reality. We are attracted by One who is existence, knowledge and bliss. He attracts us in different degrees. He has given us the fitness to be attracted in different measures. We are subject to His attraction. We can endeavour to attain to the realisation of the science of reality to the extent of His attraction. There are many persons who are not exclusively engrossed in the acquisition of worldly facilities. Many wish to progress in the direction of the supreme function, the supreme facility, the supreme object of desire, the supreme position which frees from all illusion. Different persons try to do so in different degrees. The language of a person is affected by the progress that he makes. It progresses towards the spiritual realm in the proportion of his advance. Such a person can respond to question regarding the supreme desideratum in the proper spirit. We formulated a number of questions on the subject. We approached those persons who are spiritually inclined with those questions. We hoped for reasonable response from them.

Persons who are possessed of mixed aptitude are always subject to the fourfold defect. Such is the condition of all those persons who set a store by worldly facility. The quest after Krishna is free from the fourfold defect. Persons with the mixed aptitude can know nothing of such quest. we also know this. But we nevertheless cherish the inclination to approach them We want to be enlightened in our quest of the truth by the positive as well as negative method. We had sought this contact with the spiritually inclined as we know that we shall be gainers by such contact. Such contact helps in our quest of Krishna which is based on the analytic and syntheti methods. It is our greatest desire to succeed in the quest.

We know that such procedure has also its difficulties. The mixed aptitude is really opposed to the quest of the truth. It is opposed to absolute emancipation, to the supreme function, the supreme need and the supreme desideratum. Its nature as well as its languages are equally opposed to the quest of the truth. They are bound to try to baffle our purpose. We know this. We also knew that all this notwithstanding, there is no objection to contact with an entity that is so hostile to our purpose. We intended to accept that portion from it which is our due.

There are non-spiritual Puranas, non-spiritual Pancharatras and non-spiritual philosophical systems and non-spiritual Dharmashastras. All these are full of varieties of injunctions in the midst of narratives of use-ful and harmful activities. But they also contain much instruction for the propagation of real good and suppression of evil. The great sages of old times also studied those works. They were not thereby prevented from attaining the object of their desire. We have felt assured by the knowledge of this fact.

Our purpose is to search for Krishna. We have to consider in this connection two subjects, viz (1) 'Krishna' and (2) 'His Search !'

The word 'Krishna' has an ordinary meaning which is intelligible to all of us. This meaning is supported by History and the conditioned intellect of man. This meaning leaves us ignorant of the truth. We shall not accept this meaning. On the contrary we shall know the real, indivisible Truth Himself. There is a meaning of the word which can enlighten us regarding the Truth. The ordinary-meaning of the word 'Krishna' is an entity which is different from Krishna. It is something that is enveloped by the deluding energy of Krishna. It is an object which is comprehensible to the other gross senses besides the ear. It is a product of our sensuous perception. We shall not defile the word Krishna by accepting this meaning.

All the different languages derived from Brahmi, Kharausti, Shanki and Puskarasadi, etc., which are their sources, possess a variety ofwords. Mankind assert their knowledge gained through the senses by means of these words. They are guided by the secondary meaning. They are more or less indifferent to the primary meaning of those words. Such desire to target any visible object of this world by means of such words we know to be opposed to the supreme desideratum. There are different words in the different languages to signify the real Truth. These words are the products of intellectual speculation. They point to the Truth. But all those terms are subject to knowledge gained through the senses. Therefore they are entities limited by three dimensions. None of those terms can attain to the level of the transcendental entity.

The word 'Krishna' points to the real Truth. The real Truth is not identical with the secondary meaning of Himself. The word 'Krishna' is not used to convey any allegorical sense. The word 'Krishna' uttered by the soul desirous of the supreme desideratum, cannot accommodate the meaning that is productive of ignorance. The meaning of words is narrowed by the eye, the nose, the tongue, the skin and the mind. This narrow meaning expresses objects other than Brahma (the great, undefined, nourishing Principle), Paramatma (the Supreme Soul), or Bhagaban (the Supreme Person possessed of all power). The word 'Krishna' points to no such narrow meaning. Such words as 'adhokhshaja' (transcendental), 'aprakrita' (non-mundane) and 'atindriya' (supersensuous) etc., are the products of negative speculation. By their means it is possible to draw a picture that exists only in the imagination of man. Such performances are different from the real Truth. They retain the power of producing ignorance, which makes them different from the Truth. The adulterated quality of physical space affects such words. They are hereby separated from the real Entity. They contribute to the elaboration of that Entity by the conceptions of the relative and the numerical. The Brihadaranyaka speaks of addition, subtraction, multiplication and division of the complete whole. But those processes do not destroy the unity of the Whole.

All diversity exists by the divisions of object and subject. Mental speculation is based on preference for absence of all distinction. Mental speculation fulfils itself by this distinctive achievement. There is no possibility of the elimination of the triple limiting envelope by its means. The Truth of the Divinity has His existence in the indivisible cognitive principle. Therefore

He does not obstruct the enlightening process of words. The modes of investigation represented by the schools that worship Rudra and Brahmma respectively, express a gross kind of difference from the mode of the Vaishnavas Such procedure is obstructive of indivisible knowledge. It is necessary to consider these speculations with thoughness and with a dispassionate mind. If we do not do so there will arise a variety of obstacles in regard to object of meditation, the meditator and the process of meditation. It is necessary to try to remove these obstacles. It is necessary to get rid of them parmanently. It is not reasonable to depend on eclipsed knowledge for the purpose of temporary relief. The Sun moves in its course in space in due order of time. If the Sun is worshipped the object of our worship is an obstacle to our indivisible knowledge. It is not possible to acquaint a person with the nature of the word 'Krishna' by means of language that is conditioned by the triple quality of the phenomenal world. The Name 'Krishna' is identical with the Possesser of the Name. The word 'Krisana' is identical with the Object expressed by the same. Yet the two are also inconceivably distinct from One Another. It is necessary to be able to realise the true nature of this inconceivable simultaneous difference and non-difference. Till we are in a position to realise it, our week speculation can never enable us to understand the distinctiveness of the inconceivable.

The word 'quest' requires to merge in the significance of progressive realisation. Till then the object of quest is allowed to drift away on the tide of unchecked imagination. It does not become available for the practice of the process of real quest. It is necessary to attain apprehension of the real object of quest. On the attainment of such apprehension the seeker of the Truth feels himself under His protection. When this is so the process of quest no longer goes astray from indivisible Knowledge Who is Vasudeva. Then also the process of quest looses its difference from the activity of realisation. The process of quest involves the clear apprehension of relationship with the object of search. It is this which in the subsequent stage becomes known as Bhakti of the stage of endeavour. It is Bhakti which supplies us with the clue to the love of Hari. Love of Hari is the complete, constant and exclusive activity of realisation. Love of Hari is realised as the one thing needful.

There are many obstacles in the way of the search of the Truth. Those obstacles serve to eclipse the real nature of the seeker of the Truth, of the search and of the object of search. It is the enlightening potency of words which alone is able to destroy all those obstacles. Therefore it is only when the ephemeral manifestation of the deluding potency of words is resolved into their enlightening function that it does not allow the individul soul to become severed from the indivisible knowledge, the supremely true Entity. It also does not promote the perversion of the oneness of the cognitive principle. On the contrary it teas up by the root the blunder of the speculative theory of undifferentiated cognition. Sri Chaitanyadeba is this oneness of the subject and object of the indivisible knowledge. Nityananda is the manifestation of this oneness. He is the manifesting aspect of the indivisible knowledge Himself. These Two are like the Sun and the Moon. They reveal the cognitive potency of the spiritual eye of the individual soul. Bhakti bestows the quality of oneness and love of Krishna. These two potencies of bestowing oneness and producing the pleasure of the indivisible knowledge are located in Sri Chaitanya.

In this world we construct various structures by means of our cognitive and active sense-organs. Among these sense-organs the organ of speech is the parent of the hearing of sound. The organ of speech may not be wholly established in the line of the heard transcendental sound. In such a case there will appear conflict with the heard Divine Sound, which leads astray the other four senses. This is to be distinguished from words free from all limitation realisable by considerations of the true nature of sound manifestation. The word that is free from all limitation removes the obstructive filth that blocks the path of the auricular cavity. It dissipates the limited perceptual word. By such operation the path of transcendental hearing is not prejudicially affected. There is a ten-fold process of rectifying the defects of the physical body produced by semen in the mother's womb. This satisfies the speculative function of the mind. By such purificatory process our sensuous knowledge is enriched. It may produce indifference to indivisible transcendental knowledge. In such case it mistakes entities possessing relationship with Godhead for things of this phenomenal world. Under such misapprehension it may renounce such entities by the deluding power of the real entity leading them away from the truth and making them place more reliance upon the nonspiritual reflection of the realm of true cognition.

There is need for me to say all this at the outset of the discussions that are to follow. I have, however, no intention of disturbing the method of mundane speculation. On the contrary I have made this submission with the good intention of enriching that method. I have ventured to make this statement knowing that the stream of the influence of your mercy is ever showered upon my slender serving propensity. I ask for your blessing that I may be unsolicitous of honours for myself, may offer due respect to all, may be humbler by far than even a blade of grass and more forbearing than even the tree; and being so, and remaining eternally and firmly established in the service of Sri Chaintanya, may I perform the Kirtan with the knowledge that the Name of Godhead is identical with Godhead Himself. I do not pray for any other blessing from any one.

The Festival of the Peak of Food

The festival of the Peak of Food was celebrated in the new Buildings of the Gaudiya Math on the 22nd of October. An immense variety of the choicest kinds of food in vast quantity was offered to the supreme Lord on the occasion. The remains of the Lord's meal were then distributed among all the people. The most well-to-do persons competed for a particle of the Mahaprosad (the great favour) on this most auspicious occasion.

The offering of the Peak of Food is essentially different both as regards its object and procedure from poor-feeding. Feeding of the poor has for its object the appeasement of hunger of those who are in want of food This is a meritorious form of activity and has its advantages if it be considered from the point of view of the material and moral well-being of society. It is not our purpose here to go into that subject. It will suffice to observe that the object as well as the method of "feeding the poor' refer exclusively to the temporary amelioration of the physical and mental state of the persons who are fed. The relief sought and offered is limited and questionable.

The offering of the Peak of Food to the Supreme Lord is not inspired by any considerations of mental or physical well-being. It is a performance on the plane of the soul who is free from all physical and mental wants and defects. Those who do not believe in the soul and spiritual activity will not, therefore, be able to understand or sympathise with the principles of the devotional function. If they try to abbreviate it from the utilitarian point of view they will commit blunders for which they should thank only themselves.

The institution is the revival of a practice established by Sri Madhabendra Puri when he organised the worship of Gopala (Boy-Krishna) at the Mount of Gobardhan. Madhabendra Puripad was a Tridandi Sannyasin of the order of Sri Madhvacharya. He was directed by the Divine Child in a dream to establish His worship. The Holy Form was according to this direction recovered from a grove in the midst of the dense forest and the inhabitants of the surrounding villages were invited to undertake to arrange the regular daily service of the Lord.

Gopal had told Madhab that He was indeed very hungry and had been looking forward to the day when Madhab would make his appearance for relieving His hunger. Acting on this suggestion Madhab told the villagers to make the offering of a Peak of Food to Gopala on the occasion of the installation of the holy form in the Temple which was hastily made by putting a few blocks of stone The response to the Madhab's invitation was marvellous. All the people of the surrounding country came with their offerings. Every variety of food was quickly prepared on an immense scale and offered to the Lord. The supreme Lord was so hungry that he ate up all the food with the greatest satisfaction. But this was seen only by Madhab. Others could not see this because the touch of the Lord's hand, as He ate the food, restored the piles as soon as they were eaten up.

The remains of the meal were distributed among the people. The villagers thereupon undertook to continue the forms of worship thus initiated by Madhab. The inhabitants of each separate village taking upon themselves to provide the offering of food for each day in succession, the offering of the Peak of Food continued daily.

In the code of devotion there is no place for appeasement of the hunger of the worshipper. Bodily needs are completely ignored for the reason that the soul who alone can worship Gopala, is wholly free from all bodily cravings and infirmites. The acceptance of the remains of the Lord's meal by the devotee is not an act of eating for the appeasement of hunger but the reverential acceptance by the soul of the favour of the Lord. The soul has no want of his own. It is his nature to desire perpetually to please the Supreme Lord by means of all his faculties. The Lord is pleased to accept the homage of the soul. There is no question of want in the unwholesome mundane sense in such affair. It would be sacriligious to seek to find the idea of bodily hunger in devotional activity.

In this spirit, the remains of the Lord's meal are honoured by his devotees. There is no question of rich and poor, hunger or thirst. The quality of the food as food does not interest the devotee. The Lords remain is his great favour. It is not food that can be eaten. It is no longer any earthly eatable. It is a spiritual entity. It is an object of worship. It is served with the tongue. It is not eaten for the appeasement of hunger or for the gratification of the palate. If it is served in this manner it rewards its votary by relieving him from the clutches of all sensuous appetites.

If the question is nevertheless asked why the remains of the Lord's meal should be regarded as a spiritual entity? The answer is that it is so laid down in the scriptures. It is not possible for conditioned souls like ourselves to worship the Lord on the plane of the soul. The Lord is merciful. He accepts our offerings which are things of this world when they are offered to Him. But His acceptance of them makes them acquire the spiriritual quality. He accepts the offering of food for the purpose of favouring His devotee. The devotee also in his turn accepts the favour of the Lord with submission and respect and distributes this favour among all the servants of the Lord.

This affords a chance for the conditioned soul to avoid the function of eating and drinking. The act of eating and drinking is the root-cause of all sensuousness. It is necessary to control this function if one is anxious for the regulation of his sensuous appetites. The clamorous demands of the senses make it impossible for the conditioned soul to attend to the needs of himself. The act of eating and drinking cannot, however, be got rid of altogether. So the Shastras counsel the practice of moderation. They tell us to avoid indulging the palate. It is only the simplest kinds of food that do not unduly excite the palate that are recommended for those who desire to acquire proper control over the senses.

But no arrangement can undo the consequences of eating and drinking which is a sensuous act and is bound to re-act on the senses by way of stimulation. This stimulation will be mild if one practises plain living. But certain reliance can really be placed on the method. It is found that no form of eating can wean us from the state of sensuousness in the long run. The person who lives on the simplest of food may in a moment of temptation launch on a career of the modest dissipation. Such re-action is by no means rare and is a part and parcel of the law of Nature. The sensuous appetite grows by indulgence as also by the practice of enforced self denial. The senses may be artificially brought under one's seeming control for the time being. But no manipulation of food and drink can produce a lasting and natural disinclination to sensuousness. It is beyond the power of any object of this world to do any thing but augment the tendency to sensuousness. The abstemious method involves the sure risk of a violent reaction in no distant future. Such artificial treatment only serves to aggravate the malady. The method of regulated living is nevertheless of value as it serves to keep the appetite within bounds and postulates a desire for salutary control of the senses.

The method of eating plain and bland food is recommended by the scriptures for producing a habitual disposition in favour of total abstinence. But the goal of total abstinence cannot really be re.acted by the method itself. There is a process by which the object of regulated eating is properly realised. This process is no other than that of honouring the remains of the Lord's meal.

The food must not be taken for any earthly purpose. For example it must not be eaten for the purpose of nourishing the body or the mind. It must not be taken even for the purpose of maintaining life. It is not the act of eating in itself which is really the cause of bodily or mental health or preservation of life. Had it been so there would have been no loss of health or life. No manner of regulation of the process of eating can prolong either health or life to eternity. These processes operate successfully only so long as it is the desire of Krishna that they should. This underlying and real cause of all well-being is stubbornly overlooked by most people in practice, although all of us admit the operation of the Divine Will in theory.

The attitude that chooses to regard the act of eating as a necessity which is mechanically productive of good result by means of a little intelligent regulation, misses the real object of the activity. Such attitude tends to confirm us in the atheistic outlook which may at first be adopted through sheer thoughtlessness. The connection with Krishna must not be overlooked. Nay, the process of eating must be actually regulated in such a way that it may help us to be confirmed in the theistic attitude.

This can be attempted with or without the consciously received help of Krishna. But it is necessary to realise His constant and conscious connection. It is also possible to do so. As soon as this connection is properly realised the act of eating automatically ceases to be a sensuous operation involving sensuous consequences. The recollection of our relationship with Krishna in every act however trivial is the only method of getting rid of its mundane consequences. This is not contrary to our present experience. If no result can be produced except by the will of the Divinity the eternity and self-sufficiency of the causal principle need not be admitted.

At this point the value and necessity of scriptural testimony becomes of positive help. Is it really the desire of Krishna that we should adopt a particular method and should attempt thereby to realise the ideal of our conditional existence. The scriptures claim to be the Word of godhead. It is, of course, open to us to accept or reject this claim of the scriptures.

It is the function of the devotees who are privileged to realise the truth of the scriptural claim to try to produce the same conviction in us. As soon as we pay our serious attention to the teaching of real Sadhus we find that it has power to solve all our doubts and difficulties by making the knowledge of the real Truth available to us. It is by the grace of the servants of the Supreme Lord that we learn to realise the connection with Krishna in every act of our ordinary worldly life. As soon as this connection is consciously realised we are relieved for good from the evil consequences of sensuous living.

The ceremony of the offering of the Peak of Food to the Supreme Lord emphasises the necessity of the universal adoption of the spiritual process to be enabled in our individual as well as communal intercourse to carry out in a conscious way the Will of Krishna. There cannot be a greater Divine Mercy than this. The remains of the Lord's meal are, therefore, appropriately named Mahaprosad or the great favour.

But this great favour itself is made available to us only by the even greater mercy of the servants of the Lord. The Lord does not accept any offering that is made by one who does not possess the perfectly pure heart which is the free from the least taint of self-seeking. In other words the Supreme Lord only accepts the offering made by His devotees.

The Acharya is the best of devotees. By the acceptance of the Acharya any offering is rendered fit for the Lord's acceptance. By accepting from the people their offering of the Peak of Food to the Supreme Lord the Acharya affords all persons a chance of learning to make the offering to the Lord with a pure heart by associating them in his service of the Lord. By the distribution of the remains of the Lord's meal among all persons the Acharya enables all associated worshippers to attain to the level of doing real good to all animate beings. This is the real significance of the ceremony of the Supreme Lord originally instituted by offering of the Peak of Food to the the grace of Srila Madhabendra Puri.

Who Am I?

(Sripad Jagaduddharan Dasadhikari B.A.)

The Word 'I' refers to the Speaker before us or the first person in our cognisance. The 'I' is generally identified with bodily figure of the speaker. In our attempts for identification virtually we cannot and, as a matter of fact, do not ordinarily go beyond the bodily form and make, the stature, the colour together with any distinguishing mark or marks the body of the speaker might have got, his sex, locality nationality, mentality, parentage, learning and other acquisitions, profession and also any relationship in which the speaker stands to us.

If we stretch the definition to its furthest scope generally conceivable to us we might also point to the idiosyncrasies of the speaker and the impression he has created in us, in so far as he might have come in actual contact with us. All these ideas that we form of the speaker are applied to the external mind and body of the speaker, the modalities or manners and circumstances in which he came under our purview for the time being we took cognisance. Making allowances as far as desired of the speaker for the changes he underwent in the past or may undergo in future or for innumerable other actions he can follow up and natures he can display in thousand other circumstances in all the times he is destined to live in his present bodily form, he can not ordinarily carry our ideas of him wholly beyond the bodily form and co-ordinated mind he has got and their relation to the phenomenal world he lives in.

Nature of the speaker

But this identification of the 'I', that the speaker represents is too narrow and too shifting and his quest for the real "I" is likely to be baffled if he is seriously inclined to cling to such hasty and erroneous presumption. All these we mean or presume are but the present temporary adjuncts of the speaker, while his "I" is their proprietor. In common language we refer to properties by a possessive inflexion of the nominative, the proprietor. The properties are never supposed to be identical with the proprietor and the proprietor is certainly different from his properties. The properties should be absolutely under the proprietor's disposal and he should be able, at his free choice at any time, to relinquish some or all of those properties and assume or acquire others. The will of the proprietor in so doing should not be liable to be affected or regulated in any way by an independent or contrary wish of the properties. Thus from our considered idea of "I" all those or such other properties should be altogether eliminated.

Proprietor and Properties

The property is in this case mortal and temporary. It can exist in relationship with or in possession of the proprietor only for a specified period—say, a hundred years. But the proprietor is also supposed to survive the dispossession of his present properties. At the time of death the connection of the proprietor with these properties ceases. Then the body cannot move, the bodily organs of senses cannot work any more and they are soon decayed. But the proprietor perchance takes possession of other properties that he may find in his altered circumstances. This inevitable fact of the periodical dispossession of the proprietor is described in the Geeta in the following Shloka :—

Nature and value of the properties.

वासांसि जीर्णानि यथा विहाय नवानि गृह्णाति नरोऽपराणि ।
तथा शरीराणि विहाय जीर्णान्यन्यानि संयाति नवानि देही ॥

Just as a man may leave off his old or tattered pieces of cloth and put on new and fresh ones, so the proprietor (देही) of bodily properties (शरीराणि) giving up his worn-out coverings takes up new bodies in their stead.

The fact of death is no more than analogous to a change of apparel. Thus an analysis directed exclusively to the bodily form and external properties and co ordinated mind cannot lead to the proper identification of the "I" who is realisable as their proprietor.

Now, the speaker appears before me in Calcutta and says to me with every assurance, "I am here" and I also see his form before my very eyes whose testimony I, of course, believe, most naturally. But the next moment he falls asleep in my presence and on awakening tells me, "I had just been to London and was taking a walk on the bank of the Thames with several of my friends I made during my stay there." The next moment the speaker seems to be a little absent-minded and does not respond to my call and presently stirts up and says with a deep sigh, "I was just thinking of my son who is at Bombay engaged in some business; hence I was not aware of your calling me."

Who speakes ?

The "I" of the speaker is not evidently confined to the bodily coil, his gross material posssession but may appear to refer perhaps to the mind of the speaker which lies beyond the gross material and which cannot be directly perceived by our eyes or other senses. The physical body can only work in concert or in co-operation with mind without which the body is not able to take any initiative.

Is mind the proprietor ?

In this twentieth century we are accustomed to ordinarily accept the mind as the possessor of the body. But a question may at the same time, crop up as to what respectively the material body and mind really are.

(1) What is body? (2) What is mind?

We get a tiny bodily form at our birth. We grow up to certain dimensions. Then the growth stops. Finally we have to leave this mortal coil at the time of death. Before birth we were evidently not where we are at present and where we apparently cease to exist after death. Thus we possess the physical body and mind only in the intervening position and time but neither before, nor after this limited interval. We shall consider later on the nature of our position in this universe.

Do we survive the physical form?

In our present realisation of our existence we are no doubt aware of our physical body, and so also with regard to the existence of everything around us. It is also true that the physical forms and shapes in their present state do change, decay and transform. The knowledge of science backed by experiments demonstrate to our sensuous apprehension that this physical element is never destroyed. Every material object, however, changes its shape and is transformed into diverse forms. Just as the candle in our room after it has burnt out resolves itself into gaseous products and the full

Death is only transformation existence of it is found to exist in the room in that form in the atmosphere when weighed. We similarly find the forms of insects, birds, animals and trees undergoing death and decay and resolving into the elements of physical Nature. The hills and oceans, though relatively seeming permanent are revealing to the scientists the process of their birth, growth and decay. We have often heard the geologists and antiquarians in upholding the theory of previous existence of a big continent in the bosom of the present Indian Ocean, now the deepest in its kind and also of the archæon occurence of a vast ocean in place of the Himalayas, the higest mountains now on earth. The astronomers are trying to trace the conglomeration and growth of the different planets of the universe. Birth is always found to be followed by a sure end or demise however far away it may be. Thus all physical objects whether in the solid, liquid or gaseous state and however long the duration of their particular forms of temporary existences may last, change their shape and tend to be resolved into their component elements of solid, liquid, heat, motion and space. These five forms of physical elements are the final ingredients of which all material forms are composed. So also are our own bodily forms.

Forms resolve into elements of nature.

Bodily properties are the products of nature

To the stubborn materialist the question may occur whether life itself inhabiting the bodily forms is a product of the physical elements or the resultant of any other processes. This is no doubt a question that has appeared to the imagination of all the physical and mental scientists and their hypothetical surmises have been shared by their admirers both in the East and the West. Some have gone so far as to presume life to be a sure effect of a mechanical process like sparks of fire and aberration of electrical energy or a phenomenon like the effervescence produced by the chemical combination of soda and acid or, in other words, to be a product of evolution by the natural combinations of matter. Thus they confidently hope for the manufacture of life in their Laboratory by investigating the cause of automatic action (of squeezing and expanding) of the cardiac muscles. Though their attempts have failed up till now yet they are still dogging the theory with undiminished confidence and partinacity, and they are so very dogmatic that reasonable arguments of the Theists produce little effect on them.

Is life a product of nature ?

Likewise the Epicurians of the school of Charbak (चार्व्वाक) identify the living person with the physical body and take the body to be the end in itself. We find a considerable section of people holding the same view though not committing themselves in so many terms. But the firmness and amount of complacency with which most people persue a course of bodily enjoyment and bodily aggrandisement make their position quite clear. These dogmatists spare no pains to guard themselves against any ray of real knowledge peeping into their dark cells lest they are disillusioned to take a same view of life; and in their vain attempts to patch up the many loopholes in their frail garments, they most impudently make use of the resources of their material experiences to stifle the voice of reason and to stunt the activities of our real benefactors. But though the world at present may count a majority at their back in its materialistic disposition making the putrid body the summum bonum of life, we sincerely hope that reason and good sense are bound to prevail and the voice of true wisdom will receive a real hearing in the near future.

Obduracy of the Epicurians

(to be continued).

The Philosophy of life in a Nutshell.

[By Dr. H. W. B. Moreno]

The writer has exercised a degree of desireable caution that is not ordinarily found in most persons in formulating theories of the three-fold spiritual method so as to avoid actually spliting them up. They are really aspects of the one method viz. the service of Godhead. They are also not separable from one another. In their specialised dissociated forms they fail to yield the right result. The writer's conclusion is however that of Buddha and Sankara who conceive the highest state of the individual soul as one of merging with the Absolute resulting in the elimination of the distinction of observer, observation and observed. To this Vaishnava philosophy does not assent. As a matter of fact the scriptures go beyond the 'naught' of Buddha into the realm of the positive. Absolute describe in detail the Activities of the transcendental realm. These are the highest secrets and the really needful things. No philosophy that ignores the specific aspects of the absolute function can be said to be positively useful and is seldom harmless.

Philosophy to be true, must be universal. It must appeal to all men; each according to his own thoughts and aspirations. Every man differs from his neighbour and every one has his own ideal of the Divine. There are two outstanding features in all human aspirations, the first is to be free intellectually, spiritually and physically; the second is to attain to a full and perfect realisation of the Absolute or Truth in Itself. Beyond these two aspirations there is nothing; all others are auxilliary and subservient. By the attainment of the knowledge of the Absolute we are free; or if we are free morally, intellectually and physically we have attained to a realisation of the Absolute.

The Absolute is ever free. It is perfect and free in existence, perfect and free in wisdom, perfect and free in bliss; it is not tied to any conditions nor bound by any limitations. Ignorance is that which for a time hides from us the Absolute or Truth like clouds do the sun's rays. To clear ignorance and reveal this Truth there are four main pathways. They help in liberating us from the trammels of worldly surroundings and give us that which severs bondage, or attachment to life and its consequence, death.

They are: The Philosophy of Good Works. It purifies the mind by means of good deeds. Every act accomplished is in itself good or bad; if the cause is present the result must follow; no power can stay or stem the consequence. Good actions bring liberation, bad actions bondage. Good actions strengthen us in our moral powers and create non-attachment to worldly surroundings; bad actions produce the opposite effect. If good acts be done with the intention of enjoyment either here or hereafter, they have earned their reward and are negatived. All work should be done without any desire to enjoy the fruits, whether here or hereafter. Such actions without desire of any return go to destory the bondage of Self, which is the root of all Selfishness and attachment to worldly surroundings. There should be no desire in good works accomplished, either for name or fame or even to gain a Heaven, or a World Beyond. The watch-word of such a doer is not I but Thou ; he loves all sacrifice simply for the good of others, without any motive beyond. The bondage of wealth or lust or greed is great but such a doer of good works breaks through all this crystallisation around.

The next is the Philosophy of Devotion. Love or Devotion is the pleasantest and most natural way of man. The natural state of the whole Universe is attraction, just as the natural state of the human heart is love which cannot be without a subject and an object. Hence in the Philosophy, God is represented as a God of Love. Whether such a God exsists in the Absolute is a truth that has to be comprehended afterwards. None the less to those who have love in their hearts the Absolute takes the form of a God of Love. In the lower forms of worship God is embodied as a Ruler, a Judge, a Punisher or a Rewarder, that has to be feared ; or he is regarded as a Father that has to be obeyed. Such forms expand into the higher realsation of God as the Author and Finisher of Love ; for Perfect Love casteth out fear. So long as there is fear, there is no love. This is the highest abstraction of the knowledge of the Absolute.

The next is the Philosophy of Concentration. Concentration or Meditation on a symbolical figure, or name, or verse, or even a clause, is helpful to this end. "Om" is the secred name of God even as "Jehovah" is hallowed by a certain sect. It conveys the greatest and highest meaning of the Absolute. In the process of Meditation a Teacher is helpful to instruct the guide.

The last is the Philosophy of Wisdom. Once Reality is realised as the Absolute, the relativity of all things becomes apparent. This is true Wisdom. Reasoning from this Philosophy the meaning of the Universe and all that it contains, the falsity and unreality of all around are mere deductions.

Giving up, therefore, all arguments we realise the Truth and to realise the Truth fully is to become co-existent with it. The Truth alone is real, all else is unreal. We cease to enjoy, we cease to desire for what is naught and are made free, indeed. It is the highest, though most difficult Philosophy to pursue ; and many may have an intellectual grasp of it but few attain Realisation for Realisation is the comprehension and assimilation of the Truth till it permeates our very being, as it permeates all Nature and transcends all things.

Once the Truth is realised the Riddle is solved and we find rest in wisdom and in bliss, for to realise is to be and if we be It we are already beyond all earthly confines, in supernal bliss and peace.

In all this Philosophy the conception of the Absolute is an expanding Realisation. God is worshipped by some as an idol, as a stone, or as block of wood, or as the Spirit of one ancestor; or by other as a Judge or King; or even as a Father or Mother; by still others God is realised as a Lover or Consort, others yet still regard the Divinity as One, for none else is; higher in conception is the thought that there is no abiding One nor fixed Reality but what is fashioning is fashioned as we are, what to realise means complete union. which eludes the grasp of comprehension being in dimensions that are beyond the relativity of time and space, where the observer and the observed are merged, a conception that baffles all reason, because it is higher than thought can conceive or mind grasp; for as things are, the limited cannot comprehend the unlimited, nor the fractional part contain the whole Container.

Ourselves.

Bijaya Utsab (Oct 1).

The Bijaya is the anniversary of the victory of Shree Ramchandra over the forces of the demon Ravana. It is a day of the greatest rejoicing for the Vaishnavas. It is doubly dear to the Gaudiyas by being the anniversary of the appearance of Shree Madhavacharya. The Madhva-Gaudiya Math was installed by His Divine Grace at the town of Dacca on the Bijaya day in 1920 in commemoration of this great event. The holy TIthi was observed on Oct. 1. by appropriate rejoicings at all the Maths of the community. A special edition of the Nadia Prakash came out in recognition of the unique importance of the occasion.

Acceptance of Tridanda Sannyas (Oct. 4).

Sripad Ram Gopal Chattopadhaya was an inhabitant of the District of Bankura. He formerly held an appointment at Jamshedpur. While he was so employed his attention was attracted to the publications of the Gaudyia Math and he began seriously to study those works especially the weekly journal Gaudiya. Three years ago he formaly renounced his connection with the world and applied himself to the whole-time service of His Divine Grace. He was then placed in charge of seeing the Gaudiya Edition of the Bhagabatam through the Press and other publication work. As a resident of the Gaudiya Math in this capacity he was known as 'Sri Ramgovinda Das Adhikary. He was subsequently awarded the title of 'Vedanta Bhudeva' by Sri Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha in recognition of his wholeheartd service of Srimad Bhagabatam. Vedanta Bhudev Prabha, occupied with the close scrutiny of the eleventh Skandha of Srimad Bhagabatam now in course of publication, made up his mind to accept the condition of Tridanda Sannyas which is laid down in the eleventh Skandha of the Bhagabat as the method for obtaining the mercy of Krishna in the shape of the condition of the Paramahansa. Acting on this decision Vedanta Bhudeva accepted from His Divine Grace the triple staff on the 4th of October, the day preceding that of the entry into the New Buildings of the Gaudiya Math. He is now known in the community of the pure servants of Krishna by the designation of Srimad Bhaktibhudeb Srauti Maharaj. His conduct should serve as a living commentary on the mischief that has resulted from adoption of the life of worldliness by the study of the Bhagabatam from self-conceited worldlings. The Pastimes of the Tenth Skandham of the Bhagabatam are unintelligible to those who have not attained the condition of Paramahansa. The study and exposition of the Tenth Skandha by worldly people have produced the most disastrous consequences and it is high time to think seriously about the subject.

OPENING OF THE NEW BUILDINGS OF THE GAUDIYA MATH (Oct. 5).

The New Buildings.

The New Buildings of the Gaudiya Math are the pious gift of a successful business-man of Calcutta, an inhabitant of Barisal, who is popularly known by initials of his name as J. B. D Srijut Jagabandhu Dutta personally supervised every detail of constitution and gave all his time, attention and a large part of his fortune to the building and beautifying of the House of Godhead and his devotees. The Temple is 85 feet high and built in the genuine Indian style. The Natyamandir is a noble Hall fronting the Temple excelling in certain respects the best ones in Calcutta. The best and most costly materials have been used in the construction of every part of the Buildings which will remain an enduring memorial of the beneficent piety of their donor and builder.

The construction of the Buildings could not be completed by the date of their opening. That date had been changed more than once. At last it was decided to occupy the Buildings in their unfinished condition.

The Procession.

A historic procession of congregational chanters over two miles long conveyed, on a richly decorated Car of special design, the Holy Forms of Sri Sri Gaursundar and Radha-Govinda along the principal Streets of North Calcutta from the old Math to the New Buildings in the afternoon of the 5th of October (2—6 P.M.)

The Festival of Sri Sri Radha-Madan-Mohan

The Sri Bigrahas were installed in the New Temple amid the holy chant of congregational Kirtan, by His Divine Grace in view of an immense assemblage of the people from all parts of the country. Every detail of the Divine Service was watched with breathless attention by the assembled people as His Divine Grace at the head of the Sannyasi Maharajas and Brahmacharies of the Math performed those mysterious rites that have been handed down by the eternal chain of the spiritual teachers in accordance with the revealed records of the Scriptures. The Gaudiya Math stands for the perfectly pure service of the Lord which is possible only if the heart of the worshipper is free from all taint of worldliness by the Grace of the Lord Himself. It is on the plane of the Absolute that the Spiritual Service of the Lord is rendered and it is only the perfectly pure heart that is privileged to understand its true significance. The assembled people knew that the devotees of the Gaudiya Math stand for the absolutely pure form of genuine worship and were therefore, extremely anxious to observe every detail of the holy function. They must have felt a new inspiration by the sight. This is proved by the fact that the worship of the Lord at the Gaudiya Math continues to draw daily a vast number of devotees at all hours and far into the evening. All those who come to the Math in any mood only once confess that they feel it impossible thereafter to overcome its attraction even for a single day. This has been a matter for surprise even to those who continue to suppose that they themselves are above such weakness. The devotees of the Gaudiya Math stand for pure devotion to Godhead in every activity of their life. Such example is bound to react on the most stubbornly Sceptical natures. This is no exaggerated praise but falls very short of this real wonder. This is easily realisable by every body on his own account. The writer does not profess to be an exception to this universal rule.

The worship of Sri Sri Radha-Govinda if properly conducted, is declared by the Scriptures to be the only proper cure of the ailment of all worldly hankerings.

Such hankering is called Karma or lust of the flesh. Even the god of carnality (Cupid) who bears the name of Madana in the Sanskrit language, is constrained to admit the superior but perfectly pure amorous charm of Sri Krishna, the eternal Consort of Sri Radhika. The realisation of the nature of this real love is practicable by initiation into the principle of the pure worship of Sri Sri Radha-Madanmohana. It is no matter for surprise that the living worship of Sri Sri Radha-Madanmohana by pure devotees, who can truly realise and practise the same, should possess an overwhelming power to wean even the most graceless of scoundrels to a permanent and real liking for the function.

Distribution of Mahaprosad.

This was provided on the most extensive scale by the genuine philanthropy of J. B. D. on this most auspicious occasion. The crowd who assembled to witness the Divine service was so immense that it was impossible and was also found to be unnecessary to try to control its movements. They were possessed with an intense longing for honouring Mahaprosad This is quite a new thing for Calcutta where the most elaborate and fastidious arrangements fail to draw a sufficient number of guests to a public dinner at any season. In this case every one in that vast gathering stayed patiently in his place in the crowd for the Mahaprosad. Every one sat down where he stood when the great favour was served out. There was no note of complaint; although probably no one in that gathering would have cared to wait for the least particle of food at the gate of another person for the greater part of the night in a close crowd. The devotee does not believe in eating and drinking for the gratification of his palate or the appeasement of his hunger. He knows that the remains of the Lord's meal are no earthly objects for the attainment of any earthly purpose. He accepts a particle of the Mahaprosad as a mark of favour of the Divinity with due honour and thanks-giving. By eating and drinking food unoffered to God-head one only reaps death. By honouring the remains of the Lord's meal one is enabled to please Krishna Himself. This faith influenced the conduct of the assembled people, high and low alike.

Bhakti-Sastri Examination. (Oct. 7-8).

Thirty one selected candidates sat for the Bhakti-sastri Examination which is the Entrance Examination enabling the successful candidate to appear subsequently in the examination for the diploma in the practice and knowledge of pure devotion to God-head. The examination took place in the New Buildings of the Math.

Examination for the diploma of Sampraday. Baibhabacharya. (Oct. 21).

The Examination for the diploma of Acharya in the subject of the expansion of the community of pure devotees had been fixed for the 8th October. It had to be postponed till the 21st on which date it was held in the New Math.

First Address of His Divine Grace delivered in the Natyamandir of the New Buildings (Oct. 8.)

The Natyamandir or Hall of Sankirtan-dance was sanctified and consecrated to the cause of pure service by His Divine Grace on the 8th of October when he was pleased to address the assembled devotees in the Spacious Hall for the first time on the subject of the eternal and only function of all souls.

His Divine Grace spoke of the great mercy of Sri Gaursundar. All mankind deserve the supreme bliss of the peace of the soul by discoursing the exquisite charm of His Activities. He has given to mankind the supreme gift of the love of God-head. This is the greatest need for this quality of love for Godhead. Its absence is the cause of all evil. There are many obstacles in the way of the pure service of the Lord. Even the devotas who are given power over forces of Nature, are always ready to oppose the devotee of God-head.

Sri Madhabendra Puri has left us the keynote of the teaching of Sri Chaitanya. His last words to us were expressive of agony for not being able to see Krishna.

The son of Nanda is also adhokshaja that is to say He is located beyond the range of knowledge born of the senses. Is He, therefore, destined to remain always inaccessible to us in this world? If this must be so how are we to seek for the solace of our minds rent by the grief of this great agony?

Sri Gaursundar has supplied this need. He bids us chant the Sankirtan of Krishna. He has described the effect of the congregational chant of Krishna in the first of the octade of Shlokas penned by Himself. It is necessary to ponder constantly the meaning of that Shloka with the utmost care and reverence.

The perfect chant of Krishna serves an eightfold-purpose. It cleanses the mirror of the heart. It quenches the wild forest-fire that is reducing the world to cinders. It brings about real good and real knowledge and ever-increasing expansion of the ocean of bliss. It promotes the realisation of the fullest happiness at every step. It provides a cooling and complete immersion for all the faculties of the soul in the Absolute.

Sri Krishna Whose chant is enjoined by Sri Gaursundar is not the Sri Krishna of the historian, nor of the allegorist, not even of the metaphysicist. He is not an entity manufactured or imagined by any human brain. He is not Sri Krishna of the philanthrophist, of the sensualist of the painter of worldly beauty. He is not the assertion of dogmatists, the tool of passing whims, the god of a muddy understanding, the supplier of requisites for the gratification of anybody's sensuous appetites. Nor is the Sri Krishna of Samkirtan diluted with Maya.

'Sri' means 'One who is supremely beautiful.' Krishna is the Attracter of the Most Beautiful, Person possessing the highest capacity of feeling the attraction of superior beauty. He fascinates the Most Beautiful by His incomparable Beauty. Such is Sri Krishna of the Samkirtan.

Sri Krishna does not attract merely the mind which is but a faint reflection of the soul. He attracts the pure uneclipsed soul. He attracts all who are most beautiful and exercises an irresistible fascination over those males and females who are most beautiful.

When we cannot offer our unreserved worship we do not find Sri Krishna but one of His infinite Manifestations instead.

By the pervert chant of Sri Krishna we gain only the most trivial and questionable results. It is for this reason that those who possess good judgment desire the triumphant prevalence of the pure Sankritan of Sri Krishna.

THE FESTIVAL OF SRI SRI RADHA-GOVINDA OFFERING OF THE PEAK OF FOOD. (Oct. 22)

The Festival of to Sri Sri Radha-Govinda was celebrated on the 22nd October by the offering of the Peak of Food to the supreme lord in commemoration of the festival instituted by Sri Madhabendra Puri at Mount Gobardhan. This subject is discussed at some length in a separate article of this journal.

The Theistic Conference (Oct. 24—Nov. 1)

The Theistic Conference assembled on Oct. 24 after many unavoidable postponements and held its sessions every evening according to the printed programme till the 1st November.

The number of delegates from outside who could attend was not very large owing to the uncertainty of the meeting of the conference till almost the very last moment. In view of this circumstance it was deemed necessary to adopt a proposal for calling a further session of the conference at the earliest convenient date in the near future. But the business was nevertheless gone through in the order of the programme. The attendance which had to be confined to the selected persons in accordance with the object of conveners was fairly large.

A most important and definite gain that resulted from the holding of the Conference was that it enabled the conveners to give effect to the procedure that is considered by them as the only suitable one for such purpose. The procedure consisted in circulating beforehand quite a large number of questions covering many important aspects of the subject, among those interested in the movement of loving service of the Absolute Truth soliciting their written answers thereto. These answers were thereupon classified under the respective heads of the order of business before the conference. No extempore speeches were allowed at the conference itself. His Divine grace referred to the answers that had been received in their proper place in course of his speeches. These speeches constituted the regular business of the daily sessions. One speech was delivered each day in the evening, lasting ordinarily from 7P. M. to 9 P. M. They were delivered in Bengali. A translation of them will be published serially in the coming numbers of this journal. They covered the whole subject in a systematic manner.

Srestharyya Sripad Jagabandhu Das Adhikari, Bhaktiranjan (J. B. D.)

Departure of J. B. D.

THE day before the close of the spiritual Exhibition that had been organised in the spacious compound of the Gaudiya-Math, which function formed the concluding activity of the long series of the festivities of the auspicious Inauguration of the New P[illegible]dings of the Math, Srestharyya Sripad Jagabandhu Das Adhikari Bhaktiranjan, the donor and architect of those superb Buildings, took his departure from the scene of his unique devotional labours with the supreme satisfaction that his soul had at last found and successfully performed his duty to Godhead and humanity. Bhaktiranjan prabhu's disappearance took place on the 19th of November.

Real significance of the disappearance of the pure devotee of Godhead

There are numerous scriptural texts to the effect that the appearance and disappearance of the devotees of Godhead in this world are part and parcel of their pure, blissful service of the Divinity. They require to be specifically distinguished from apparently similar events, viz., the birth and death of those conditioned souls that fall into the clutches of the Deluding Energy by their wilful neglect of the service of Godhead. Those who regard this world as a place intended by Godhead for the activities of the pure soul are not satisfied by any scheme of life that has no reference to the living principles of eternal existence, absolute knowledge and un-interruptible perfect bliss that alone may properly appertain to the soul in his natural condition. A person with a real hankering for the spiritual life, does not think that the whole of his duty consists in trying to minister to the ephemeral and unwholesome pleasures of the perishable body and ignorant mind. He should be desirous of looking beyond these temporary utilities to find the function that will last. It is to such persons that the words of the scriptures testifying to the immortal nature of the soul, carry spontaneous conviction by a receptive impulse of the soul himself from within. But these momentary impulses donot come to stay. That is the reason why we are unable to incorporate them in every activity. It is not improper to try to prolong the worldly life with the aid of science. It is also necessary to live in order to serve. It is meaningless to try to live for the sake of trying to live. There is a function the Realisation of which is prevented by the dread of death which is responsible for all activities for the prolongation of life. Death will come at the moment appointed by God. It will come naturally and as the proper culmination of our activities, as a help for further activities, without the accompaniments of dread and stupefaction, if the true function of life is not neglected. This happy consummation is not promised by Medical men or biologists. It is not in their power to promise the life eternal because it is not their business to know why any person should live at all even for a single day. Bhaktiranjan prabhu earned the reward of being called to the Presence of Krishna by the proper performance of the function that was allotted to him by Godhead in this world. His disappearance is a startling corroboration of the scriptural tradition that a builder of the shrine of the Divinity obtains the reward of his service by being withdrawn from this vale of suffering on the completion of his task. Such disappearance is coveted by the purest souls. We intend in this short discourse to present our readers with a few personal reminiscences of the departed soul which may enable us to obtain some idea of the nature of Jagabandhu's realisation of the real function of life.

Cost of the New Buildings

Jagabandhu never regarded the cost of the Buildings as involving any sacrifice to himself. He said that all that was his, was the wish to build the Temple of Godhead and the home of His devotees. The money that was required for the purpose, had been supplied by Sri Gurudeva. He said that this could not be understood by any one except himself. He was particularly anxious to disclaim all credit for spending any money of his own on the Buildings. This was the argument which he also mainly employed in convincing the heirs of his properties. He told them that he had not touched either his capital or the profits of his business to the extent of a single pice in building the Gaudiya Math. He also urged every one to wish to serve the Lord if he wanted to have a proper idea of his case. In no other way any one else could understand or believe what he said. But it is certain that he did not grudge in the least the enormous cost of the Buildings. On the contrary he was always full of new plans of expenditure. He was extremely fond of the most costly decorations. He felt very sad if ony one asked him to reduce his lavish expenditure on decoration. When he was told to give up some of his plans of decoration in view of the fact that they could not be completed within the time at his disposal, he appeared to be very much distressed taking it to be a great punishment inflicted on him by the lord for his past misdeeds. He was very particular to pay in cash both for material and labour, saying that if he tried to build on loan he would be in the power of his creditors and might be compelled to use inferior material. The original plan that he had conceived of the Buildings underwent rapid expansion as the work progressed. He always assured his best friend, Sripad Kunjabehari Vidyabhusan prabhu, that he was prepared to spend whatever was necessary for making the Temple as beautiful as possible. As the costs mounted up to an ever increasing figure the delight and enthusiasm of Bhaktiranjan prabhu proportionately increased. His gladness knew no bounds as the day of Inauguration of the Buldings drew nigh. He confessed to all his friends that he had no sleep at night for his anxiety to complete the Buildings in time for the Inauguration Ceremony. The only way to please him was by praising the Buildings. If any defect was pointed out he would not rest till the defect had been completely rectified. He demolished costly constructions many times over without the least hesitation to avoid every defect that was detected. It is not possible to make an actual estimate of the cost of the Buildings. Jagabandhu himself never set any limits to his expenditure. In these circumstances the cost is likely to have been very high, probably higher than any guess of a businessman. Jagabandhu built the Temple of Godhead in the spirit and with the purpose of the true devotee. No one will probably ever know what the Buildings actually cost. He made an unconditional gift of the Buildings and land to Sri Gurudeva. This proves the perfection of his faith and must be wholly unintelligible to persons who are less devoted to the service of the servants of Krishna. It is the pure, selfless soul of J. B. D. that has been translated into the living Abode of Godhead and His devotees.

Personal labour in the construction of the Buildings

It is necessary to mention a few details regarding the personal exertions of J.B.D. in connection with the buildings of the Math. He was present on the premises from the day when the foudantions were laid. He was in the worst state of bodily health at that time and onwards. He, however, chose to accept personal hardship of the most intensive type. He did not care for wind, rain or the sun and attended personally to the laying of one brick upon another. The whole of his time from early morning to a very late hour into the night, was wholly consecrated to the service of the Buildings. His secular business prospered most wonderfully all the while that he was engaged in this manner. His attachment to the work of actual construction need not, therefore, be supposed to be allied to any form of barren asceticism or stoicism. He was able to make the most efficient arrangement for the conduct of his secular affairs by giving practically all his time to the service of the Math. This is also not intelligible to those who have no experience of the real nature of the genuine devotion to the servants of Krishna. The service of Godhead is the only complete and true way of fulfilling our duties to humanity. There are, indeed, hypocrites who teach to neglect worldly affairs as the necessity of spiritual life. J. B. D. knew better. He devoted all his attention, time and money to building the Abode of the servants of Krishna without having to neglect his ordinary worldly affairs in any way. No one ever heard him brag of his 'spirit of sacrifice.' He knew that the service of Krishna is always a fulfilment of everything and never a sacrifice of anything. But the worldly mind can never understand this. He also asked all his dependants and relations to devote all their time to the worship of Godhead under the guidance of the really pure devotees of the Gaudiya Math. This exhortation and his own living example had their effect on their hearts. This is the way in which J. B.D.

was making the real 'provision' for his numerous adopted household. He had no children of his own. He did not believe in the sufficiency or beneficence of any earthly provision. He almost made none for his widows. He entrusted to his heirs, by way of their 'provision', the task of the due completion of the Gaudiya Math Buildings. Those rich men who may be disposed to think that personal labour is unnecessary in the service of Godhead, cherish a fatal blunder from which they can be rescued only by following the example set by J. B. D. There is no indignity in doing manual service for the lord. Those who do such service are fully the equal of those who are fit to worship Sree Sree Radha-Govinda in their minds without the manifestation of this apparently external form of activity. As a matter of fact neither the mind nor the body can serve Krishna. Krishna may, however, enable both to be employed in his service. As soon as one obtains this mercy of Krishna his bodily and mental activities acquire the spiritual character and become super-mundane and altogether wholesome in their aptitudes. Those who may be disposed to regard J. B. D. as unfit for mental worship and accordingly to undervalue his personal manual labour in connection with the building of the Gaudiya Math, are themselves unfit to understand the principle of pure devotion to Krishna. The sweeper who worships Krishna is infinitely higher than the conceited pseudo-Brahman who scorns any form of the worship or any of the worshippers of the supreme Lord. This is not sentimentalism. The realisation of this great truth is the only cure both of sentimentalism and nibilism, which are the cousin-germans of rank atheism. For kins and savants no less than for the poor and ignorant, the conduct of this simple faithful servant of the Lord, should serve as a great eye-opener. The same remark is equally applicable to those malicious hypocrites who may choose to regard the Temple of Godhead and the Abode of His pure devotees as having any similarity to their own showy habitations dedicated to the sedulous cultivation of undiluted sensuousness. It is necessary to build for Godhead and His devotees the most sumptuous edifices. It is unnecessary to build even a hovel for the gratification of one's own sensuous appetites. J. B. D. toiled bare-headed under the burning sun to build the House of Godhead with the accumulations of a life of exemplary industry. His conduct should be the living refutation of the sophistry and casuistry of the whole race of self-seeking atheists of every denomination.

It is never possible to exhaust the infinite goodness of every single act of the pure devotee of Godhead by describing the same in the poor language of this world. The only hope in penning these lines is that the high topic will mercifully impart a particle of its quality to this attempt of most inadequate praise of the activities of Godhead and His pure devotees.

The Spiritual Exhibition at the Gaudiya Math

THE spiritual Exhibition which was held during Feb.-March at Sreedham Mayapur the place of Nativity of Sri Gaursundar, has been described in the issues of this Journal for those months. The great success of that first attempt led its organisers the Viswa Vaishnava Rajsabha to hold a similar Exhibition in the City of Palaces in connection with the Festivities of the Opening of the New Gaudiya Math Buildings. The Exhibition was held in the grounds of the New Gaudiya Math from 5 to 20 Nov. The public response in appreciation has been far beyond all expectations. The visitors literally overflooded the area from morn till twelve o'clock at night, all through the eventful fortnight. The rush was so great that it was necessary for the visitors to be satisfied with the merest glimpse of the exhibits. There was, however, no untoward event of any kind, due to the excellent arrangement and the untiring personal supervision of the organisers.

All the stalls fitted up for the occasion were devoted to purely spiritual subjects. The economic and social sections that had formed a part of Sridham Mayapur Exhibition, were dis-continued. This afforded greater scope for putting before the public many of the pressing problems of religion and their true scriptural solutions.

The point of view illustrated by the Exhibition was that of Sri Chaitanya. Incidents from the career of the Lord, were exhibited by means of groups of dolls with appropriate scenic back-ground. Thus there was up to a certain extent a repetition of the show exhibited at Sridham Mayapur with improvements and additions. To these were added a considerable number of stalls which contained demonstrations to elucidate some of the fundamental principles of pure devotion.

The Exhibition was comprehensively designed to represent the different stages in the progressive manifestation of the Truth in this world against obstructions of every kind. The chain of ideas may be thus indicated. The career of Sri Krishna Chaitanya was explained by a scene depicting the Descent of Godhead to the mundane plane, in His different plenary forms and also in His own Form, the source of all Divine Manifestation, Sri Krishna Chaitanya is identified by the scriptures with Sri Krishna or Godhead Himself. The difference between the career of Sri Krishna and Sri Chaitanya is explained by the doctrine that Sri Krishna Chaitanya is Krishna Himself wearing externally the disposition of Sri Radhika, the eternal consort or counterwhole or Power of is derived from the experience of mundane existence. The spiritual is neither the negation nor the abstraction of the mundane. The spiritual is the reality corresponding to its perverted reflection, viz., the mundane. Both are real but the one is nevertheless categorically different from the other. This difference is expressible, as far as physical analogy may go, by the phenomenon of reflection. But mere reversion of parts which is found in the case of the reflected image, is not a proper analogy as it does not embody the principle of perversion. This defect in the representation of the relationship between the spiritual and mundane by the analogy of reflection should be carefully borne in mind.

The device adopted for exhibiting the relationship of the mundane with the spiritual was as follows. The different grades of relationships were recorded in the order of excellence in an ascending order. At the bottom of the scale was put the tranquilised condition (santarasa). On the attainment of this state all mundane hankerings cease to disturb the mind. This is the negative aspect. The mere negative state however is also a mundane phenomenon and has no place in the realm of the Absolute. There the tranquil condition is a positive disposition. The tranquil devotee completely identifies his wish with that of Krishna and has no separate positive desire of his own. The negative tranquil state appeals to the acceptance of many persons for holding out the seeming prospect of affording relief from all worldly distractions and thereby producing one's own personal satisfaction. The positive tranquil state, however, has in view solely the satisfaction of Krishna.

The positive tranquil state occupies the lowest position in the scale of relationships in the spiritual realm. Immediately above the tranquil state was put the disposition of loyal and willing obedience as of a servant. This may be distant and reverential or of a confidential nature. Immediately above the condition of the servant was put that of the friend. Above the friend's state was shown the attitude of affection of His parents towards Godhead as Son. At the top of all was put the condition of the consorts of Krishna.

This order of relationships appeared in the reversed gradation in the reflected image in a mirror which was placed in such a position that only the reflected image in the mirror was visible to the spectators. In the reversed order the tranquil state appeared at the top while the relationship of husband and wife occupied the lowest position.

The highest spiritual function, viz., that of the consorts of Krishna, was exhibited by three stalls. One of them represented the nature of all worldly activities on the mundane plane, by the figure of a dance round the desires of the flesh culminating in carnal lust of male and female. The second stall represented the dance of the congregational chant instituted by Sri Chaitanya in the court yard of Sribash. The third stall presented the circle of amorous dance at Brindaban round the coupled Form of Sri Sri Radha Krishna.

The Appearance of Krishna on the mundane plane was the subject of demonstration of one of the stalls. The scenes of the Nativity were most beautifully set forth. Krishna's Birth is one of the eternal Pastimes of the Supreme Lord that is the first spiritual event to be experienced by the soul engaged in the endeavour for the attainment of spiritual service. This Divine Event was manifested to the view of all conditioned souls at the close of the Dwapara Age. The Birth of the Eternal is inconceivable to the limited mind of man. But this is no reason for disbelieving its existence. Neither is this a reason for wilfully supposing that the Birth of the Supreme Lord must necessarily be a mundane affair. It is necessary to be on our guard againts both these irrational attitudes to be able to understand the holy mystery of the Nativity.

Sri Krishna. The Appearance of the Divinity Himself and of His plenary Forms in this world make possible the redemption of bound souls.

The Activities of the Divinity even when He chooses to appear in this world, are always super-natural. Their nature is not capable of being understood by the material mind of the conditioned Soul. So it is necessary for the conditioned Soul to be endowed with the faculty of spiritual perception before he can avail of the opportunity of redemption through service of the Divinity, the opportunity being provided by the descent of Godhead into this world. The function of imparting the spiritual vision to the conditioned soul, is performed by the Divinity in the role of the Acharyya. The Iron Age has been blessed by the appearance of four great Theistic Acharyyas, viz., Vishnuswami, Nimbarka, Ramanuja and Madhwa. These Acharyyas are Divine personages. They must not be supposed to be subject to the laws of physical Nature. The Acharyyas are the authorised Saviours of all conditioned souls. They are capable of transmitting this power to their chosen disciples. The relationship of preceptor and disciple gives rise to the sampradayas or communities of pure devotees.

Sri Krishna Chaitanya is Krishna Himself appearing in the role of His own devotee. Sri Krishna Chaitanya entered the order of Sriman Madhwacharyya in accordance with the dictum of the scriptures that the Truth cannot be found except by unconditional submission to the Acharyya. The teaching of Sri Krishna Chaitanya was misunderstood by most of His contemporaries. A few stalls were designed to demonstrate the nature of ordinary forms of misunderstanding which also prevail now-a-days. All misunderstanding on the subject of religion is due to mistaking the spiritual for the mundane and vice versa.

The spiritual is eternally and categorically distinct from the mundane. The spiritual is, however, the Key to the puzzles of the mundane existence. They are as incompatible with one another as light and darkness. The spiritual is not the mere absence of the mundane. The opposite of this also is not true. The mundane is the perverted reflection of the spiritual. There is correspondence between the two, but, the correspondence is hidden by being reversed in an inconcievably unwholesome fashion. This makes it impossible for the faculty of reason that is to be found in this world to grasp the nature of the spiritual existence, even when it is most fully explained by the authorized teachers themselves in symbolical language rendered possible by actual correspondence between the conditions of mundane and spiritual existence. It is necessary to be lifted to the spiritual plane in order to be able to realise the true meaning of the symbols. This is the great obstacle in the way of all those who are given to hair splitting speculations regarding the Absolute. These very sages, however, admit readily enough the necessity of submission to the laws of physical Nature of which they have actual experience. They would similarly agree to submit unconditionally to the laws of the Absolute if only they could have the actual experience of spiritual existence. This, however, they can have only by the causeless mercy of the Acharyya. The fact that one is prepared to make his willing unconditional submission to the feet of the Acharyya is the only proof of his realisation of the Divine Nature of the latter. The submission that is made to the laws of physical Nature is due to necessity or for avoidance of unpleasantness.

One of the stalls was designed to set forth the relationship between the mundane and the spiritual. The arrangement was quite simple so that every one might understand it at the very first sight. The realm of the Absolute is not full of an infinity of distinctive features and wholly devoid of all features as the impersonalitsts would have us believe. The conception of neutralised cognitive or nonconscious existence

Sri Krishna was shown as born in the lying-in-cell of the prison of King Kansa. His Advent failed to be noticed by all except His parents. On His Appearance the strongly barred prison gates opened of their own accord to make way for His father Vasudeva who carried his Divine Baby across the flooded Jamuna to the chamber of His foster-mother Yasoda in the pastoral village of Braja. Vasudeva deposited Krishna on the couch of Yasoda who had just given birth to a daughter and taking up her new-born girl, made his way unobserved by any one to the cell of Devaki. After depositing the girl on the bed of Devaki Vasudeva put on the iron chains of captivity and peacefully waited for the dawn.

The morning of the Nativity witnessed the spectacle of rejoicings in the home of Nanda and Yasoda in Braja at the birth of Krishna, while in the cell of Kansa's prison was enacted the last futile attempt of the Atheist Kansa for ensuring his own safety by the murder, in her infancy, of the eighth issue of Vasudeva and Devaki, at whose hands, as a prophecy had declared, he was to meet his death.

The subject of the triple staff (tridanda) sannyas (renunciation) was explained by one of the stalls. The tridandi sannyasin is the chanter of the kirtan of Krishna. This chant is however a really living chant. It makes its appearance on his lips by the joint exertions of the Divinity and the serving souls. In the stall the tridandi sannyasin was represented in the form of the mridanga. The mridanga is a drum whose body is made of burnt clay. Struck by the hands of the player at both ends the mridanga with its body of clay is rendered capable of uttering the Kirtan of Krishna. Such is the function of the tridandi. Sri Gurudeva drums into him at one end the Word of Sri Krishna. The loyal listeners of the Word of God drum at the other end by their receiving response. The tridandi, thus operated at both ends, is enabled to give out the sweet chant of Krishna.

The function of the Brahmana, the head of the Varnasrama institution, was explained by another stall. As the subject is being treated in some detail in a series of papers in this journal under the heading 'Who is a Brahmana?' the reader is referred to those articles for information.

Presidential Address at the Spiritual Conference

(Delivered By His Divine Grace Paramhansa Paribrajakacharyya Sri Srimat Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj)

The Source of knowledge :—The truth can never be served by the faculty that diverges from Him. The service of the truth is the function of the soul. It is incapable of being diverted from the Truth. It is cause-less and uninterruptible. The Truth is identical with the Teacher of the Truth. There can be no knowledge of the conclusions of the Vedas without undeviating service of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru-deva. No one can be the Teacher of the Truth except the dovotee of God. This is not the dogma of irrational orthodoxy. It is the real Truth. One cannot be the Guru although he be descended from the highest lineage, be initiated in all sacrifices, have studied the thousand and one branches of the Veda, if he be not a Vaishnava.

In ancient times there was a city called Kanchi in the South of the country. In that city there lived a very famous Professor whose name was Yadavaprakasha. There is a tradition that at that time there was no other Professor in the whole of that part of the country who was his equal in learning. Laksmandesika went to him for the purpose of study. He resided with his teacher. He was devoted to his studies with his whole heart. He was perfectly sincere in his conduct towards his teacher. These excellent qualities soon attracted the attention and captured the heart of his teacher. One day Yadavaprakasha following the interpretation of Sankaracharya was explaining the well-known text of the Chhandyogya that the two eyes of God-head are red like the back of a monkey. This caused intense pain to the heart of Ramanuja. Ramanuja was at the time engaged in tending the person of his teacher. He felt very much pained on hearing the blasphemy against the Holy Form of Godhead. The warm tears from his eyes fell in drops on the back of Yadavaprakasha. This sudden fit of weeping surprised Yadavaprakasha who asked Ramanuja about the cause of his grief. Ramanuja then said that there was no necessity of explaining the word 'kapyasam" in such filthy and blasphemous manner, especially as the word possessed an excellent meaning. Was it not a most highly offensive act to compare the Eyes of God Himself, Who is the most Revered Lord and Master of us all, with the worst part of the body of a monkey ?

Yadavaprakasha was very angry on hearing these words of Ramanuja. He reprimanded Ramanuja in most severe terms. 'How highly impertinent for a mere lad to find fault with the interpretation of Acharyya Sankara! Was it possible that there could be any other explanation of the text than that of the Acharyya?' Ramanuja replied in words that were expressive of modesty. 'Yes,' said Ramanuja, 'there is another meaning of the text which augments the happiness of the spiritually enlightened. Acharyya's explanation is intended for deluding those persons who are endowed with unspiritual aptitude. I am telling you the same. Deign to listen to my words.'

There-upon Ramanuja offered this famous explanation of the 'kapyasam' text. 'Kang' means water. That which drinks water is 'kapi'. 'Kapi' is thus no other than the stem of the lotus. That which is placed on the stem is 'kapyasam'. In other words the two Eyes of that Supreme person are tinged with red like the undimmed lustre of the unplucked lotus on its stem shining on the bosom of the blue waters.

Yadavaprakasha was filled with the greatest astonishment on hearing this explanation of the Scriptural text. He felt most keenly the disgrace of his defeat at the hands of his own disciple. Maddened with anger he plotted to do away with Ramanuja in secret.

No teacher of undifferentiated Cognition, or of utilitarian works, or of any worldly state of union with the Supreme Soul (yoga), or of the performance of activities resolved upon by one-self (brata), or of asceticism, or of magic, or of hypocrisy can really be designated as the 'superior' or Guru. They are all of them only triflers and being really very light, indeed, are capable of being easily manipulated. They are never the benefactors of the conditioned soul. They are on the contrary the enemies of themselves as well as of all others.

But the Maha-Bhagabata, the best of devotees, the Vaishnava Guru, alone is causelessly merciful to all souls, is alone grieved by their misery. It is for this reason that our former Guru Srila Raghunathdas Goswami prabhu has instructed us to place ourselves under the guidance of Sri Sanatan prabhu who alone is really grieved for all of us and can alone impart the knowledge of our relationship with God-head. The actual words of Srila Das Goswami prabhu require to be quoted in full. 'I place myself under the protection of my Master Sri Sanatan prabhu. Sri Sanatan Prabhu is the ocean of mercy. He is always grieved for the misery of others. He makes me drink, with the greatest care, of the liquid sweet of the service of God-head. The attachment for that service weans one completely from any hankering for any other thing. I was quite ignorant of this and was wholly unwilling to serve Godhead. But he, nevertheless, took infinite pains with me and prevailed over my stubborn opposition to his good counsel. Such is Prabhu Sanatan'.

What is really the source from which we derive the knowledge of the Truth ? Is it pure or mixed cognition ? Is it also the only thing needful, or otherwise ? It is necessary first of all to decide whether the above propositions have proceeded from the theory of undifferentiated cognition, of undifferentiated non-cognition, or from activities of pure cognition which are full of eternal bliss. To become one with non-animation is the goal of the theory of undifferentiated non-cognition. To merge completely in the featureless existence of undifferentiated cognition is the goal of the theory of undifferentiated knowledge. The realisation of the blissful eternal service of God-head in the realm which is free from all ignorance establishes one in the unconditional safe function of pure cognition.

The emancipation that is spoken of in the Bhagabatam is not destruction of the triple envelope of the bound soul. It is nothing less than the actual establishment in one's own natural condition. 'Mukti' is establishment in one's own proper condition by discarding the contrary'. When one is established in one's own proper condition one gets beyond the reach of ignorance. Then the true function of the cognitive faculty, which is no other than the service of Godhead, manifests itself fully. The distinctive service that is natural for every individual soul is then uninterruptedly and fully manifested. 'There are different ways in which different persons choose to obey Me. I also serve them in correspondingly different ways. Men, O Partha, by every method follow the path that is Mine'. God-head Himself here says in effect that He worships His worshipper in exactly the same way in which the latter worships Him. In the mood of consort the devotee serves God-head with all his faculties, and accordingly Krishna gives up all His Limbs to him. Krishna regards Himself as under obligation to His devotee even after giving Himself completely to him.

In the shloka of the Geeta referred to above the word 'Mang' 'Me' should be specially observed. The word refers directly to Krishna. It is Krishna Who is the speaker. He says, 'He who worships Me does so in one of five different ways, each one of which is characterised by the quality of utmost submission. But the mood of the consort displays the highest measure of submission. If the submission be not to Myself it would be rendered to My shadow or to My external deluding power (maya), it is then no submission to Me'. It will not do if curd is called milk. Curd is no doubt derived from milk as its source. But the spoilt milk is never curd. It is possible for a person to be able to see the perverted, imaginary form of Vishnu. If such a person submits to his perverted vision it will be no submission to the real Vishnu. Vishnu is not perverted. It is possible for a person to see, to experience a vision of Him which may be the product of his own wrong way of looking at Him. If this happens to be the case it is to be understood that the person fails to have any real sight of Vishnu. The Geeta has this Shloka, 'Those who worship with reverence other devatas, O son of Kunti, also worship Me, indeed, but by the method that is improper'.

To see any object other than Krishna, is the improper process of seeing. This improper method of seeing is identical with all our evils and disruptive differences. It is possible to get rid of the condition of this improper seeing. Thereafter it is really possible to see Krishna. Krishna is the ocean of infinite undying sweetness. There are twelve rasas (leavening qualities) in Krishna. Five of these rasas are primary. There are seven secondary rasas which help to increase the sweetness of the primary rasas. All these rasas are completely harmonised in Krishna alone.

Sri Sukadeva Goswami said to Maharaja Parikshit, 'Listen O King I am going to give you an account of some of the rasas of Sri Krishna. Sri Krishna is in Himself the shining sphere of infinite rasas. When Sri Krishna made His appearance in the company of Baladeva in the amphitheatre for the exhibition of feats of strength set up by king Kansa each one of the spectators saw Krishna according to his own individual disposition. Wrestlers, fond of the martial quality, saw that Krishna was terrible like the thunder. Females, fond of the quality of love, saw that Sri Krishna was the God of love Himself. The masses of the people saw that Krishna was the only king of all men. The cow-herds, with friendly and paternal love, saw Him as their kinsman. All the frightened wicked kings saw Krishna as the Punisher of evil-doers. Every father and mother beheld Him as a most beautiful Child. The king of the Bhojas, Kansa, saw Him as Death Himself. Persons, who are saddled with a materialised understanding, viewed Krishna as the vast cosmos. The great yogis with a tranquil disposition beheld that Krishna was the Ultimate Entity. All the males of the Brishni race saw Him as the Supreme Object of their worship.'

Every one will obtain the service of Krishna; even those will obtain it who are wandering in pursuit of other and diverse speculations. There will be in the long run an end of the wanderings of those who have gone astray. Because Krishna is the only Attracter and we are all of us attractable by Him. But there may appear temporarily a barrier between the Attracter and the attractable. As soon as the barrier is removed we shall experience directly the relationship of the attraction of our Attracter.

There may be companionship with the non-animate. This is called bad company. This bad companionship is practised by means of the physical body and the ignorant mind. It is necessary to give up this bad company. If we do so our real self, whose nature it is to be attracted by Krishna, experiences the direct attraction of Krishna. Krishna attracts the pure cognition. Exclusive devotion is a characteristic of pure cognition. One has no access to the spiritual realm till this quality of exclusive devotion makes its appearance.

The external world is also a source of one kind of knowledge. This knowledge is nothing but the entities of the external world in a refined form. The attraction excercised by these entities is accordingly also exerted towards the material cases. There is quite a variety of such knowledge, none of which is knowledge of Krishna. The knowledge of the undifferentiated Brahman, or that of the Supreme Soul, or that of the phenomenal world, which are gathered by the cognitive principle independently of the knowledge of Krishna, are all of them only different layers of the same class of knowledge. The Brahman which is a concoction of of the mind of the professors of the creed of the so called undifferentiated Brahman, can afford no glimpse of the real Brahman. The sight of the Supreme soul or undifferentiated union with Ishwara fancied by the pseudo-yogis is even a greater blasphemy than the dogma of undifferentiated union with the concocted Brahman. The professors of undifferentiated union with their concocted Brahman do not admit the existence of the individual soul. The professors of undifferentiated union with Ishwara admit the existence of the individual soul. They want to enable the individual soul to usurp the seat of God-head. This surely is an instance of a far more rebellious attitude towards God-head than even that of the votaries of the concocted Brahman. It is for this reason that Mahaprabhu has said that union with Ishwara is even more condemnable than merging with the concocted Brahman.

In order to discuss these subjects it is first of all necessary for us to have the true source of knowledge. Are these discussions derived from adulterated cognition ? Or is pure cognition their source ? Are they derived from any source made by man ? Or is their source made by Godhead ? If the source happen to be made by man there must exist the defects of mistaken judgement, inadvertance, etc.

What is the entity known as 'I' ? Am I the body that I have obtained from my parents ? Or am I the mind-intelligence-ego by means of which I am busy in making and breaking my resolves ? This topic contains a great many issues. We have had the opportunity of listening to these discussions from a very early beginning in our life. We have been discussing these subjects all through these fifty years. We had got much time for a good deal of discussion all through the twenty-four hours of the day. We have discussed these topics throughout the whole of the twenty-four hours of every day. We have discussed them while we slept as well as when we lay awake. This body also will fall away in course of discussing them for its further allotted period.

It is very difficult to get into the inner apartment of the discussion regarding 'I'. There stand ready at the two consecutive entrances two gate-keepers who are preventing all access to the vicinity of the 'I'. Why can't we get the sweet scent of the Body of Krishna ? Why does not the fifth scale note of Krishna's flute enter my ears ? Why do the tumult of the streets, the noises of the busy world pour incessantly into my ears ? At present the soul is asleep. His agent the mind, as manager of its sleeping master's concerns, is cheating me as intermidiary. I am addicted to go by the function of the mind. The mind whose business it is to cheat the soul, by its evil counsel is keeping me occupied on the path of selfish enjoyment. The soul is the master of the mind and the body. Speech functions as the foreman of a jury. The speech of pure cognition is of one kind, that of non-cognition is of a different kind. The mind is non-soul. This is borne out by the Geeta. 'The earth, water, fire, air, sky, mind, intelligence and ego are My eightfold material Nature. Besides these there is another entity of a quite different kind who is non-material. This last is no other than My manifestation as the individual soul. By means of the individual soul the material universe is maintained'.

The individual soul (jeeva) is then super-material. But he is, nevertheless, possessed of the marginal function. He has relationship with the process of birth-life-death. But the individual soul has also his place in the super-material sphere. The activities of the individual soul in this latter condition are called also transcendental. All that is perishable are included under Apara Vidya (empiric knowledge). All that is imperishable comes under Para-Vidya (transcendental knowledge). Transcendental knowledge stands on 'sumati' or the good disposition. The term 'sumati' occurs in the Veda. 'O Vishnu, we shall serve 'sumati' by simply uttering Thy living Name even with very little knowledge of His real meaning' (Rig. 1.156.3). May all of us gain this good disposition. May we gain that good disposition which prompts us to serve 'sumati'.

Time

(By H. W. B. MORENO.)

Set upon the finger
Of woman, man and child
Gleams a golden circlet
Pure and undefiled.

'Tis the precious, passing hour,
Sixty diamond minutes crowned ;
Yet how oft the circlet falls,
Heedless, on the stony ground,
Passed, unnoticed, by the way—
Lost, but never found.

Resting on the high brow
Of woman, man and child,
Glistens bright the jewel,
Hand hath not defiled.

There three lustrous gems outshine :
Pearl of youth, with peerless sheen ;
Manhood's sparkling sapphire ray,
Diamond of old age, serene ;
Yet how soon these priceless gems,
Listless fall unto the ground,
Mingling with the sordid dust—
Lost, but never found.

Who Am I?

We must call these attempts of those scientists of misdirected intellects and the stubbornness of these undeveloped brains—as the outcome of a grossly atheistic turn of mind in challenging the Omnipotency and supreme authority of Godhead and denying the existence of the very source and cause of all existence. Godhead is called "Vishnu" because He pervades the whole universe making all existence possible and upholding the universe with its manifested phenomena. Only the saints have the eyes to see it. So it is mentioned in the Vedas that only the saints do perceive the all-pervading, highest essence of Vishnu being the only Reality unlimited by space and time. It is not an hallucination but the sternest actuality more true and real than the limited senses can ever expect to perceive or comprehend.

Value of challenge.

The positive and negative sparks of electrones alleged to be contained in the atom are always being created and united in the work of universal integration by Him; but He entirely pervades each and every spark of electrone giving it its destined life and existence and guiding it to pursue the work ordained by Him. There are self-realised saints who may be cited as eye-witnesses to attest to the truth of the statement that the mahabhagabat or the saint on attaining the highest stage never sees the material forms or the elements of physical Nature and the cosmic motions of this universe—by means of which curtains Vishnu hides Himself to fulfil His great game. He (the saint) sees, wherever he casts his eyes; only the Form of Sri Sri Radha-Gobinda, the Divine Couple Who are the dearest and perpetual objects of worship of the real saint.

Each atom is sarcharged by Vishnu.

Even the average man of the world having a spark of sense of the Reality in him, may easily infer the existence of Godhead as source of Power and Beauty from the organising principle working in the world. All cosmic changes perceived in creation, though seemingly sporadic, are realisable as regulated by a grand purpose in a definite order and never the result of the working of blind chance like the casting of dice. The underlying reason governing the changes points to a Personality behind the idea or plan that is always realising itself with a purposeful future working in the seemingly inscrutable present across the restrictions of temporal and spacial limits; and the purposeful Agency behind the chain of manifestations must be the Great Final and Intelligent Cause Whom we call Godhead or Sri Bhagaban.

Hand of God is perceived in the World.

Gross form contains a subtle form within.

Challenging materialists fail to discern that the life is not a mere form of gross matter. Gross matter contains within it another subtle principle which again is supernaturally surcharged with a supermaterial energy and a wonderful consciousness with unlimited potentialities which are not the products of physical Nature but the physical Nature itself is regulated and held by them within their sway to help them to fulfil themselves according to the perfect conscious will of the personal, Supreme Godhead.

What is the subtle form?

The next question is 'what is the subtle form inside gross matter?' The subtle is the inner mental principle pervading the gross external form which we fail to perceive by the gross senses. Yet, however, it is the mind that gives life and power to the senses to perceive. The bodily sense-organs are mere dead machinery which are inspired to life and activity by the pervading energy of the mind.

Mind the conductor.

The mind is the conductor of the bodily structure and sets the senses and body to motion and work. Whatever the body does, it always does under the direction of the mind. Every part or limb of the body and even every cell appears to be completely and helplessly under the sway of the mind even although the limbs or bodily cells are not really subservient to the corresponding sensations of the mind to which they are conjoined. But the sense-perceptions of the mind are so inseparably correlated to the sense-organs of the body that their different scopes of actions and the existence of an ultra source of energy controlling both can hardly be suspected. The mind acts so nicely and subtly in association with the activities of the brain centre that the mind itself has been seriously supposed to be identical with the brain-cells.

Mind and brain cells.

It has been the greatest wonder to the physiologists how all their attempts have till now failed in discovering the subtle and deluding form of the mind which in such apparently perfect unification and identification with the brain-centres, moves and regulates the whole of the nervous system, the sense organs, the circulatory system and every part of the body both peripheral and internal. The body is a perfect organised whole which is prompted to every kind of actions of all of its parts and constituents corresponding to the sense-perceptions in the sense-organs instantaneously carried to all the channels and avenues under the strict control of the mind from its throne which is supposed to be somewhere in the brain-centres. It is very gratifying to the admirers of the mental function and even a little surprising to all to find the perfect methods of organisation and the unflinching physical loyalty of each and every individual part of the organism to their apparently unavoidable organic dictator and lord, I mean the mind. The communicated mental impulse of the sense-organs seems in its turn to set the gross parts of the body to work by means of an infinite number of channels, in perfect co-ordination to the mental function. Just as the cardiac movement is the immediate material cause of bodily activity and cerebral motion is the cause of the activity of the nervous system, so the mind or mental function is the material cause of the activity of the sense organs.

Mind the Dictator

But the mind itself with all its subtle sense-energies, is but the tenant-in-chief or the sole executive authority under the sway of the over-lord, the Self, who is the proprietor of the the mind and the body. The mind has nothing to do except to guide the senses in response to the stimuli of the material world. The mind reacts on the world and enjoys it through the different sense-organs and gathers the materials of its activities, the experimental knowledge by this means.

Mind and phenomena.

Enjoyment associated with sense activity and knowledge derived from such experience are the only assets the mind brings to its proprietor as fee or commission from its sub-tenants or agents. The working, enjoyment and experience of the senses and of the mind are simultaneous and inter-dependent, so much so that there seems to be no separation or opposition between them (sense and mind) as regards either function or interest. Thus we fail to discern the separate identities of the senses and the mind. On a methodical study of the processes of the mind along with those of the brain-centres, the seat of the mind, we find in organised order the sense organs, nerves and muscles in which the mental energy including sensation or states and processes expresses and embodies itself and through which the mind itself, in its turn, is likewise affected by the processes of the external world. It is also by means of the reversed processes that the mind can react on the external world and produce desired changes in its environment. To us all the phenomena that manifest themselves as the external world of matter mean nothing more nor less than the mental counterparts of the operations of the sense organs under the control of the mind on the data supplied by their contact with the external world.

Sensuous enjoyment and empiric knowledge are the assets of mind.

Thus the sensations are of the stuff of both the process of the mental function and the product of the same apprehended or occasioned in the mind in its relation with the external world. They are therefore the mental side of the phenomena in as much as the external world manifests to us its existence and attributes in and through these sensations and which also enable the mind to become aware of itself and the senses.

Sensations are effects of phenomena.

The senses being the instruments of knowledge and perception of the mind or rather the different phases of the mind, the proper identity of the mind can only be found in the combination of the senses and the senses being the correlatives of the phenomena, the mind is identifiable with the condition and phase of phenomena which come in contact with ourselves in the world of matter. Thus mind and material phenomena are correlative and co-existent entities being the supplementary conditions of our experience of them as enjoyer and enjoyed. Both of them assert their identity as supplementary aspects of the same thing joined together in the process of mental cognition.

Mind is the combination of senses.

The mind primarily consists of the five senses which are the exponents of its different faculties. The senses of hearing, of vision, of smell, of taste and of touch on the other hand stand in the perfect relationship of reciprocity with the corresponding elements of physical nature which are classified as the sky (or space,) the wind (or motion), the heat, the water (or liquidity) and the earth (or solidity). These elements of Nature engross and represent the above qualities and are consequently the reciprocal parts of the senses. Thus the qualities or the potencies of our five senses are reciprocally identifiable with the five elements each with each because in and through these elements alone they have their existence. So the sensory potencies or sense-perceptions, and the organs themselves, are not only dependent on but also identifiable with the corresponding elements of Nature from which they may be said to have been derived or originated.

Five senses are reciprocal parts of the elements of nature.

Hence the mind, though existing and working in a very subtle way is itself in regard to its function identifiable with the material principle in as much as in its external or active aspect it is the aggregate, or, rather the epitome, of the senses. Thus the mind is an epitome of the world or aggregate of the ideas of perceptions or experiences corresponding to the phenomena of the world and of the conditions of phenomena through which they have chanced to be apprehended. Such sensations and perceptions being derived from the material phenomena, the nature and condition of mind should justly be called material in its relation to the external world. These sense-experiences of the mind have generally been called संस्कार वा अध्यास (unavoidable categories of the mind) which, though subconscious at present, represent the material substance of the mind, and which the mind can not naturally avoid or get rid of. Even though the western philosophers have, one and all, distinguished mind from matter and have professed to depict mind to be spiritual or super-material, we find mind, as analysed and proved above, essentially material from the point of view of the phenomenal experience.

Mind is material.

The Theistic Conference

(Address on behalf of the conveners)

Gentlemen, I have great pleasure to accord you a hearty welcome on behalf of Sri-Viswa-Vaishnava-Raj-Sabha, and to lay before you in brief the object of this theistic conference.

I believe, it will not be exceptionable on my part if I beg to remind, at the very outset, the learned delegates and audience that this proposed conference of ours has been clearly characterised as 'absolutely' theistic. So we have got to particularly remember, on all occasions and at every stage throughout the session of this conference the wide gulf that ever keeps apart the 'Theistic (or transcendental) Goal' from non-theistic (empirical) goals, evils and phenomena. 'Transcendental' or theistic always reigns far beyond and above all mundane essentials, non-essentials and phenomena, as suzerain lord on the throne of what is eternal, unlimited, absolute, and supreme. Mundane essentials etc. owe their origin and dissolution in this world to the challenging and ascending paths of empirical knowledge while the transcendental always reveals itself to the world in the purely descending path of sincere submission. As this conference convened by us has been characterised as theistic it has to submit completely to the latter path of submission. And this special feature can never be departed from with any spirit of challenge open or covert. But that should never shut out any attempt to submit to the Transcendental in the path of submission with a sincere spirit of questioning and service.

We have informations from different people from different parts of India that it has not been possible for them to prepare their papers in response to our questionnaire within so short a period. For this shortness of time expected answers and papers from religious representatives outside India have not yet reached us. Under the circumstances it has been settled in an emergency meeting of the Viswa-Vaishnava-Raj-Sabha that there is a good case for holding another session of this conference which we hope to be better representative We have already circulated this decision in the columns of public newspapers both English and vernacular.

But since theistic discussion is a paramount duty and necessity of the sincere seekers of Truth, we propose at present to listen to the discourse which we may term preliminary. To approach the Truth in the way of listening to Him is the proper procedure of the truly theistic for the purpose of theistic discourse.

With regard to the procedure that has been decided to be followed in the session of this theistic conference, we here beg to remind the learned audience of our letters and notices published in both English and vernacular newspapers, and to inform that the President will take into consideration in the course of his discussion only those answers of the questionnaire issued by the Viswa-Vaishnava-Raj-Sabha which will be judged by him as worthy of such consideration : and which have been received before the 17th Oct. 1930 in the proper form of thesis with sufficient reasoning and authoritative support. It will not be possible to accept verbal answers on the spot at the moment from those who have failed to satisfy these conditions. They too, who have sent their answers in proper form satisfying all the conditions, will be required to follow the path of submission in obedience to the usual procedure of such theistic conference. If they will have further inquiries to put, they will then kindly note them down so that they may be discussed later on separately in periodicals or else-where with the permission of the President. The answers sent in by those who have defied all canons of reasoning, authorities, and even rules of decorum, or have disclosed their nervousness in hiding their identities, will be considered as unworthy of being considered in the theistic conference and hence rejected as a matter of course by the theists. Yet such of them also may be discussed in periodicals if and when it may be thought necessary for the benefit of the public, in order to show their contrast with the Truth.

The address over, the conference then proceeded to elect its president. Sreejut Narendranath Ghosh a pious Truth loving Zeminder of calcutta, then stood up to propose the Chairman in the following words :—'His Holiness Sree Sree Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj is the only fittest person to be the president of this theistic conference. I have not the least doubt that every one will be highly benefited to listen to the spiritual discourses from His lips. So let the presidential Chair of this conference be adorned by 'Om' Vishnupad Sri Srimad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Prabhupad. I hope, there can be no difference of opinion in this matter.' He was seconded by Srijut Rajendra nath Banerjee on behalf of the conference. Accordingly 'Om' Vishnupad Sri Srimad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj took the chair and delivered His address with some preliminary remarks and elucidation. A summary of the address of His Divine Grace appears on a separate page.

Godhead is at first realised as a single male Person attended by other persons, also males but with a different garb, as His worshippers. The Divine Person thus seen is Vasudeva. Unless Vasudeva actually manifests Himself to the spiritual eye of the pure essence of the receptive soul it is not possible to have any real knowledge of the Divine Personality by merely reading the scriptural descriptions of Him or in any other way. The scriptural descriptions of the Divine Personality become themselves intelligible only by the grace of Vasudeva, which supplies the key to their symbolical language.

It is necessary to state a little more clearly what is meant by the word 'symbolical' as applied to such descriptions. Let us take for instance the statement that Vasudeva is a 'male' Person. The word Vasudeva lends itself to be explained in a variety of ways and different etymological meanings are mentioned with approval by the commentators. The words 'male' and 'person' are also carefully explained by them to prevent their being understood in their ordinary worldly senses. So that whenever the really serious student tries to gather up all the suggestions of the different commentators for the purpose of having the right judgment, he finds the paltry resources of his faculties wholly insufficient for the purpose. Now take the case of another person to whom Basudeva has actually manifested Himself. This fortunate soul is in a position to understand the interpretations as corroborative of the subject of his experience by reference to his actual experience. Nay he is in a far better position even than that of the scientific investigator of physical phenomena. Because the very sight of Vasudeva has already removed all ignorance. So that the person favoured by Vasudeva has not to work up to a synthetic position by the analysis of sensuous experience that is itself unintelligible. Hydrogen and Oxygen combine to form water. But the process is not necessarily 'understood' by even actually witnessing the experiment. The 'discovery' of this 'relationship' on the other hand only serves to reveal unsuspected difficulties that stand between the act of perception and the subjective nature of the phenomenon perceived. But once Vasudeva really appears to our view the interval that separates us from the subjective Reality is spontaneously eliminated and we are not merely in a position to understand the interpretation but also to testify to its truth and to supply all its unsaid implications.

The name of any material object is not identical with the object itself but is of the nature of a symbol by means of which it is indicated in the futile empiric effort to obtain the real knowledge of the object. The symbolic nature of current language is also the reason why it is bound to fail to convey the real knowledge to the uninitiated. The symbolic is the equivalent of perverted, distorted and reflected expression. If a thing could be really known as it is, it should still be impossible to express or understand the fact by means of the current language. The practicability of obtaining perfect knowledge would also require categorical improvement in the methods of acquisition, retention, communication and reception of Truth. Does the scriptural method of communication, reception and retention of Truth satisfy these conditions ?

The Scriptures contend that all words yield their true meaning to the receptive faculty of the pure soul. The problem of a suitable medium is thus automatically removed. The interval between language and the thing expressed by language, is eliminated on the spiritual plane. This is what is meant by the scriptures when they declare that every letter of the alphabet means the Absolute Truth, Krishna.

With the worship of Vasudeva we enter the realm of the Absolute. Vasudeva spontaneously manifests Himself in the pure essence of the Soul. He is the first manifestation of predominating transcendence in the pure consciousness of the predominated individual soul. Purity of the receptive essence and manifestation of Vasudeva in the same, go hand in hand. For a pure soul there is no such thing as doubt or obscuration of the Dominating transcendent. Vasudeva is the first manifestation of the Object of our worship to the sincere serving disposition. There can be no worship properly speaking except on the plane of the pure soul who is free from all ignorance and all hankering for selfish enjoyment. No sight of the Object of worship can be had on the mental, hypothetical or sensuous plane. On the mental plane the concocted object of worship is really subordinate to the worshipper. The Object of worship does not manifest Himself on the mental plane in His proper Nature as the sole Receiver of all service.

The worshipper of Vasudeva is rewarded with an infinite and progressive revelation of the nature of the Object of worship. The worshipper of Vasudeva at the start finds himself located outside Vasudeva. But Vasudeva is found on closer acquaintance to contain also His correlative of the serving principle. The Male or Receiver of the extraneous service of males, is found to have a reciprocal subservient Personality constantly waiting upon His Person. Then there is found to be the golden link of love that binds this single female form to the side of her Lord in an indissoluble loving union. The female form continues to improve in respect of distinctiveness and magnitude till the male figure is realised as served by an infinity of the loveliest and chastest of consorts by the method of absorbing competing connubial love. Finally all conventional formalities are eliminated and the opposites of the chastest quality of self-less married love and the spontaneous amour of the purest maiden for the Lover Who is under no conventional obligation to any married spouse, are perfectly reconciled. The worshipper is now admitted into this charming circle as a male or female attendant.

There is no satisfaction for the individual soul till the platform of loving service in its highest form is reached. One who has no appreciation of the highest form of service will drift steadily to the other extreme of indiscriminate animation. These are the only alternatives before all persons. The chance of obtaining this choice also belongs only to human life. The Devatas who possess far greater capacities and powers and opportunities than human beings, are provided with ample selfish enjoyment of a most exquisite quality, and are consequently far less disposed than man to turn away from such pleasures. The so-called civilised nations of to-day run a similar risk of forgetting altogether or perilously minimising the higher issue.

The Gaudiya Math following the teaching and practice of Sri Chaitanyadeva stands for the highest form of service and is not prepared to make any concession on this point, for the reason that the full Truth alone is also at once both perfectly safe and easiest to serve. The Math, therefore, worships Sri Sri Radha-Madanmohan, Sri Sri Radha-Gobinda, Sri Sri Radha-Gopinath Whose worships symbolise respectively the highest Reference, the highest Process and the highest

Need of all individual souls. The Gaudiya Math admits the worships of Vasudeva, of Lakshmi Narayana, of Rama-Seeta, of Rukmini-Dwarakesha as being also pure forms of the service of Godhead on the spiritual plane at its incipient stages. The Gaudiya Math holds all forms of worship that fall short of the level of the worship of Vasudeva, as lying wholly off the spiritual plane, although it admits them to be natural forms undergoing evolution into different stages of spiritual ignorance. The Gaudiya Math holds that the difference between the spiritual and mundane planes is not one of degree but of category and that the one is not the mere sublimation of the other. The Gaudiya Math, therefore, is wholly opposed to the view that the practice of the so-called 'naturalistic' creeds is in any way necessary or helpful for the spiritual end. The different stage do not affect in any way either favourably or unfavourably, the possibility of spiritual enlightenment. The Gaudiya Math, therefore, keeps its portals open to receive all comers on its own terms and holds out the prospect of spiritual enlightenment to all on those terms. The Gaudiya Math is a truly scientific, catholic, practical seminary for ensuring the highest spiritual benefit of all persons without distinction of caste, creed, colour, sex or age.

There is one other point which may also be considered in this connection. The Gaudiya Math consists of worshippers and their only Object of worship. The Object of worship is worshipped by means of offerings or materials. The Temple and its appurtenances belong to the category of offerings. In pure service there can be no mundane reference. How then, it may be asked, can the Temple and the Archa (Image) Himself have any place in such function? The answer should be self-evident at this stage of our discourse. The Temple is in the same category as the language and the mind of the worshipper. If the latter may serve as 'symbols' for the purpose of worship why may not the former, and in exactly the same way? The Temple of Godhead is not a material entity any more than His Name or His Form. But the real nature of the Temple, Name and Form of Godhead is transcendental. They are also identical with one another. They are made manifest to us on the plane of physical phenomena by the grace of the Sadhus. The Gaudiya Math and Temple are such manifestations.

This makes the Gaudiya Math Building categorically different from mundane buildings devoted to a mundane purpose. By simply dedicating a building mechanically to the service of Godhead its nature is not spiritua-lised even symbolically. Mental concoction has no place at all in the affair. A person will not be the bonafide Guru if I simply choose to think him to be so. Although it is true that the pure soul realises the fact that every thing, as it really is, is located on the spiritual plane. But this is not the same thing as the supposition that there is no difference between the material and the spiritual or that the material or phenomenal is transformable into the spiritual by merely thinking that they are identical. The Gaudiya Math is not a material object which has been transformed into a spiritual entity by being dedicated to the service of Godhead. The Gaudiya Math possesses eternal spiritual existence which manifests itself on the plane of phenomena by the grace of the servants of the supreme Lord. If I serve Godhead my corporeal frame itself is not transformed into the spiritual body; because the two are categorically and really different. If I serve Godhead my mundane body is charged with the spiritual essence which is the stuff of my eternal self. It is thus no case of transformation or transubstantiation. It is more like the process of injection or suffusion. My house may also be so suffused with the spiritual essence by being really dedicated to the service of Godhead. But the Gaudiya Math is the actual spiritual entity itself, the source which has power to inject the spiritual quality into the mundane. The Gaudiya Math is not built of brick and mortar like our houses notwithstanding the testimony of ourselves to the contrary. Neither are its inmates mere clay surcharged with spiritual essence. The one is not identical with the other. The Gaudiya Math is not the symbol but the reality. The Gaudiay Math is the spiritual substance itself appearing as symbol by descending within the ken of our material vision. This is perfectly consistent with the highest empiric logic and the highest empiric experience, and so there need be no cause for consistent opposition to the Truth on the part even of mental speculationists.

Shree Shree Chaitanya Bhagabat

Continued from P. 158, October, 1930.

316. Biswambhar restrained Himself, feeling ashamed
He went out with His followers for a view of the Ganges.

317. Making His obeisance to the Ganges he received her water on his head.
He then sat on the bank of the Ganges with his companions.

318. As the son of Nanda surrounded by the cowherds,
Indulged in many a pastime on the bank of the Yamuna.

319. The Son of Sachi in like manner in the company of the devotees
Sported in Krishna-communion on the bank of the Ganges.

320. For a while bidding them all betake themselves to their homes.
Biswambhar bent his steps towards his own residence.

321. The Lord of all the worlds after accepting his meal
Turned his auspicious glance toward the sleep that unites God with His world

322. Night wore off; the whole body of his pupils
Turned up and sat to study.

323. The Lord quickly returned from his bath in the Ganges.
And assuming his seat began to expound the texts.

324. Nothing else save 'Krishna' manifests itself to the Lord.
He explained devotion to Krishna to explain every word.

325. The students enquired, 'What is 'verb' ?'
The Lord said, 'The same that bears the name of the Power of Krishna.'

326. 'Listen, brothers, to my explanation of aphorism of the verb.
I would like to meet the person who has power to refute my meaning.

327. 'All the kings that you may see possessed of goodly bodies'
Decked in gold and beautified by fragrant sandal.

328. 'In whose very words there is life and death as they say.'
Listen what state overtakes them for want of the active principle (dhatu).

329. 'No one knows whither departs the beauty of all their limbs'
Some bodies are burnt while some are got rid by burial.

330. In all limbs the power of Krishna abides as the vital principle.'
It is to him that all affection is rendered and all devotion.

331. 'By reason of his blundering judgment the teacher does not understand this.'
Brothers all, consider attentively whether this is true or not.

332. 'The person to whom at this moment we make respectful obeisance,
As soon as his vitality expires we bathe if we but touch his body.

333. 'To the mouth of the father in whose lap the son is nourished
The very son applies the cremating fire on the departure of vitality.

334. 'That which is termed 'verb' is the power of Krishna, the Beloved of all.
Is there the person who can deny this ?

335. 'Towards Krishna, whose power is so sacred and worthy of all worship.
All ye my brothers, render unflinching devotion.

336. 'Say Krishna, serve Krishna, hear the Name Krishna.
Contemplate the feet of Krishna night and day !

337. 'By offering at whose feet water with blades of the durba grass,
A person is put beyond the power of death for all time !

338. 'Who delivered Agha, Baka and Putana !
Worship constantly the feet of the same Son of Nanda.

339. 'By mere recollection that the divine name was not really that of his Son,
Ajamil hied to the realm of Vaikuntha.
Worship the feet of Krishna who is so merciful

340. 'By serving whose feet Siva goes about naked !
The service of whose feet is coveted by Lakshmi !

341. 'The glory of the excellence of whose feet is sung by Ananta !
I beseech ye with the blade of grass held between my teeth to serve even the feet of Krishna.

342. 'As long as there is life and strength in the body
May ye render devotion to the lotus Feet of Krishna.

343. 'Krishna is Mother, Krishna is father, Krishna is life and treasure
I beseech ye clasping your feet to direct your minds to Krishna.

344. The Lord in the mood of service spoke of His Own Glory.
Two quarters of the day passed and yet He did not cease.

345. The charmed pupils listened with wrapt attention.
No one could persuade his mouth to utter a single word in reply.

346 They were verily the servants of Krishna know this as certain.
Can those whom Krishna Himself teaches be any other ?

347 'After a while Biswambhar manifested His external consciousness.
He felt ashamed in His heart by looking at their faces.

348 'The Lord asked, 'How did I explain the meaning of the verbal aphorism
The students said, 'It appears to be even as the Truth, very self.

349 'The meaning of every word as Thou explained,
There is no one who is so utterly arrogant as not to admit.

350 'Whatever explanation thou offerst is perfectly true.
But the end for which westudy is different.

351 'The Lord said, 'Tell me everything.
It may be that the nervous malady has upset My mind.

352 'What import of the aphorism did I expound ?
The pupils said, 'In all of them the Name 'Hari'.

353 'Thou explained that Krishna alone is the meaning of the aphorism, commentary and gloss.
Who is fit to understand Thy exposition ?

354 'By listening to any utterance of devotion
Thou art so changed
That on beholding it one can never again regard Thee as a mortal man.

355 The Lord said 'In what form do ye behold Me !
The students replied, 'As the Perfection of all excellence.

356 'The tremor' the tears or the horripilation that deck Thee
We have never seen anything like of them anywhere else.

357 'Yesterday while Thou wert explaining the texts in the town
A certain worthy Brahman was reading aloud a certain verse.

358 'You swooned away on hearing the Sloka of the Bhagabat.
To our utter amazement there was no life in any part of Thy Body.

359 'Thou didst cry so on regaining Thy consciousness
That the holy Ganges herself seemed to join Thee company.

360 Till at last the trembling that manifested itself in Thee
Was such as to baffle the strength of a hundred persons to hold Thee properly.

361 From the feet up to the crown of Thy head the whole frame was heaved up with blissful horripilation
And the golden Form was enveloped in sweat, froth and dust

Ourselves.

Press Notices

The 'Liberty' as well as 'Advance' published detailed appreciative notices of the Procession of congregational chant through the streets of calcutta, the offering of the Peak of food and other events in connection with the opening ceremonies of the New Buildings of Gaudiya Math. A few of the sectarian papers published garbled accounts regarding alleged defects of management. These were promptly contradicted by distinguished eye-witnesses who testified to the most careful and courteous attention to all the spectators evinced by the organisers.

Departure of Sripad Bhaktiranjan Prabhu (J. B. D.)

The pious donor of the New Buildings of the Gaudiya Math took his departure from the scene of his wonderful devotional activities on the 19th. of November. He had been in precarious health for months. His sacred remains were followed by an immense reverential crowd of admirers to the cremation ghat. His widows declared their intention of building a suitable memorial to the departed on the grounds adjoining the New Buildings of the Gaudiya Math. The way in which J. B. D. worked for building the Gaudiya Math and the spirit by which he was increasingly inspired, has been briefly noticed in the first article. It is not possible to understand the purpose of J. B. D. without some real knowledge of the activities of the Gaudiya Math. May the wish of J. B. D. be fulfilled by the spread of the knowledge of the saving Truth represented by the preaching and practice of the Gaudiya Math. The unadulterated service of Godhead is the only need of all souls and the real cure of all ills. The Gaudiya Math stands consistently for this true ideal by word and deed against all un-Godly narrowness. It is no new doctrine, but only the proper presentation and practice of the eternal, function of all pure souls.

Sraddha ceremony of Bhaktiranjan Prabhu

This was performed at the Gaudiya Math by the relatives of the departed, on behalf of the devotees of the Math, on the 29th. of November. The ceremony was performed in accordance with the method enjoined by the Vaishnava canon. There was kirtan of Krishna in the Natyamandir of the Math in the afternoon. This was followed by the reading of Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita, a brief discourse on the life of Bhaktiranjan prabhu in the presence of the assembled Vaishnavas. A large number of Brahmanas and good souls were present, listened to Harikatha and honoured the mahaprosad.

The Spiritual Exhibition

It was held in the gounds of the New Buildings from the 5th. to the 20th. of November. It is described in a separate article. The Exhibition proved a phenomenal success. Practically the whole of Calcutta paid a visit to the grounds. There was no gate-fee. The Exhibition remained open to all comers from seven in the morning to twelve at night, although it was formally timed to close at ten. The arrangement was so perfect that no accident of any kind occurred. An attempt was however, made almost daily by a number of rowdies to disturb the people at the time of closing the Exhibition at night. They were put down by the goodwill of the neighbours who kept sharp look-out and volunteered their personal help in preventing rowdyism. The good name of Baghbazar was thus amply vindicated.

Departure

Sripad Krishnakantidas Babaji gained his depature from this world at 4. 15 P. M. on Nov. 4. He had been the recipient of the mercy of Thakur Bhaktivinod. He had been residing at Shree Godrumdham as servitor of Shree Shree Svananda sukhada kunja. Babaji had been performing the service of the kunja in a most satisfactory manner ever since the disappearance of Thakur Bhaktivinode. The devotees of Sree Chaitanya Math of Sridham Mayapur performed the utsab of of his disappearance at Svananda-sukhada-kunja on Nov, 14 with distribution of mahaprasad among those present, preceded by saukirtanam. Many Vaishnavas, Brahmanas and other good souls, resident at Sridham assembled to listen to Harikatha and sankirtanam from the lips of pure devotees and duly honoured the mahaprosad on this auspicious occasion. All present were most highly satisfied.

The Foot-Prints of the Supreme Lord

In the Temple of Jagannath at Puri there exist the Foot-Prints of Lord Sri Chaitanya on the stone floor of the room at the entrance of the Temple. The Foot-Prints of the Supreme Lord receive the hearts' worship of countless devotees every day. It is quite possible to pass this by as of no importance to any one in particular. It is also not impossible to find flaws. But are we sure that we really understand the psychology of devotion as it really is ?

The fashionable philosophy of Immanence will say that Godhead is Present in every thing. But will it also admit that He is specially Present in any thing ? Will it admit further that He has got a particular Form 'of His Own' ? It will most possibly suppose that the worship of the Foot Prints of the Supreme Lord is only a kind of devout anthropomorphism.

It is not, therefore, possible for the fashionable professors of the current forms of the so-called doctrines of Immanence and Transcendence to admit the Divinity of an apparently well-known historical personage like Lord Sri Chaitanya. But neither are those professors in a very tenabl position if they try seriously to justify their attitude of objection.

It is, of course, quite easy for any person to argue the case in favour of the personality of the Supreme Lord. We need not repeat all those arguments at this place.

We shall take it for granted, as an axiomatic Truth in the absolute sense, that the Supreme Lord certainly possesses the Perfection of Personality. Our next postulate is that the Divine Personality Proper 'corresponds' to that of a human being. Our argument is not that the Lord is bound to be human in order to be capable of being related to man in any intimate and complete manner. Our proposition is that the Divine Personality corresponds both specifically and absolutely to the human.

We also contend that this is no mere irrational dogma. It is capable of being established by the ordinary class of logical arguments to the complete satisfaction of the Logicians, if such satisfaction is really capable of touching the issue at all.

What after all is really the nature of what we are pleased to call, in and out of season, as the human personality? Is not such a phrase as human personality itself a gross contradiction in terms to a consistent Logician? Is it not also really begging the question at issue? What in this sense would be such an entity as the dog's personality? Does it mean anything connected with the external form of that useful animal? Does it refer to any peculiar mental states of the species? We should say that we do not really know. Because the personality is not an external adjunct. What does the dog claim for himself as his personality? It is, of course, possible for the master of a dog to describe the disposition of his favourite in a manner which may appear to him to be more or less complete. Will such description be regarded as the personality of the dog? We should unhesitatingly say 'No'.

The personality is, if at all, a self-conscious principle. Has a dog got any such principle? He appears to have none. We have at present no means of knowing if he has. If the dog could communicate himself to me in any reciprocal way which would leave no doubt in my mind as regards the whole chain of his cogitations then also I could not be sure that I really know him as he really is. I must like to be further satisfied that he is not deceiving me or himself. I would ask, 'Does the dog also really know and express himself?' After all these conditions have been fully satisfied I would still remain prepared for changing my conviction if necessary in the light of further experience. Thus I would remain practically where I was at the very beginning of my enquiry.

Personality may, therefore, be defined as a perfectly self-conscious entity in reciprocal relations with other like entities as expressible in terms of any one of the latter. What, if any such thing there be at all, is then the thing which we are pleased to call human personality ?

We have agreed to call him the soul. Is the soul that inhabits the human form in any permanent and recognisable way different from the corresponding entity, if any, inhabiting the form of the dog ? We are not in a position to answer the question, because we are not really acquainted with either of them.

The Scriptures say that there are differences in the souls that correspond to those of the external forms. It is for this reason that it has been possible to describe the happenings of the spiritual world in the language of this. As in this world man occupies a position of superiority to the so-called lower animals and there is no condition that can be conceived as more enviable than his, on the whole, so also in the corresponding realm of the spirit the human is the most enviable of all condition. God-head is the Highest Reciprocal Human Person of the spiritual realm.

The Lord is never human in the anthropomorphic sense. The Humanity of the Supreme Lord is capable of fully preserving His super-human status. The full man includes the conceptions of male and famale. Both principles are combined in the Supreme Person as their real and ultimate Source. But the Personality of the Lord also embraces every other entity. This is not in human nature. Man is only one distinct species. Even human soul, as in the spiritual realm, does not possess the Greatness and unlimitedness of the Divine soul. For one thing the two are always distinguishable as Source and His derivatives. The source is one and common to all the different species of individual souls. The individual soul is of the nature of power and not of the Nature of the Possessor and Source of power. The individual soul can, indeed, be absorbed in his Source by the Will of Divinty ; but he can never be Divinity. He can have his own distinctive existence as a strictly subsidiary entity by the Will of the Divinity.

It is possible for the individual soul to know Divinity in any form and measure according to the Will of Divinity. The individual soul cannot know Divinity otherwise than by His causeless grace. But this does not reduce him to any condition less than the fully spiritual. The Divine Nature and Divine Omniscience are communicable to the individual soul by the Will of Divinity, but he still remains in his own right what he really is.

Those who were so empowered by Sri Chaitanya, were made fully aware of all these implications of their relationship with the Supreme Lord.

They did not profess to be either anthropomorphists or Divinities in embryo. But they were aware of the Divinity of Sri Chaitanya by His own right.

Those who affect to disbelieve the doctrine of Appearance of the Divinity to the limited view of mortals in His Own Proper Form of the Divine-Human, must be judged to be given to perversely dogmatising on the most serious of all the concerns of life and one to which they know they have at present no access what-so-ever. It is perfectly open to the Lord to behave in any way. It is not possible for our present muddy understandings to think, without dogmatic assumptions, on any subject. We may be disposed, in our hollow vanity, to question the competence even of the Supreme Lord to go against our dogmatisms. But such an attitude will not help anybody to arrive at the Truth.

The Lord possesses everything, and, therefore, also possesses Hands and Feet of His Own. His Foot-Prints also reserve the power of appearing to the view of the people of this world and without forfeiting their Divine and superspiritual Nature. The worship of the Divine Foot-Prints of Sri Gaursundar by the highest of devotees, therefore, need cause no disbelief in any person by merely appearing to be anthropomorphic.

THE HOLY BIRTHPLACE OF THE SUPREME LORD SRI-KRISHNA CHAITANYA

Prof. N. K. Sannyal M. A.

For the purpose of the identification of the geographical site of the different villages that according to Bhaktiratnakar constituted the tract of the country which bore the name of Nadia, the antiquarian can have no better help than the local traditions. The present names of the villages must in any case deserve his chief attention. Next in order of importance should naturally be any actual topographical descriptions of the sites from the pen of any reliable writer. We know what help the student of the antiquities of India receives at almost every step from the topographical descriptions of Hiuen Tsang.

The description of the topographist must also be adopted as the starting point of the antiquarian enquiry. Bhaktiratnakar fortunately supplies us with such a starting point providing a connection with the times of Sri Chaitanya. It is not necessary at this place to discuss the date of composition of that work. It will suffice for our purpose to accept the current view that that account is at least two hundred years old. But it is the only available comprehensive source.

According to Bhaktiratnakar the town of Nabadwip is so called on account of the fact that it happens to consist of nine distinct groups of settlements formed by the intersections of the different branches of the Bhagirathy. These nine settlements are named (1) Antardwip (inner island), (2) Simantadwip, (3) Godrumdwip, (4) Madhyadwip, (5) Koladwip, (6) Ritudwip, (7) Jahrudwip, (8) Modadrumdwip, (9) Rudradwip. Of these nine 'islands', according to the same authority, the first four, in the order of enumeration, are situated on the east bank of the Bhagirathy. The remaining five are on the western bank of the main channel of the same river. The house of God, viz. the residence of Sri Jagannath Misra, was situated in Mayapur in Antardwip.

This general account is supported wherever such evidence is available, by the topographical notices in all the old writers, including the contemporary biographers of Sri Chaitanya.

The difficulty presented by the shiftings of the courses of the various branches of the Bhagirathy thus offers no insurmountable obstacle in the way of the enquirer. Many of the old names still exist in this locality. For example the town of Nabadwip bears the old name. It is now applied to the town which is situated on the west bank of the Bhagirathy. Thakur Bhaktivinode discovered the village of Mayapur on the east side of the present main course of the Bhagirathy, which is located almost opposite the present town of Nabadwip. The name is not Miapur. The Muhammedans of the place themselves also pronounce it as Meyapur not Miapur. So there is no difficulty about the identity of the name itself as Mayapur.

The name is locally pronounced by the illiterate masses as Meyapur or Mayapur. This is a dialectic peculiarity. The word 'tākā' is pronounced as 'teka'. 'Māya' is similarly pronounced as 'Meya'. It is not a case of the short 'i' being rendered by 'e', which was also a favourite practice of the transliterators of Vernacular words into English. Sectarian dishonesty must not be allowed to blunt the edge of Scientific caution in dealing with the proper nomenclature of the place. The subject became recently one for official investigation in connection with the naming of Sree Mayapur Post office All the resources of fanaticism, corruption and interested, unprincipled intrigue, backed by the literary efforts of mercenary writers, were shamelessly employed in misrepresenting the real fact. But the Postal Department and the district magistrate were nevertheless enabled to find out the untenable nature of the contentions of those who represented that Miapur, and not Mayapur, was the proper name of the village. I have since heard that the superintendent of the Archæological Department was also approached to declare against the identification. But naturally enough nothing came of the effort. I would, nevertheless, join that numerous band of antiquarians who have often expessed their desire in favour of the excavation of the sites of Ballal's Mound and Suvarna Bihar being taken up in earnest.

To the person with any antiquarian sense the difficulty is all but solved by the traditions that linger still in the village itself. We know from the villagers that the present Muhammedan inhabitants who are in occupation of part of Mayapur, are the descendants of recent immigrants. The village was in a depopulated condition before the coming of the Muhammedans. That it was at one time a place of residence of Vaishnavas, is also known to these Muhammedans. They also know that it is the Birth-place of Sri Chaitanya. They have inherited some names of the different parts of the village such as Vairagidanga (Vairagi's mound), Khol bhangar danga (mound where the khol was broken), Barajpota (Brajapattan), Sivadoba (Siva's pool), etc. These names refer to famous incidents in the Career of Lord Chaitanya and the Vaishnava tradition. There are also current in the village highly significant superstitions The Tulasi plant grew perennially all over one of these un-occupied homestead lands. Those who had attempted to occupy the land for purpose of habitation or even of cultivation, found that all crops are inevitably destroyed by the irrepressible Tulasi plants and some terrible harm befalls the occupant. Every one is also cautioned against following any portion of that particular mound in any way. Many had suffered terribly for trying to do so. That mound is sacred ground, because Nimai was born there. The Muhammedan inhabitants make offerings to the shrine that was subsequently erected on the spot. They firmly believe that the place possesses supernatural qualities. It would be worth while to collect all the current stories which are fast becoming mythology as the villagers are becoming irreverent and partisan by outside influence.

That these traditions were naturally taken to be genuine is proved by the fact that when the site was identified forty three years ago by Thakur Bhaktivinode as the village Mayapur where Sri Chaitanya was born, no person belonging to the locality disbelieved him. As a matter of fact there was no opposition from any quarter at that time and for a long period afterwards. These facts are known very well to many of the old inhabitants both at town Nabadwip and Krishnagar.

If these traditions that are current in the locality had not existed there must naturally have been causes for the gravest doubts as regards the identity of an old site that had stood on the bank of a river which has constantly shifted its course within the memory of living men.

The genuineness of these traditions is fully borne out by the detailed descriptions that are found in the Bhaktiratnakar. Thakur Bhaktivinode has identified the present town of Nabadwip with Koladwip of Bhaktiratnakar. The town of Nabadwip has preserved traces of its old name of Kulia in the compound-names Kalia-daha, Keblar khal, Koler ganj, Gadkhalir Kol, Tegharir Kol; these names belonging to localities within the boundaries of the present town.

There is another landmark. The house of Chand Kazi still stands. The house continues to be the place of dwelling of the descendants of Chand Kazi. Maulana Shirazuddin played a prominent part in the early Career of Sri Chaitanya. He happened to be the fouzdar in charge of Nabadwip at that time. Alauddin Husain Shah was then Sultan of Bengal. Chand Kazi tried to prevent the congregational chant, the method of worship which was wholly novel, that had been instituted a short time before by Sri Chaitanya. Maulana Shirazuddin was induced by a section of the Hindu residents of Nabadwip to try to put a stop to the new mode of worship. Those Hindus had represented to the Kazi that the worship was opposed to the religion of the Hindus. The rapid spread of the worship, especially among the masses, was stated to be a menace also to the security of the Muslim faith. Much capital was also made of the noisy character of the worship which disturbed the sleep of all peaceful inhabitants.

The house of Chand Kazi is a place of pilgrimage for both Hindus and Muhammedans. Over against the tomb of the Kazi there still stands one of the botanical wonders of the Age in the shape of a Champuka tree which is reputed to be no less than four hundred years old. The house of Chand Kazi was situated on the same side of the Bhagirathy as the risidence of Jagannath Misra, the father of Sri Chaitanya.

This is definitely established by the description of the route of the first Nagar Sankirtan headed by Sri Chaitanya Himself, that was led by way of a public demonstration to the Kazi's house in defiance of his orders forbidding the congregational chant in Nabadwip.

The details of the route of this first Samkirtan along the streets of the city have been preserved in the Chaitanya Bhagabat, the earliest of the biographies of the Lord. The work was written by Thakur Brindabondas, nephew of Sribas Pandit, in whose court-yard the congregational chant was being performed by the Lord with closed doors at this time. Thakur Brindabandas writes that the Lord on this occasion took the procession of the citizens along the path, that existed in Nadia also at the time the book was being written, along the bank of the Ganges. The description is to this effect. 'The Lord went first of all to His Own bathing ghat. This of course could not be on the other side of the river. The Lord danced long at His own ghat. Thence He went to Madhai's ghat, Barakonaghat, and the citizens' ghat; passed through Ganganagar to Simulia. The village of Ganganagar appears on the Settlement maps down to the year 1917. It is now in the bed of the Bhagirathy. It is quite close to Mayapur. From Simulia the procession went to the Kazi's house via Sridhar's yard. The Bhagirathy was not crossed, and did not require to be crossed.

Nadia was then the collective name of the settlements on the east side of the Bhagirathy. We have the distinct statement in Chaitanya Bhagabat, which is quite close to the time of Sri Chaitanya, that 'there is only the Ganges between Nadia and Kulia'. The other place-names, that occur in the description of the route of the first Nagar Kirtan, are Gadigacha, Pardanga, Majida, besides the villages of the conch-dealers and weavers. We find in the Chaitanya Bhagabat that the Lord after His usual midday nap used to loiter about the different quarters of the town. Te quarters that He thus visited included the same villages of the conch-dealers and of the weavers. His return home from His daily afternoon visit to these places, is also mentioned. He had not to cross the Bhagirathy to reach home. The village of Gadigachha still remains, close to Mayapur and on the east side of the river.

Such corroborative evidence from the most authentic records may be easily multiplied. The reader is referred to a most interesting publication of a very recent date on this subject viz. Chitre Nabadwip by Rao Saheb Saradindunarayan Ray who has collected many of the passages.

. Bhaktiratnakar mentions that the village of Atopur, which, says the writer, is the same as Antardwip, had disappeared long ago. But Mayapur was then in tact. The book suggests definitely that Atopur adjoined Mayapur. It seems from these words that the river washed away a large portion of Antardwip, the inner island not very long after the Dis-appearance of the Lord. The voice of Sridhar could be heard, according to Chaitanya Bhagabat, from midway between the yard of Sribas Pandit and Sridhar's own house.

The existence of the more important quarters of the town at the time of Sri Chaitanya on the east side of the Bhagirathy, is testified to by the existing mound that goes by the name of Ballal Dhibi, supposed to be the site of the place of king Lakshman Sen, and also by the Ballal Dighi. It may be noticed in this connection that in Govinda Das's karcha Ballal Dighi is mentioned as adjacent to the yard of Sribas Pandit and the house of Ballal Raja as close to the Dighi. There is no tradition connecting any place on the other side of the present course of the Bhagirathy with the Sen kings of Bengal who had their capital at Nadia at the time of the Moslem conquest.

This leads us to the question of the position of the river at the time of Sri Chaitanya. We receive no direct help from the maps in this matter. Our oldest maps are not much older than a century. It is, however, a testimony to the continuous existence of the Mayapur portion of the group of villages, which is designated by the name of Antardwip or the inner island in Bhaktiratnakar, that the learned compiler of the Statistical Account of Bengal has not failed to mention the place. The interesting passage deserves to be quoted in full. "To Baira belongs the little town of Mayapur (near the Burdwan boundary) where I am told the tomb exists of one Maulana Sirajuddin who is said to have been the teacher of Husain Shah, king of Bengal (1494—1522)." (Statistical Account Vol. 1. P, 367). It may be noticed that Hunter spelled the name correctly as Mayapur.

In Bhaktiratnakar we are told that Subarna Bihar, which appears to be a very old Buddhistic site as yet unexplored, could be seen from the home of Sri Chaitanya. This accords with the site of Mayapur. It also proves that the eastern side of the river was more famous in old times than the western and, that also, from a very remote antiquity. The name as well as the site of Subarna Bihar, are still intact. The place is not very far from Mayapur and is on the east side of the Bhagirathy. Lastly it may be mentioned that the learned author of the Viswa kosa informs us in his preface to Chitre Nabadwip that the name Mayapur is found in an old manuscript of an unpublished work which bears the name of Bhabishya Brahmakhanda. The manuscript was first noticed by H. H. Wilson in the Indian Antiquary of 1891. Wilson is of opinion that the work was written shortly after 1550 A. D. In that work Mayapur is stated to be a large village on the bank of the Bhagirathy. The writer of Bhabishya Brahma-khanda does not make any distinction between Mayapur and Nabadwip where, he says, Gauradeva will appear. The testimony also points to the existence of the name Mayapur from at least as early a date as the name Nabadwip itself, if not from an earlier period.

The information supplied by Major Renell's map is thus indicated in the body of a Judgment and Decree of the High court (of Calcutta), 12th August, 1896, quoted in Chitre Nabadwip :—According to Major Renell's map of 1780 there were three places in the river Ganges below Belpukur, where two streams met, one above the island of Nuddia, one below that island and the third below the island of Mohisura.....it would probably be the first confluence below Belpukur, which would be meant by the words 'Dogangnir Mura' in the huddabandis of 1199. In this proceedings Mr. Dampier on the authority of a decision of Mr. Moore, District Judge of Nadia dated 28th December, 1830 declared that the southern boundary of Jalkar Kasimpur was a point where two streams passing by both sides of old Nabadwip met.' It is easy to trace the first confluence of Jalangy and Bhagirathy at the point in Renell's map called therein Jalkar Dumduma which was situated to the north of old Nabadwip. The second confluence at the southern extremity of Jalkar Kashimpur is identifiable with the present confluenc at Hular ghat.

There is thus a wonderful consensus of evidence from all quarters which points conclusively to the accuracy and truth of the identification of the ancient site of Mayapur, in the antiquarian sense by Thakur Bhaktivinode.

I have looked into the papers that have been circulated by a Babaji in favour of Ramchandrapur being accepted as the site of old Nabadwip. His contention is based on the fact of a temple having been erected by Dewan Gangagovinda singh for the worship of Rama Seeta, the ruins of which are supposed to be recoverable by proper digging. But I fail to understand how this can supply any connection between the site and that of Mayapur, the Birth-place of Sri Chaitanya. In spite of the frivolous nature of the contention and the openly sectarian purpose of the promulgator of the view, it is necessary in the interests of antiquarian truth, to taken otice of the fact that any cause is capable of being backed by a certain member of people by the persistent misrepretations of the most ignorant type of paid quacks. It is necessary to be above all forms of prejudice, sectarian or otherwise, if the antiquarian issue is to be handled in a really scientific manner.

It is not necessary, however, to confound the antiquarian issue with the spiritual, nor to belittle the later in any way. Those who are curious about the antiquarian issue need not be necessarily curious to know anything about the subject that invests the place with the halo at spiritual interest of the most captivating nature. The Life and Teaching of Sri Chaitanya belong to the category of spiritual events that have much more than a merely earthly interest. Such interest is not in any way comparable with antiquarian or narrow mundane interest. It is this larger issue that invests Sridham Mayapur with its eternal interest for every soul.

Thakur Bhaktivinode is our only guide in any endeavour to make the real acquaintance of Sridham Mayapur, the object of his most fervent longing devotion. He has left most detailed and luminous exposition of the spiritual subject. The circle of Nabadwip is the indivisible spiritual Entity. The circumambulation of spiritual Nabadwip has been instituted on the basis of the exposition of Thakur Bhaktivinode. The treatment of the antiquarian issue does not touch the fringe of the Absolute. May the pure devotees pardon my effort to treat the spiritual subject by the antiquarian method. May they pardon this performance in consideration of my imperfect desire to save the holy eternal Abode of Sri Gaursundar by the dedication of a mundane capacity that happens to saddle me and prevents me from directing my attention exclusively to the spiritual issue.

In Memorium

J. B. D. has built the Temple of God,
Right in the heart of Calcutta.
He has built with care the holier abode
Of His servants, the Gaudiya Math.

J. B. D. is gone from among the people
Whom he had loved with all his heart.
May he be praised with right good will ;
For so we may understand th' devotee's part.

For such was truly th' immaculate soul,
Who had served the Vaishnavas in every act.
Un-alloyed devotion to the Lord was the goal
That made him choose the humbler part.

Who can recognise the soul that loves
His Lord with a singleness of heart ?
He may know who really strives
Fully, in his turn, to serve the Lord.

It is our duty to praise J. B. D.
In words untainted at their source,
By devotion's Language that is the Lord
Who teaches our souls to praise His grace.

Let us praise the servant to please the Lord,
Whom J. B. D. had, indeed, served so truly.
The Lord has a special love for the good ;
This they know who serve Him fully.

The Lord is the Beloved of all our souls ;
J. B. D. has built the Home of our Lord.
Here all who love Him, need assemble,
To win the special favour of God.

The Gaudiya Math is J. B. D.'s memorial ;
Nay, the Math is his living soul.
Brick and mortar make not the Temple ;
They only delude the perverse soul.

J. B. D.'s soul is the Gaudiya Temple,
The Divine Pair there sit enshrined.
May the holy sight bless all the people !
May J. B. D. be thus ever praised !

This holy Truth is borne upon my soul
That the Lord e'er fulfills His servant's will ;
For the pure in heart have no other goal,
They minister to God's pleasure still.

J. B. D. wished that all the people
May truly serve the Supreme Lord.
The Lord has fulfilled His servant's will
By making him build the Gaudiyas' Math

J. B. D. knew this as he toiled
Night and day at the commissioned task.
He knew that the Lord had accepted,
When the call did come, his work.

'Twas this peace that made him leave
This world with an easy mind ;
He gained Sri Guru's blessing that gives Assured access to the Presence Divine.

Let all rejoice that our deliverance
Is wrought by faith of each loyal soul ;
May J. B. D.'s Memorial ever impress
This saving truth on the hearts of all.

May we realise God does not scorn
To abide in brick Temple reared by faith ;
He ever dwells in His devotee's home ;
He loves so to live in the Gaudiya Math.

The Truth is never conceivable
To the paltry reason of worldly man.
The Lord Himself appears to all
In Forms repugnant to our brain.

But His actual sight does bless our reason,
And imparts th' power to understand,
How the Lord is served by every form,
Although He never is of the world.

Presidential Address

(Delivered at the spiritual conference, second day, October 25, 1930.)

Regarding Reference.

I bow humbly to the lotus feet of Shree Guru. Yesterday there was an opportunity of saying a few words by way of a preliminary discourse. But there was really no discussion regarding the subject on the agenda. We have, therefore, fallen back by one day by the test of our programme.

The object of the present discussion is that by its means we shall be enabled to know something really useful. We had desired to hear something from those persons who have a love for or are well-versed in this particular subject. We ourselves are that species of animals who have sold themselves body and soul to the lotus feet of Shree Gurudeva. This being so there may be persons who might ask why we are anxious to hear what other people have to say. I touched this point in my yesterday's discourse.

The theists study also the non-spiritual Scriptures. They do so for a negative purpose. They are also found to quote non-spiritual Scripture when it happens to be in their favour. They do so in order to establish more firmly what they say. In the same way we also may attain greater faith in the Real Truth obtained from Shree Gurudeva, by hearing many things from others.

We may not have heard many things that are familiar to the empiric scholars. This is our misfortune. It is possible to be more firmly convinced of the Truth of our words by listening to them. I do not nurse the ambition of becoming a Pandit of empiricism by hearing anything from them. I do not engage in the vain endeavour of acquiring worldly knowledge. If it is necessary to know anything regarding the ways of the world it would not be amiss to place one's confidence in those learned persons for such a purpose.

We have heard from the lotus feet of Shree Guru the following text of the scriptures. 'O Muni (who art given to mental speculation), whatever act is performed, whether it be mundane or Scriptural, should be performed in the way that is conducive to the service of Shree Hari, if one is really anxious to attain the function of spiritual devotion.'

We happen to be servants of the devotees of Godhead. We are not servants of either elevationists or liberationists. We are the bearers of the shoes of Hari's own. Under the circumstance we do not join issue with the communities that desire any other thing beside the service of Godhead, viz., elevation or liberation. There is thus no question of victory or defeat for us.

But the supreme need is also our need. We accordingly circulated a few questions among the other communities, if they could give us any information regarding that supreme need by means of their ideas or language. But they have not been able to understand even the language of the questions. They have failed to understand properly the object of our questions, in most cases. In many places that which has been deemed necessary for their purpose, has been of no use to us. Some persons being unable to answer the questions have manifested their weakness in many ways. We have gained the quality of being deaf to such remarks. A number of persons endeavoured to attain eminence as men of action. Some men tried to gain other objects of desire than the service of Godhead. A number of persons industriously engaged in the quest of the undifferentiated Brahman. Others again tried to realise the goal of monism. But we know that the worship of Dharma, artha, kama or moksha is merely deceitfulness. In other words they have a close connection with my addiction to the non-self. They are not the utterances of the liberated soul. They are the delirious talk of the conditioned soul.

There had been a time when Shree Gaursundar in course of his pilgrimage to different parts of India, instructed the people in these words, 'Whomsoever you meet, instruct him about Krishna. Deliver this country by becoming Guru by my command'. At that time the question arose in our mind as to how we were to discourse regarding the supreme object of desire if we were not ourselves self-realised souls. Thereupon Shree Gaursundar gave us His assurance, 'In this matter you will not be obstructed by the current of worldliness. At this very place you will obtain My company once again'. Use every endeavour for the Divinity. Do so from the position in which you happen to be placed. In whatever country, in whatever Age in whatever ego you may happen to be, use all your endeavour for the Divinity. If we have to carry out the command of Shree Chaitanya there is no other alternative but to discuss all those words that we have heard from the Lotus-feet of Shree Gurudeva. The only duty of the servant of Godhead is to try to do that by which one's skill in performing the service of Godhead is continuously developed. The only thing that is worth praying for is this that our mind may be more and more attracted towards Krishna. We do not want riches or followers or to be saved from the misery of birth and death. In this world different persons desire other than the service of Krishna. They desire dharma, artha, kama and moksha. They worship various gods for obtaining what they desire. But we when we are in the presence of Mahadeva, say, Glory to the ruler of the realm of Brindabana, whose forehead is adorned with the moon who is worshipped by Sanandan, Sanatana and Narada, chief of cowherds, may thou bestow on me unceasing, unconditional love to the twin lotus feet of the amorous Hero of Braja. When we approach Katyayani we say 'I bow to thee, Katyayani, who have power to delude, who have power of causing all occurrences, who have power over us. May the devi make the Son of the cow-herd Nanda, my Husband.

We do not pray either for the cure of disease or for liberation by the simultaneous destruction of both disease and patient. We approach them and say, 'May you bless us that our minds may be directed to Krishna'. The people of this world pray for being the possessors of things that are other than Krishna. But the lotus feet of our Shree Gurudeva instruct that Krishna is the only Possession. We are in the grip of non-spiritual prepossessions. They obstruct our quest of Krishna. It is necessary to discuss how we may be rescued from the clutches of such prepossessions. It is for this reason that our questions were framed. We did not wish to pick other's pockets. We did not intend to inconvenience others. We are above such meanness. Those who are addicted to the service of lust and anger may judge differently. But we have heard from our former Guru Shrila Madhabendra Puri regarding our proper duty. 'I have carried out, in every way, every form of wicked directions of lust and other passions. But they have had no pity on my poor self.

They continue to trouble me shamelessly and remorselessly. Lord of the Jadus, for this reason, just now, giving them up, knowing the truth I have come to You to throw myself on Your protection which saves from all fear. May You employ me fully in Your service'.

We are indeed beggars. But for that reason we are no beggars of desires that pander to the gratification of our senses. It had been our prayer that all communities of sadhus might consider the mercy of Chaitanya Chandra. They would be filled with the greatest admiration, if they do so. Our prayer has been formulated by one of our Acharyyas in the following words, 'Holding the blade of the straw between my teeth, falling prostrate at your feet, making hundreds of humblest supplications. I say this, 'O, you sadhus, casting away everything from afar, practise loving devotion to the Feet of Chaitanya Chandra'.

What Sri Chaitanyadeva has told us in a special manner, the straight path by following which man can be delivered from all sensuous desires, is nothing, else but to accept the protection of the service of Godhead. He said, 'For one who is free from all sensuous desires, who is anxious to serve Godhead, who is desirous of getting across the ocean of this world, the contemplation of, or association with, worldly people and carnal women are, alas, worse even than the swallowing of poison'.

It is better to commit suicide by swallowing poison rather than associate with people who desire other things than Krishna, or practise the enjoyment of such things. Having once begun to serve Hari if such a person becomes attached to things other than Krishna, he is thereby utterly ruined. Bharata became King of Bharatavarsha. He had formerly practised a great variety of endeavours for spiritual progress, had practised asceticism, had made actual progress on the path of the service of Hari. But he had to be born as the cub of a deer. He had conceived a very slight desire for an object other than Krishna. He had wished to perform what is ordinarily known in the world as an act of kindness. It was nothing more serious than a slight desire to serve a helpless animal. For this reason Bharata had to be born as the cub of a deer. Therefore the lotus feet of our Sri Gurudeva command us to have no other duty except the service of Krishna. 'May you have your mind fixed towards Krishna' is the only proper benediction.

Advaitacharyya on one occasion enacted the pastime of preaching the doctrine of undifferentiated union with the Brahman. Shri Gaursundar desired to put an end to his activities.

For this purpose He set out from Sree Mayapur in the company of Lord Nityananda. They proceeded towards Santipur by way of Lalitpur. At Lalitpur they met a sannyasin who kept the company of prostitutes. The two Lords, full of Divine Pastime, sought the hospitality of that profligate sannyasin. The sannyasin blessed Mahapravu Whom he considered to be an ordinary boy. 'May you have riches, descendants, a good wife and learning'. On hearing this benediction of the sannyasin Mahapravu said it was no blessing at all but a curse. The only real benediction is that one may obtain the favour of Krishna. The adulterous sannyasin, on hearing these words, said to Mahapravu, 'I have today direct experience of what I heard before. Now-a-days if anybody desires well of another and says so, that person returns the favour by belabouring his well-wisher with the cudgel. I find the behaviour of this Brahmana boy to be exactly like that. I most gladly blessed him that he may gain riches, followers and good fortune. I had no other object than his well being. This boy thinks that it is no benefit but an attempt to do him harm. He is ready to blame me for this'. Thereupon Lord Nityananda looked wise and displaying the gravity of a guardian of the boy said to that profligate sannyasin, 'It is not up to you to argue with this boy. I have understood how great you really are. Do not be offended with this boy, for my sake'.

The adulterous sannyasin was pleased with the words of Nityanandapravu. He offered to feed him. Nityananda sanctifies the fallen. Nityananda and Mahapravu having bathed in the Ganges ate the fruits given Them by the sannyasin at his house. Presently the profligate sannyasin threw out repeated hints to Nityanandaprabhu for accepting 'ananda' meaning 'wine'. The wife of the sannyasin forbade him to annoy the guests in that manner while they were taking their meal. Mahapravu asked Nityanandapravu, 'What does the sannyasin mean by the word 'ananda'? Nityanandapravu was acquainted with the behaviour of all kinds of persons. He informed Gaursundar that the adulterous sannyasin referred to wine by the word 'ananda'. No sooner did Biswambhar catch his words than, muttering the Name of Vishnu, He at once gave up eating, performed the achamana and without delay ran to the Ganges with Nityanandapravu and plunged into the stream.

By means of this Act Mahapravu taught the duty of avoiding bad company. He taught more than this. In the words of Thakur Brindabandas, 'The Lord favours the adulterous and the drunkards. Yet He kills one who is versed in the Vedanta if he maligns the sadhus. This person was a sannyasin. Yet he did not hesitate to drink wine. He also kept company with carnal women. Yet the Lord went to his house. If he is not actually benefited in this birth it will do him good when he is born again. The only persons whom the Lord does not love in His heart, are those who speak ill of others maliciously. All the atheistical sannyasins missed the good fortune of obtaining a sight of the Lord. This is proved by the case of 'all the sannyasins who lived at Kasi'.

Those who desire liberation and expect to merge in the undifferentiated Brahman are greater hypocrites than even those who desire worldly enjoyment. Accordingly Shri Mahaprabu has advised all persons, who really seek their own good, by all means to avoid their company.

Urbashi found that the period when she could gain her selfish purpose was over. She did not hesitate forth-with to desert Pururaba or Aila, King of Chandravansa. Thereupon Aila, feeling the cruelty of Urbashi, was cured of his hankering for worldly enjoyment. It was in this connection that Shri Bhagaban said to Uddhaba, 'Therefore one who is wise should attach himself to the companionship of the good, giving up completely all association with bad men. The very words spoken by the sadhus have certainly the power of destroying all evil tendencies of one's mind'.

The only duty of the sadhus is to cut away all the accumulated wicked propensities of every individual. This alone is the causeless natural desire of all the sadhus. Worldly people possess a double nature. They express one kind of sentiment but internally cherish a different purpose. Moreover they want to advertise this duplicity as a mark of liberalism or love of harmony. Those who are unwilling to show any duplicity, wish to be frank and straightforward, or in other words, to exercise unambiguously the function of the soul, such really sincere persons are called sectarian and orthodox by those who practise duplicity. We will cultivate the society only of those who are straightforward. We will not keep company with any person who is not so. We must by all means avoid bad company. We are advised to keep at a distance of a hundred cubits from animals of the horned species. We should observe the same caution in regard to all insincere persons.

Who is a Brahmana?

In the light of the spiritual principle which the varnasrama system was meant to serve, by scientific interpretation of the Scriptures that have a bearing on this issue, from what has already been said it would appear that the Brahmana, who is at the head of the institution, is himself in need of constant control from persons who are placed above the institution. The paramahansa is not subject to the guidance of the Brahman. On the contrary it is the Brahmanas who must always look up to the paramahansa for enabling them to perform their duty towards other sections of the organised community in the sense required by the Scriptures.

In any scheme of revival of the spiritual varnasrama organisation the initiative and absolute control of the paramahansa is the one essential condition. But how will it be possible to find out the real paramahansa? It will not do to try to elect him by the democratic methed. The Scriptures declare that the paramahansa is delegated the requisite power of getting himself accepted as autocratic organiser of spiritual society when such is the will of Godhead.

At the time of Sri Chaitanya the attempt was made to establish the spiritual community. It was necessary to compile a code of regulations for the guidance of the members of such society. These regulations were collected mostly from the extant dharma-shastras. The system itself was necessarily of a highly elastic nature. The paramahansa was given complete freedom of interfering with every part of it. The word 'Vaishnava' was adopted as a general designation of all members. They were graded into four classes. The paramahansas formed the first class. Under them came the class of senior students, in training under the paramahansas. Below these came the junior Brahmacharins who had been admitted to the status of spiritual pupilage. The fourth class consisted of candidates who were waiting as probationers for admission as students. This was the spiritual community proper. It consisted entirely of celebates. We accordingly find no provision for marriage in this community.

The spiritual community was set up alongside the secular society which was hereditary. No attempt was made to change the customary regulations of the hereditary society. But it was open for all members of the secular society, married or unmarried to become members of the spiritual community by eschewing the worldly life. A member of the secular society desirous of entering the spiritual community, was not, however, compelled to cut off all external connection with secular society. But he was to live the spiritual life even when he was allowed to retain his external connection with the secular society. But the secular society already possessed a code of regulations, which was also supposed to be part of the Scriptures. As a matter of fact, as has been already stated, the code that was compiled for the regulation of the 'Vaishnava' community, was itself derived from this class of literature which bears the generic name of Dharmashastra. There had been a time when the spiritual regulation had not yet become adulterated. But the line of demarcation between the spiritual and the worldly was lost sight of in course of time. And, later still, the worldly was also supposed to be a spiritual concern.

For instance let us take perhaps the most characteristic of all the secular regulations, namely the compulsory marriage of girls at a very tender age. This is now regarded as one of the fundamental parctices of orthodox Hindus. According to the spiritual code of regulations compiled by direction of Sri Chaitanya the paramahansa is perfectly free to marry if he likes. But one who is not a paramahansa need not marry at all. It is also not obligatory for a paramahansa to marry. The provision that is found in all the secular codes, viz., that the obligatory marriage is for the strictly spiritual purpose, should be perfectly meaningless according to the code of Sri Chaitanya. Therefore the spiritual professions of the secular codes need not be taken seriously, in even a single instance. Their whole spirit and outlook are necessarily purely secular. As such they may, or may not, possess any merit in terms of worldly value.

It is perfectly conceivable that there should be and if it be the will of Godhead, can be, a society of paramahansas. But such a society would not require any code of regulations. Such codes can apply, if they are spiritual, only to those who are in the stage of pupilage. But as we have seen that those who are under spiritual training must be celebates, therefore, there can be no regulation regarding marriage in any spiritual code. This is perfectly consistent and philosophical. It is also in accordance with the rules actually laid down even in the secular codes for the guidance of pupils during their period of training.

The idea of samabartan or relapse into the worldly state, after completion of pupilage, is unknown to the spiritual code. It no doubt provides a clue to the attempt to preserve the appearance of connection between the secular and spiritual codes. But the regulations regarding marriage must have been obtained from elsewhere. The 'Vaishnava' householders of the code of Sri Chaitañya are paramahansas. They might belong externally to any class of the secular society. There is no distinction between a 'vaishnava' householder appearing in a hereditary Brahmana family and another descended from a Sudra lineage. They are, neither of them, either Brahmana or Sudra. They may submit externally to the customs of any class without any real possibility of ever getting identified with any worldly class.

There is, therefore, no real point of contact anywhere between the spiritual community and the hereditary secular society. The former is essentially individualistic. A 'vaishnava' is never born, nor can he die. Therefore, neither birth nor death are really of any importance to him. The institution of marriage also ceases to be necessary for him for the same reason. This cannot be comprehensible to those who are not vaishnavas. Worldly people also value the principle of social freedom. But they value such freedom for ensuring increase of worldly enjoyment. This they are pleased to call by the highsounding names of progress, prosperity, well-being, happiness. They are naturally very anxious to secure these. It is for this reason that they devise such institutions as those of marriage, divorce, etc. But how can these institutions find a place in the code of the 'Vaishnavas'?

All that is feasible is to set up a purely spiritual community with its own code of regulations to be administered by those to whom the authority may be delegated by the head of the community who can be no other than the paramahansa.

The existence of the spiritual community is however, bound to react beneficially on the practices and ideas of the secular societies that may exist alongside the spiritual. There need be no opposition of interest between the two groups. Many of the regulations of the non-spiritual Dharmashastras are regarded as being of a salutary character by those who look at them from the worldly point of view. The spiritual code has nothing to do with such regulations. The 'Vaishnavas' have no ambition of regulating secular society from within. They know very well that the secular can by no means be improved into the spiritual. The two are categorically different from one another.

The varnasrama institution is, therefore, of the nature of a purely secular arrangement. But this arrangement itself may or may not be opposed to the spiritual outlook and guidance. If it is not opposed to the ideal of spiritual living it can only do so by frankly admitting its own inferiority and avoiding all rivalry. It should also allow any of its members to be freely enrolled in the spiritual community. It should, by all means in its power, encourage conversion to spiritual life. If the secular society is organised and administered in this spirit, it should be appropriately described by the designation of 'daiva'. Any secular society which is deliberately opposed to spiritual living, is no less appropriately termed 'asura'. The difference between the two is described in the Gita.

It is not possible for the secular society to be converted en masse into the spiritual. It is, however, possible to convert it into the daiva varnasrama society. It is also possible that daiva varnasrama classification itself is not based on heredity. The Gita says so. It will be necessary to study all the implications of the position. For this purpose also the autocratic guidance of the paramahansa is necessary, for avoiding conflict with the spiritual society. But as a daiva varnasrama society happens to be a carefully graded organisation it should not be possible to do without the leadership of Brahmanas within the society. The Brahmana, as leader of the daiva varnasrama society, is nearest in position to the society of the 'vaishnavas'. He should, therefore, be fully alive to the unconditional superiority of the 'vaishnavas' in all matters.

Matters of moment

Religion and state

THE omnipotence of the state cannot be rationally admissible. The state must be held accountable for its behaviour. It should not for example be allowed to patronise a bad religion. It must be prevented from persecuting true religion. If possible, it should be enabled to serve true religion.

The spiritual interest is by no means incompatible with the real well-being of humanity. Unless a nation is sincerely prepared to make its politics serve the ends of true religion it is bound to reap only misfortune by such a policy There can be no conflict between the true goal of one individual and those of all other individuals, collectively or severally. This is the preaching of all true religion. It is worth while for political science to take cognisance of this all-important fact.

Bonafide mistakes are no doubt possible ; but they are also avoidable, if there is a real will to avoid them, especially in this matter. I am stating the only true ideal which is alone really practicable. The political philosopher must not allow himself to be carried away by the mischievous notion that it is unnecessary and impossible for the state to pay its complete homage to the Truth. He should make a real attempt to avoid the professedly suicidal course.

The true religion is infinitely more than co-extensive with all possible range of human activity. The Truth includes the state by assigning it its natural function. That function has admittedly never been fully discharged by any state up till now. At least this seems to be the verdict of history of most countries. But despite all this weight of authority in favour of the wrong side it will not be unreasonable to insist that the attempt of making the state a servant of the Truth deserves to be seriously made.

I am, therefore, in favour of a policy of enlightened discrimination in the dealings of the state with religion. It is unfortunately true that worldly people will naturally like to use the state for gaining their worldly objects. But this will be no excuse for the state to use its resources for misguiding the people. In this respect the state must be considered as an institution on its trial. It should deserve to exist only if it can prove to itself its genuine intention of serving the cause of the Truth.

The teacher of the true religion should, therefore, receive the best of attention from all responsible politically minded persons. This is not incompatible with the democratic or any other ideal of the stage. It is absolutely necessary to make the democratic stage a real success. How else than by the above method can all opinions of individual and minorities be really attended to ? The democratic state need not on principle adopt the avoidable policy of gagging unfairly any activity or expression of opinion of any of its members.

As a matter of fact the current of history has been all along leading the state towards this inevitable consummation. It is destroying, in a sufficiently wholesale fashion, all narrow fetiches and prejudices. It is high time to think of avoiding the hideous tyranny of undiluted animalism which is being recommended, in no uncertain terms from many quarters. The needs of the soul are in danger of being altogether ignored. But the counsel of animalism cannot fortunately satisfy its own demands. It is however, no less difficult to induce animalism to listen to the counsel of the spirit. Animalism above all prides itself on not being able to understand at all the existence of anything else than a mind under the thraldom of a material body. It does not understand, neither does it want to understand, how there can be a soul who is not also altogether dependant on the physical body. The delusive triumphs of the physical and mental sciences if they are interpreted in favour of animalism, stand in the way of the awakening of the soul.

Religion is not merely a concern of individuals. It is vital also for the community. The modern state is justified in refusing to subordinate itself to any dogma which is not intelligible to the community. By this attitude it is fitted to recognise and welcome the real Truth if and when He will be pleased to reveal Himself to the open-minded communities of the modern world.

Bharata and Rantideva

(By Sj. Kishori Mohan Paul, B. L.)

We are sure there are many amongst us who have heard about the anecdotes of the two kings, Bharata and Rantideva in the Srimad Bhagabatam. But it is doubtful, if from a comparative study of the characters of these two great personages the invaluable lessons and instructions to be derived therefrom, have attracted the careful attention of many of us. Our Acharyya (spiritual Teacher) Sri Jiva Goswami Pravu, one of the famous six Goswamins, has given us a most valuable lesson drawn from the lives of these two persons.

So much absorbed are we in the infatuations of 'Prakriti' (Maya) that we are apt to consider as supremely excellent only those things that are favourable for the satisfaction of our mental aptitudes or for the gratification of our senses. We lack the capacity to accept the lessons of the Acharyyas eternally established in the functions of the pure soul, in the light in which they are intended to be seen. This counts for nothing less than misfortune. Too fond of mundane talks, we fail to think over any matter seriously for being established in our natural state. No sooner a person puts forth any novel idea that tickles our minds or our senses, we run after him as an 'Avatar' (a manifestation of Divinity); and like a flock of sheep blindly following one of themselves, we accept his idea as gospel truth. If anybody attempts to thwart the perversities of our ever-changing speculations by means of the scriptural doctrines, we do not hesitate to describe him as an orthodox, monotonous and conservative person, quite unacceptable to our circle.

The great man among us says, 'What is the good of specially searching after the Absolute when He is manifested in so many forms before us and that serving the Jeevas is tantamount to serving Godhead?' We think, 'How magnanimous and high-souled a personage he is!' But we never pause to consider how much magnanimity or liberality is really displayed. Too much attached to the fleshy concerns and the doctrine of our worldly hearths and homes, we recognise magnanimity only in a person who seems to extend his charity to a wider circle. Like virtuous talks to a sinner, moral talks to the libertine, lessons of attachment for a married wife to one addicted to a harlot, talks about heaven to one in hell, remarks of the above nature readily captivate most worldly people. But if anybody, by the mercy of a teacher who is unifluenced by mental speculations being well-established in the spiritual state, is enabled to take an impartial view of the same, he will find nothing but Godlessness in every word of those remarks. Duped and fascinated by the hypocritical favour of Maya (illusion), we are apt to consider all Godless talks as identical with magnanimity and we fail to understand that there can be no 'poverty' in Narayana (The Lord of the Goddess of all good fortune) and that Narayana can never be in 'poverty'. Like light and darkness, like God and 'Maya', 'poverty' and Narayana can never keep company. It is a great misfortune if we think that Godhead is subject to the power of Maya and Narayana can come under the clutches of poverty. It is a great pity that loose thinking in this matter pervades the whole world and the hellish doctrine that affects to regard matter and spirit as coming under one common category, has been annihilating the natural function of the spiritual consciousness of the peoples of the twentieth century. A Jeeva is an infinitesimally small portion of the spiritual Essence of the Full Absolute consciousness and is, therefore, His eternal servant. All his wants and inconveniences are the outcome of his wilful forgetfulness of his service of Godhead and their removal leading to the attainment of the highest good, are necessarily of the nature of the realisation of his eternal servitude of the Supreme Lord. Just as the attainment of wealth drives out poverty as a matter of course and makes one rich and happy, so the attainment of unalloyed devotion to Krishna brings unto him Krishna-Prema (Spiritual Love) which dispells all poverty and incidentally the threefold miseries of this world, though these latter are not the direct nor intended result.

In ancient times there lived a king of the name of Bharata. He was so firmly established in the natural function of the soul that he was called 'Rajarshi' (saintly king) by the people. The 'Varsha' (country) in which we live now was originally named 'Ajanabh', but after Maharaj Bharata became the king, it came to be called Bharat-Varsha after his name. After having reigned for a period that was proper Rajarshi Bharata renounced his householder's life and resorting to 'Pulahasrama' applied himself wholeheartedly to the worship of Godhead. His 'Asrama' was situated on the bank of the holy river Gandaki, the best of all resorts for pilgrimage where large numbers of Sree Narayanashilas are to be found. Living all alone in this sacred place and worshipping Godhead with various flowers, buds, tulasi, water, fruits and other appropriate offerings Bharata attained to the state of the highest bliss. With a heart free from all hankerings after things of this world, he passed his days peacefully in the worship of Godhead. Gradually the 'Sattwik' symptoms of his sincere devotion of Godhead, in the shape of tears, shiverings, signs of ecstacy manifested themselves on his person. One day after bathing in the river Gandaki as he was seated on the bank of the sacred stream chanting the 'Pranava' (Vedic Mahamantra), a thirsty deer in her full pregnancy came to the river side for drink, and, as she was about to drink the water, she heard the terrific roars of a lion near by. A deer is always timid and easily frightened. The terrific roar of the lion resounding in the lonely forest agitated her in a most violent manner. She had not yet quenched her thirst. But apprehending imminent peril and looking about with fearful eyes, she took a sudden big leap to cross a sheet of water, that lay in front of her. It led to abortion of the cub from the womb and an end of the mother's life. The new-born cub fell into the stream. Bharata, although engaged in worship of Godhead, could see all this from his position on the river bank. Is there anyone who can be so hard hearted who would not be moved by such a piteous sight? King Bharata was not an exception to this rule. To save the cub of the deer, saintly Bharata stopped in the midst of his worship. He thought that according to the scriptures the Sadhus (saints), being naturally the friends of the helpless, ignore even their own interests, for showing mercy to the distressed. Thinking in this way he hastened towards the spot and rescued the cub from the current. Bharata then applied himself with assiduity to the occupation of rearing the motherless cub. Rajarshi Bharata had betaken himself to the forest, by renouncing his kingdom, wealth, wife, children and all the pleasures of homelife for the purpose of worshipping Godhead. But alas! now, in place of the service of Godhead, the image of Narayana (Godhead) engrossed in the state of utter helplessness which is but a contrivance of 'Prakriti' (Maya), came upon his vision. The deluding energy of Godhead, finding the golden opportunity, spread her fatal influence upon him. As the result of his erroneous supposition that Godhead can ever be anything but transcendental he was thrown off from the devotional paltform and attachment to desires other than those appertaining to the service of Godhead occupied his heart as a matter of course. Unable to realise the sweetnees of that transcendental service of Godhead and falling under the clutches of His deluding energy, he strayed further and further away from the path. 'What's the good of searching after Godhead,' he thought, 'when He is present before us in so many different manifestations?' Thus the favourite cub came to be looked upon by him as the Form of Godhead and he lost all sense of his real relation with Godhead. Taking 'Maya' to be Godhead, he degraded himself and owing to his constant meditations about the deer persisting on his death-bed, he had to be re-born as a deer.

Rajarshi Bharata was a righteous person who had been fully engaged in the service of Godhead; but, due to the effect of bad actions of previous births, he could not help cherishing this solitary evil desire. He was not a perpetual and deliberate offender like the Mayavadins (Pantheists) who ascribe 'poverty' to Narayana, impute the grossness of Maya to Godhead, consider the eternal spiritual pastimes of Godhead to be transitory, and imagine pseudo-'salvation', or annihilation of the soul to be the highest attainment of life. But, for the reasons mentioned above, Bharata had a temporary confusion of judgment. He was not so stony-hearted as to indulge in the Godlessness of the Mayavadins and pseudo-salvationists. Hence in course of time when the better consciousness prevailed again and he could understand his error arising out of the effect of bad actions of previous births, he repented, saying, 'Oh, what a trouble! I have been thrown off from the path of true knowledge. What a fool am I to think that the mind which formerly actuated me to abandon all my worldly attachments in order whole-heartedly to concentrate on the service of Godhead and on many devotional activites in a lonely forest and after long and incessant devotional endeavours firmly to establish myself in His service, has in consequence of my association with the cub of the deer, ended in snatching me from the Feet of Godhead!'

From this character, sketch of Bharata, Acharyya Sri Jiva Goswamipad has drawn the following lessons for our enlightenment. Each and every Jiva being the eternal servant of Krishna, it is the incumbent duty of every body to associate himself in their service of Godhead. If, instead of doing this, one busies himself in ministering to the comforts of others or considers the gratification of his senses to be superior to the service of the Godhead and makes false pretence of thereby serving others or society and is enamoured of such acts of so-called beneficence, he is sure to come under the bondage of this world. Any advice recommending such so-called beneficent activities as they are in no way in conformity with the service of the Absolute Truth, can not but lead to most evil consequences, enhance one's Godlessness and deflect one from the direction of the true objective, viz., the pure devotion of Godhead. However much such misguided persons may boast of their theistic (?) disposition or pride themselves upon being the benefactors of their country and of humanity, and however much they may be looked upon by their fellows as the most liberal of religious preachers, association with such persons is a bar to the attainment of unalloyed devotion to Godhead. The real benefactors of humanity are those who are firmly established in the service of Godhead than which there is no other mercy available to the Jeeva. The Supreme Lord Sri Chaitanya has instructed all persons to show this true mercy to all Jeevas and Srila Vasudeb Thakur also acted up to the same ideal when he said 'O Lord ! allow me to take upon myself, the sins of all Jeevas and suffer all the tortures of hell, so may Thou let them be relieved of their triple misery without the least delay'.

Let us now turn to the picture of another character on the other side of the canvass. In older times there lived a king of the name of Rantideva, reputed for his generosity and magnanimity. Unlike king Bharata he was not a recluse but led the life of a Vaishnava householder and all his wealth was utillised for the best of causes, viz., the service of Sri Hari. Fasting himself he satisfied others with the offerings of Vishnu ; and it often happened that, everything being exhausted after lavish distribution, he had to fast with his whole family. Sometimes he had to pass a whole month upon water only. He always tried his best to foster in all sentient beings, irrespective of their status, the eternal good of their souls by offering to them Sri Mahaprasad. His prayer to Godhead was not to attain to the state of the eightfold perfection of the Yogins, or the self-annihilation of the pseudo-salvationists, but it was to the effect that the afflictions of all souls due to their aversion to Godhead might be removed if for such a consummation he had to take upon his single shoulder all their sorrows and troubles.

Finding this spirit of benefaction in Rantideva, Vishnu-Maya (the deluding Energy of Godhead), in order to test the stretch of his patience, brought and offered to him objects of temptation covetable even by Brahma and other high gods. But Maharaj Rantideva who was far above all those temptations, honouring them from a distance, quite unattached and free from all other desires, fixed his heart and soul in Vasudeva, the sole Lord of the pure heart.

In comparing the character of Rajarshi Bharata with that of Maharaja Rantideva Srila Jiva Goswami Prabhu has observed that although Bharata renounced his wife, sons, wealth and all, yet for the offence of trying to remove the physical miseries of Jeevas he had to fall from the service of Godhead ; on the other hand Maharaja Rantideva, realising the true nature of Jeeva's eternal relation to Vasudeva, tried to secure for them the eternal good of their souls, and thereby the effective removal of their worldly miseries too, by offering them Mahaprasad in his capacity of a servant of Godhead and was thus enabled to overcome the influence of Maya. Even the most covetous position of Brahma, the much desired 'perfections' of the Yogins and the fictitious bliss of the pseudo salvationists could have no effect upon him. All his actions, being performed fully for the satisfaction of Vasudeva, had the effect of being transformed into various forms of devotion to Godhead. But the efforts of kindness of Rajarshi Bharata being limited within the scope of this mundane world turned out to be the thraldom of 'Maya' and felled him down from the service of Godhead.

The gist of the conclusions of the Acharyya has been summarised thus. That no one should invite Godlessness by listening to the counsels of those addicted to things other than the service of Godhead ; no one should ascribe 'poverty' to the Omnipotent Narayana ; no one should indulge in the erroneous belief of supposing that mixing of Maya with Godhead is possible ; that according to the scriptures these offending persons, though they may pass themselves off as 'Jibanmuktas' (persons who even in their present life are free from the bondage of this world) are liable to pass through the cycle of births and deaths. Hence everyone should engage himself in the service of Godhead, the fountain-head of everything, because watering the root of a tree, and not merely its leaves and branches, keeps the tree alive ; and the offering of food to the stomach, and not to any other organs of the body, alone may also keep the body alive. Therefore we should look at all sentient beings as the eternal servants of Godhead, serve His devotees whole-heartedly and try to enhance in all who are averse to Godhead their good fortune by the offering of Mahaprasad and chanting of Krishna-Kirtan by which alone they can, in course of time, be enabled to acquire real health and find an end of all their miseries. This is the only true way of showing mercy to all Jeevas as well as to oneself.

Preaching in Jessore

His Holiness Tridandiswami Srimad Bhaktiviveka Bharati Maharaj gave an exposition from the Bhagavatam on the 3rd of December in the village Ramanandapur, District Jessore, before a large gathering of Hindus and Mahammedans All were impressed by the true words from the lips of His Holiness. From Ramanandapur His Holiness proceeded to Gazirhat where by means of the exposition of the Bhagavat and the method of Samkirtan the religion of pure devotion was preached by His Holiness for four days.

Sri Madhva Gaudiya Math, Dacca

The annual anniversary celebration of the Madhva Gaudiya Math, Dacca Branch of Sri Chaitanya Math, commenced on the 17th of December 1930. Their Holinesses Tridandiswamins Srimad Bhaktiviveka Bharati Maharaj, Srimad Bhaktiswarup Parbat Maharaj, Srimad Bhaktiprakash Aranya Maharaj and Srimad Bhakti Srirup Puri Maharaj graced the occasion by their presence. The metropolis of East Bengal witnessed a most vigorous propaganda of the religion of pure devotion preached and practised by Sri Chaitanya Deva. All available space of the Math, which was most sumptuously decorated and brilliantly illuminated, was thronged by an eager crowd of sincere souls who joined in the daily devotional functions consisting of expositions of the Bhagavat, Samkirtan and mutual discussion. The streets of the City were paraded by great processions of Congregational Chanters. Lectures were delivered at different important public places. On the 22nd of December 1930 at the instance of the professors and students of Dacca Intermediate College Sripad Sundarananda Vidyavenode, editor of the Gaudiya, delivered an address on the catholicity of Vaishnavisim at a gathering of the professors and students of the Intermediate College and of the local gentry.

Shrine over the bodily remains of Bhaktiranjan Prabhu (J. B. D.)

His Divine Grace Srila Bhaktisiddhanta Saraswati Goswami Prabhupad placed the remains of the body of Srila Jagabandhu Bhaktiranjan Prabhu, entered into Vaikuntha, in the grounds adjoining the newly built temple of the Gaudiya Math by the method of the congregational chant. The community of the devotees, former relatives of Srila Bhaktiranjan Prabhu and people from different parts joined in this devotional function. We understand that a most beautiful temple will shortly be constructed over the resting place of the bodily remains of Bhaktiranjan Prabhu. The foundations of the temple of Sri Gaudiya Math were laid by His Divine Grace on the anniversary day of the advent of Srila Jiva Goswami. The foundations of the memorial temple have been laid on the anniversary tithi of the disappearance of Srila Jiva Goswami Prabhu.

His Divine Grace in Orissa and the Madras Presidency

His Divine Grace Srila Bhaktisiddhanta Saraswatiy Goswami Prabhupad with a party of confidential disciples set out on the 23rd of December 1930 from Sri Gaudiya Math, Calcutta on a tour of South India, with the object of inaugurating shrines of the Holy Footprints of Sri Chaitanyadeva at some of the principal tirthas of the South visited by the Supreme Lord and also for the purpose of visiting some of the tirthas in the Madras Presidency and Travancore that have been sanctified by the Holy Dust of the Divine Feet. His Divine Grace was accompanied by Sripad Bhaktisaranga Goswami Prabhu, Sripad Anantavasudev Vidyabhusan Sripad Atindriya Bhaktigunakar, Sripad Narayandas Bhaktisudhakar Bhaktishastri, Sripad Sakhicharan Bhaktivejoy, Sripad Gopalchandra Bhaktiratna, Acharyyatric Sripad Kunjavehari Vidyabhusana, Sripad Jadubardas Adhikary Bhaktishastri, Sripad Rashbehari Brahmachary and a number of other devotees.

His Divine Grace installed the Foot-Prints of the Supreme Lord within the temple of Sri Varahdeva at Jajpur on the 25th of December 30, in the temple of Sri Kurmadeva at Kurmachala on the 26th, in the temple of Jiyada Nrisinha at Sri Sinhachalu on the 28th at Kovvur on the bank of the Godavari on the 29th and in the temple of Pana Nrisingha at Mangalgiri on the 31st of December. All these tirthas had been sanctified by the Visit of Sri Chaitanyadeva and the Foot-Prints Shrines have been erected in commemoration of that auspicius event in the History of the South. The Spiritual significance of these devotional function is treated in a separate article. We intend to present the reader with detailed account of the tour in the next issue.

Travels of the Supreme Lord Shree Krishna Chaitanya in South India

LORD Chaitanya renounced the world and accepted sannyas in the bright fortnight of the month of Magh in 1510 A. D. at the age of twenty-four. The Supreme Lord arrived at Puri in the month of Falgoon. He witnessed the Dola festival at Puri. He delivered Sarbabhauma Bhattacharyya in the month of Chaitra. In the month of Baisakh He set out on His travels in South India.

The Lord proposed to take no one with Him on His journey. He was, however, persuaded by Nityanandapravu to have with Him a Brahmana of the name of Krishnadas. Sarbabhauma Bhattacharyya supplied the Lord with four sets of lower and upper clothing worn by a sannyasin (kaupin bahirbash). Sarbabhauma also requested the Lord to meet Ramananda Rai who was then stationed on the bank of the Godavari as Governor of that part of the country which was part of the independent Hindu kingdom of Orissa. Lord Chaitanya was accompanied by Nityanandapravu and a number of devotees up to Alalnath.

The Supreme Lord took leave of Nityanandapravu and the other devotees at Alalnath. From there He was accompanied only by Krishnadas as He moved on His way to the South loudly repeating the Name of Krishna. In every village where He passed the night the Lord, by infusing the Divine Power into those persons who surrendered themselves at His Feet, commanded them to make the people of the whole country Vaishnavas. These persons thereupon taught the religion of bhakti to the people of other villages. In this manner the number of bhaktas increased rapidly.

When the Lord arrived at Kurmasthan by journeying in this manner, He there bestowed His mercy on a Brahmana who also bore the name of Kurma. At this place the Lord delivered the Brahmana Basudeva after curing him of leprosy. The Lord subsequently bore the Name of Basudevamritaprada for delivering Basudeva in this manner.

After visiting Jior-Nirsingha the Supreme Lord met Ramananda at Vidyanagar on the bank of the Godavari. The meeting took place very close to the river as Ramananda came to perform his bath there at the time. At the request of Ramananda the Lord put up at the house of a vaidic Vaishnava Brahmana at that place.

Rai Ramananda in humble attire presented himself before the Lord at His residence in the evening and made prostrated obeisances. Then followed the famous conversation between the two on the subject of Divine amour. Mahapravu put the questions and Ramananda Rai answered them. Several successive evenings were passed in mutual discourses regarding Krishna. As the result of these conversations Rai Ramananda obtained the favour of realising the true nature of the Supreme Lord and of his own self. After staying there for a few days longer the Lord resumed His journey to the south having previously commanded Ramananda to give up the service of the king and repair to Puri.

From Vidyanagar the Supreme Lord Chaitanya visited Gautomi-Ganga, Mallikarjun, atirtha Ahobala-Nrisingha, Siddhabata, Skanda-kshetra, Trimatha, Bridhyakasi, Baudhya-sthana, Tripati, Trimalla, Pana-Nrisingha, Siva kanchi, Vishnu-kanchi, Trikalahasti, Briddha kola, Siali Bhairabi, Kaveri tira, Kumbhakarna-kapala.

The Lord on arrival at Sriranga-kshetra made Sri Venkata Bhatta, with his whole family, devotees of Krishna. Proceeding thence to Risava Parbata the Lord there met Puri Goswami. Sri Puri Goswami after this meeting set out for Puri. The Supreme Lord went on towards Setubandha. On Shree Sailaparbata He had a conversation with Siva Durga who lived there as a Brahmana and Brahmani.

Passing by Kamakosthipuri the Lord arrived at south Mathura. At this place the Lord had a conversation with a Brahmana who was a devotee of Rama and who was wholly unattached to the world. Then the Lord having bathed in the Kritamala saw Parasuram on mount Mahendra. From there the Lord went to Setubandha. He bathed in the Dhanus-tirtha and visited Sree Rameswara. He procured here an old leaf of the Kurma Purana which contained the story of Maya Sita, carried it with Him and presented the same to the devotee of Rama, whose name was Ramadas, whom He had met before.

Then the Lord travelled in the Pandya country. He visited the Tamraparni, Naya-tripadi Cheoratola, Tilakanchi, Gajendra mokshana, Panagari, Chamtapura, Shree Vaikuntha, Malaya parbata, Dhanus-tirtha, Kanyakumari. The Lord met the Bhattatheris in the Mallara country. He delivered the deaf Brahmana Krishnadas, His own attendant, who had fallen into their hands. He then picked up the Brahma-sanhita (sixth chapter) on the bank of the Payaswini. From there the Lord proceeded by way of Payaswini, Sringabera-Puri math, Matsya-tirtha, to the village of Udupi where He visited Shree Gopala of Madhvacharyya.

Having defeated in controversy the tattva-vadis at this place the Lord journeyed by way of Falgu-tirtha, Trikupa, Panchasara, Surparaka, Kolahpur and arrived at Pandherapura. Here the Lord received the tidings of the attainment of siddhi by Sri Sankaracharyya from Sirangapuri.

The Lord procured the valuable work Krishnakarnamrita, composed by Sree Billamangal, from the community of Vaishnava Brahmanas resident on the bank of the Krishna-Vena. From there, travelling by Tapti, Mahishmati-pur, the bank of the Narbada, Rishyamukha parbata, the Lord arrived at Dandakaranya where He delivered the Sapta-tala. From there He visited Pampa sarovara, Panchabati, Nasik, Brahmagiri, the source of of the Godavari, Kushabarta and many other tirthas, returning finally to Vidyanagar. From Vidyanagar the Lord journeyed back to Puri by the same route by which He had come, visiting Alalnath on the way.

Lord Gauranga

A Divine Event burst once again upon the world.
The Iron Age fettered our soul
As we had forgot the goal ;
So the Lord Himself in pity came as Teacher of His Word.

Let this saving Message be not hastily disbelieved.
There is no other course
Possesses the force
To lift us to the plane that by the saints are trod.

The Divine Dispensation is the promise of the Word.
Therein alone doth lie
The sole guarantee
Of redemption for the indifferent, the bad and the good.

Let not the vanity of all our earthly endeavour Hide the Truth Who is ;
Whom no soul need miss ;
Whom no graceless speculation may ever discover.

So let us leave off all doubting ignorance of the issue
May God Himself place
The Truth by His grace !
Only thus may we have the subject that has any value.

To bless the Age Lord Gauranga acted the part of the Seeker.
His Life is the Search,
And the progressive march,
On the plane where the goal is self-realised endeavour.

A spark of the Truth has power to dispel all mortal gloom.
Our soul's vessel is small
In comparison with the All ;
So may we learn to be humble and seek and cease to mourn.

Presidential Address

THERE was a time when Thakur Narrottama was pleased to tell the plain truth to many worthy persons who came of the highest lineage. Thakurmahasaya, in the eye of worldly people, had manifested the pastime of appearing in a Uttarradiya kayastha family. For telling the truth he became the object of attack by bad people. Those who judge other people by the testimony of their senses, are, as a matter of course, maliciously disposed. These persons, devoid of sound judgment, began to find fault with Thakur Narrottama. Why he, being born in a kayastha family, was to set up as a religious teacher of persons born in Brahmana families and also make them his disciples ? When these accusations reached the ears of Thakurmahasaya he said that rather than provoke the opposition of any person he would completely desist from instructing anybody. Shri Ramkrishna Bhattacharyya and Shri Ganganarayan Chakravarti, who are disciples of Thakurmahasaya, thereupon said that if he gave up teaching the world will go to the dogs, there will be a greater increase of the number of atheistical pashandas in the world. Saying this one of them put on the garb of a betel seller and the other attired himself as a potter. Meanwhile the whole body of proud Pandits of the hostile community arrived at Kheturi with the intention of defeating Thakurmahasaya in open controversy. After their arrival at Kheturi they went to the bazar and proceeded to the potters' shop for purchasing earthen pots in which to cook their food. The potter began to talk with them in the Sanskrit language. From there those Pandits went to the betel-shop for purchasing betel. The betel-seller also talked with the Pandits in pure Sanskrit. At this those proud Pandits thought within themselves that it was a most wonderful country where even potters and betel-sellers could talk in the purest Sanskrit. Thakur Narottama was the greatest person of such a place. It was impossible to conceive how great a Pandit he could be. Therefore instead of losing their reputation by approaching him it was better to leave the place without delay. Thinking in this way those Pandits hurriedly left the village. Those who obtain the protection of the Truth are always liable to be attacked in this manner.

What is ordinarily called unfair judgment or sound judgment, is neither of them, the same as Truth. Many persons suppose truth to be the same as common sense. That which cannot be harmonised with common sense is not admitted as Truth by such persons. But what is the nature of those persons' whose common sense is supposed to be identical with the Truth ? Is it the common sense of souls who are free from the defects of liability to error, inadvertence, defective senses, desire to deceive ? Or is it the common sense that is born of the experience of changeable minds subject to all those defects ? The common sense of the ordinary run of mankind, who are subject to all those defects, is at best only mental specualtion. It may sometimes exhibit a certain impression of relative or temporary truth. But it is not really Truth. The intellectual faculty of persons who are led by the blind active forces of physical Nature cannot understand the topic of unadulterated, self-revealing function of pure spiritual existence. A certain person is tasting the deliciousness of an excellent preparation of good pudding. Another person arrives there and proposes that a quantity of lime and mortar, which happens to be in his possession, might be mixed with the pudding to complete its deliciousness. If this advice is actually taken one is thereby prevented from getting the pleasure of eating good pudding. The taste of the pudding is bound to be spoiled by such policy. Bits of stone, lime, etc, scorch and choke the passage of the throat and cause the death of the person who swallows them. Bhakti or service of Godhead is supremely unconditional, self-sufficient, perfectly pure and absolutely devoid of all earthly quality. If any person advise the pure devotional impulse to be perfected by adulterating it with desires other than service of Godhead, fruitive activity, empiric knowledge attempt to become one with Iswara by means of yoga, etc., all of which are the products of this material world, then the advice of such a person is exactly similar to that of mixing lime and mortar with good pudding. Lime and mortar are quite foreign to good pudding. The two things never suit one another. Fruitive activity, empiric knowledge, yoga, are activities of the individual soul in the state of bondage They are the functions of the material body and mind. On the other hand Bhakti is the natural impulse of the pure soul. It is a spiritual function. It is the activity of the soul who is absolutely free from all worldly defects. It is for this reason that there cannot be any real mixture of the service of Godhead (Bhakti) with fruitive work, empiric knowledge and similar worldly activities which are foreign to bhakti by their very nature, being the function of entities that are categorically different from the soul. But when fruitive work, empiric knowledge etc., recognise their subordination to bhakti and are practised in obedience to bhakti then such activity may be termed as bhakti although it may seem to be adulterated with fruitive work and empiric knowledge. Such adulterated bhakti may help a person to attain the path that leads to pure bhakti which is the transcendental function. When a person attains to the transcendental service of Godhead there is then no longer any adulteration. It is this which finds expression in an oft-quoted shloka 'Celestial sage, (Narada) that activity which is prescribed by the Shastras in reference to Hari is certainly called bhakti. By its means the transcendental bhakti is gained.'

Consideration like the above led us to circulate a number of questions among persons who possess intelligence and sound judgment. We did not send those questions to any and everybody or to the man in the street. We also did not send those questions for the purpose of mixing rubbish with good pudding. True, we asked for answer to a number of questions from certain persons. Our object in doing so was nothing worse than a desire that the un-adulterated Truth, the un-deceiving Truth, might make His appearance in the world. But by reason of excessive addiction to lust, anger and greed a number of persons have thought it proper to display a conduct that is so devoid of gentlemanly restraint but the conduct itself has exposed their real nature to the view of everybody.

We are not prepared to collaborate with those who are given to worldly activities. There are persons who are ambitious of climbing to the top of the Himalaya of progress by means of their mental speculation based on the experience of the external world. We are not prepared to cultivate association with empiricist of this type who professes to be able to walk his way to the Truth by the ascending process from experience to the unknown. 'We will not allow any hostile person among ourselves but will always keep him on the other side of our boundary'. This is the advice of our Gurudeva. We do not want the person who is given to good eating and sexuality. Such persons are not really genuine seekers of the Truth. How will our purpose be served with the help of persons who possess a double nature? There is no correspondence between what they say and do. We can hope to get the answers of our questions from those persons who have realised the nature of the eternal soul, who form the community of the servants of Godhead, to whatever religion they may belong. The tidings that the lotus-feet of our Sri Guru have communicated to us will not be listened to by persons who have a double tongue. They will never lend their serving ear to the message. Lay men have not been able to understand our questions. Those whose lives have not become identical with that of the devotee as we find it in Srimad Bhagabatam, have not been able to understand our questions.

It is for this reason that the Bhagabata instructs us 'To turn over a new leaf. The person of good sense must entirely give up all association with bad company and cultivate close association with the sadhus. There is no doubt that the words of the sadhu certainly possess the power of destroying the evil propensities of one's mind. The sadhus in this way benefit everyone who associates with them.' There are many things which we do not disclose to the sadhu. The real sadhu makes us speak out what we keep concealed in our hearts. He then applies the knife. The very word 'sadhu' has no other meaning but this. He stands in front of the block with the uplifted sacrificial knife in his hand. The sensuous desire of men are like the goats. The sadhu stands there to kill those desires by the merciful stroke of the keen edge of the sacrificial knife in the form of unpleasant language. If the sadhu turn into my flatterer then he does me harm, he becomes my enemy. If he gives us flattery then we accept the road that leads to enjoyment and do not want real well being.

It is not proper to hear the exposition of the Bhagabat by one who does not live the life enjoined by the Bhagabat. It is our duty to associate with a sadhu who is better than ourselves. 'Association with those who are better than oneself is association with sadhus'. But who really possesses the life of the Bhagabata (God's own)? "He is called 'free' in this life whose only endeavour is for the service of Hari in every activity by mind and speech and in all circumstances". "May the mind be directed to Krishna"—this is the only form of benediction that is uttered by the sadhus. The contrary form 'May the inclination towards Krishna be destroyed giving rise to the inclination to lord over things other than Krishna, is never the form of the benediction of the sadhus.

The word bhakti (service of Godhead) cannot be properly used except in connection with the word Krishna. Krishna alone is the only Object of bhakti. The Brahman is the object of knowledge. The Paramatman (Supreme soul) is the object of the effort to approximate. But Krishna alone is the only Object of worship or service. We shall explain later on in course of our discourse how Krishna alone can be the only Object of worship.

The subject that has been fixed for our consideration on the first day of the conference—is to consider the following, by the analysis of the principles of cognition and non-cognition, namely (a) the source, (b) instruments, (c) conclusion, (d) corroboration, and (e) retention, of knowledge (epistemology).

The ordinary meaning of the word 'chit' is knowledge. Knowledge possesses the quality of mastership. From the words of Sri Chaitanyadeva we are enabled to know that the Son of the Chief of Braja in Braja is the real indivisible Knowledge. Krishnachandra is specifically the Possessor, Source and Concentrated Embodiment of the Cognitive Power. The source from which all knowledge is gained is of three kinds viz., (a) pure cognition, (b) cognition adulterated with non-cognition and (c) non-cognition. Those who hold that direct perception by the senses is the only source of knowledge maintain that knowledge or consciousness is a product of non-cognition or matter. These persons believe that non-cognition is the final principle. The propensity that comes into play as the result of such speculation is called tarka or hypothetical controversy. Those who want to make matter produce the principle of consciousness, find themselves, in the sequel, necessarily occupied with consideration as to how it is possible to gradually neutralise the cognitive principle, how to make it effervace altogether into the original state of non-cognition. These persons by their austerities try to reduce that temporary consciousness into the state of complete unconsciousness. If a person begins to perform worldly activities, if he continues to do so in a liberal measure, he is liable to become too much fatigued in course of such activity. It is at such stage of exhaustion that the desire for becoming unconscious matter, the desire of liberation in the form of annihilation of consciousness as described above, makes its psychological appearance. It is a good thing to practise open-handed liberality. It is a good thing to nurse the sick and to help the needy in different ways. Ideas like these make a tempting appeal to our judgment which seem to promise even a temporary relief to sufferers when man is terribly oppressed by the normal condition of existence in the realm of matter. We are then attracted towards processes that are dangled by the external world. It is in this manner that we become performers of 'useful' work, we practise 'virtue', we worship a relieving God, we become moral, or, sometimes, we do bad deeds, commit sinful acts, become irreligious or immoral. We are driven into all such predicaments by the hostile pressure of the external world.

There is no grossness in the subtle material principle. But the subtle owes its birth to gross matter. Subtleness manifests itself by abstracting its ingredients from the gross things of the external world. Gross matter is the parent of the subtle existence.

In this world the function of non-cognition has become more or less adulterated with that of cognition. The mind and intelligence are occupied in gathering knowledge from the realm of non-cognition. There is a world in which there is no such subject as non-cognition which is professed to be the final reality by the propounders of the theory of the finality of the atom or the material force. In that world everything is cognition. There are some who say that there must be the realisation of utter powerlessness in undiluted cognition. It is true that the possessor of empiric knowledge has bitter experience of material force in this world. It is only when one is anxious to fly from the bitterness of such experience that the opportunity of rendering cognition, of which we stand in need, devoid of all power, presents itself to us. The Gaudiya Vaishnavas have a language of their own. They call the material force 'Bahiranga Shakti,' the power that manifests itself in the extraneous members of the Divine Person. The Professors of undifferentiated knowledge want to designate the Entity who is devoid of this extraneous power as the Brahman. They form their idea of the Brahman by repudiating the material force. They have got the experience of that power from the phenomena of radio-activity and molecular movement in this world in which the cognitive principle is found adulterated with the material principle. But the Brahman also means the Great, the Whole. Those who are priveleged to have the sight of the Greatness, the Wholeness, know that the world Brahman means only Bhagaban, 'The Possessor of all Power'. In the words of Sri Chaitanya Deva the primary meaning of the word Brahman is 'Bhagaban'.

The Sankarsan Sutra uses the word Brahman to denote Vishnu. In the concluding portion of the Bhagabatam we find the following Shloka, 'The essence of all Vedanta is Brahman Who is identical with the Supreme Soul. He is the only substantive Reality. He is One and without a second. The one thing needful is exclusive and eternal devotion to Him'.

Every Sound has a two-fold potency, viz. (1) the enlightening natural potency and (2) the natural potency productive of ignorance. That potency of the sound which, diverging from Krishna, Vishnu, Sri Chaitanya-deva, points to something else, is the potency that is productive of ignorance. By their enlightening natural potency all words express Krishna, point to Krishna. Those words that obey us as their master, help us in the function of enjoying the things of this world, being promotive of enjoyment, are thereby separated from the Divinity and, therefore, exhibit the natural potency that produces ignorance. The Sound 'Krishna' points to the substantive Reality. In this world made of material, limiting quality, the meaning that is offered of the Sound 'Krishna' what is understood by the common run of people by the Sound 'Krishna', none of these are the entity Who is the real Meaning of the Sound 'Krishna'. In other languages such sounds as 'God', 'Allah' etc., or, even in the Sanskrit language such sounds as 'Iswara' 'Paramatma', etc., express a certain conglomerate of distinctive power which is an adulterated entity separate from Krishna. Those sounds fail to accommodate the full commanding potency of the Sound 'Krishna.' The meaning of the Sound 'Krishna' is, —'Krishna is the Supreme Lord. He has a specific Form, the concentrated Embodiment of the spiritual principle of existence, Cognition and Bliss. He has no beginning. He is the beginning. He nourishes the whole world. He is the Cause of all causes.'

The above Meaning of the Sound 'Krishna' was brought from the south of India by Sri Gaursundar and made known to all the people. No other country except Bharatvarsha knows the Meaning of the Sound 'Krishna'. In Bharatavarsha also there are divergent currents of thought in which the sounds Iswara, Paramatma, Brahman, etc., have manifested Themselves. These currents of thought indicate the secondary potencies of the Sound 'Krishna' or even postulate powerlessness of the Divinity. They are also unable to convey the knowledge of the Fullness of Meaning of the Sound 'Krishna'. Anything that is seen, heard, smelt, tasted or touched by our senses giving rise to empiric knowledge, is an entity produced by physical Nature. The Sound 'Krishna' has not been used by reference to these products of physical Nature. The Entity Krishna is not comprehensible to knowledge dependent on material senses or absence of material senses. He is an Entity who transcends physical senses and physical Nature.

Shree Raghunath Das Goswami

FROM this time onwards Raghunath continued to worship the Govardhan Shila and the garland of gunja. Having received this extraordinary Favour Raghunath forgot every thing else in his great joy. He attached himself with body, mind and speech to the service of the Feet of Shree Gauranga. 'Raghunath', says Kaviraj Goswami, possessed good qualities that knew no end. It is never possible for any one to describe them all. Raghunath acted up to the rules enjoined by the Shastras for the life of perfect renunciation with the most scrupulous fidelity. The course of Raghunath's life is comparable only to the line that is cut into the slab of hard stone in the quality of its enduring firmness'.

The life of Raghunath at Puri has been recorded by Krishnadas Kaviraj Goswami in a few telling words. Seven and a half praharas of his day were spent in kirtan and recollection. There was left scarce four dandas, during night and day, for meal and also, on certain days, for sleep. The story of his renunciation is a most wonderful narrative. During the whole of his life he never allowed his tongue to taste any enjoyable food. He never wore any other clothing than patched and tattered old kantha and rags. He carried out with the utmost care the command of the Lord. He ate what was barely sufficient for maintaining life. He reproved himself for eating too much. 'A person whose chitta is cleansed by true knowledge is enabled to know the nature of the soul and thereby gains everything. Then why do sinners, neglecting such course for what purpose or for what reason, care for nourishing their bodies ?

Acting on the above maxim of the Bhagabat Raghunath was extremely careful not to indulge the taste of good eating. 'The remains of the cooked rice offered to Shree Jagannathdeva, which was left unsold on the hands of their vendors become rotten in course of two or three days. They cast the rotten rice to the Tailangi cows at the Lion Gate of the Temple. Those cows would not touch the rice by reason of the rotten smell. Raghunath brought the rice home during night. He washed it in a great quantity of water. He could thus find a quantity of rice which still had a solid core. Raghunath ate that portion of it mixing with salt.' On a certain day Swarup found him eating the rice. He was moved to a smile and begged to have a small quantity of the same which he tasted with relish. Swarup, as he ate the rice, made the remark 'that Raghunath ate such nectarine food daily all by himself without giving any of them a share. He was, indeed, unpardonably selfish'. The Lord heard of this from Govinda. One day the Lord appeared before Raghunath. He found him at his meal and said, 'All of you eat excellent food. Why don't you give it to me?' Saying this the Lord ate a mouthful. As He was going to take more Swarup caught Him by the Hand. Swarup snatched the rice from the Hands of the Lord remarking that it was not fit for Him. The Lord said, 'I eat daily a great variety of Prasad. I do not find such taste in any other Prasad.' The Lord performed Pastimes like these in His Dealings with Raghunath. He was at heart pleased at the spirit of renunciation of Raghunath.

Raghunath passed sixteen years in the confidential service of the Person on the Supreme Lord. After the disappearance of Swarup Raghunath came to Brindaban. He made up his mind not to survive Swarup. But he wished to meet Sri Rupa and Sanatana at Brindaban. It was his purpose thereafter to effect his departure by throwing himself from the mount Govardhana. When Das Goswami greeted the feet of Sri Rupa and Sanatana at Brindaban the brothers became aware of Das Goswami's resolve. They dissuaded him from his resolve to leave the world. They made him live with them as their third brother.

Sri Rupa and Sanatana listened constantly from the lips of Raghunath about all the Pastimes, His inner as well as outer Activities, of the Supreme Lord. Raghunath lived for a long period at Brindaban. He survived Sri Rupa Goswami for a short time. During his residence at Brindaban Das Goswami continued the same kind of life that he had been leading at Puri in the company of Sri Swarup Damodar.

Raghunath now gave up cooked rice and water on which he had been living. He gave up speaking about any other subject. He ate matha (sour milk) in measure of two to three palas. He performed daily a thousand prostrated obeisances, took the holy Name a lakh of times and made obeisances to two thousand Vaishnavas. He served Radha-Krishna night and day in his mind. He recited the Deeds of Mahaprabhu for the space of one prahara every day. Raghunath bathed in Radha-kunda, without omission, three times during the day, in the morning, at noon and at evening. He offered his embrace to all Vaishnavas living in Braja He passed seven and a half praharas in the performance of devotional activities. He slept for four dandas but that also was omitted on certain days. Anyone who is fortunate enough to have on opportunity of listening to an account of Raghunath's method of serving the Supreme Lord is bound to experience a feeling of the most exquisite astonishment.

Three famous works are attributed to Shree Raghunath Das Goswami. They are (1) Stavamala, (2) Sri Danacharita and (3) Muktacharita. They are mentioned in a very old shloka of an anonymous writer. They are also found in Bhakti-Ratnakar by Sri Ghanashyam Das. In Gaura—Ganoddesha Dwipika Sri Kavikarnapur has identified Shree Das Goswami Prabhu with Sri Rasamanjari of Brajalila, with the remark 'that he is also held by certain devotees to be identical with Sremati Ratimanjari or Bhanumati.' Sri Krishnadas Kaviraj, author of Sri Chaitanya Charitamfita, was the recipient of the mercy of Shree Das Goswami from whose lips he heard about the Activities of Sri Chaitanya which he has recorded in his biography of Mahaprabhu.

The spirit of renunciation which is so prominent throughout the life of Das Goswami has a positive aspect which is likely to be missed by those who are votaries of a life of austerity as a result of so-called realisation of the miseries of the life of enjoyment. Externally there is no doubt a great similarity between the life of Das Goswami and that of the practisers of renunciation of the type inculcated by Sri Sankaracharyya in the Mohamudgara. Asceticism of this latter type is satisfied by the act of renunciation. If it is asked why it renounces the normal activities of the world in favour of an abnormal mode of life it can only meet the charge by the assertion that detachment from the world is the only efficient way of securing the fuller and more vigorous exercise of one's physical and mental powers and aptitudes. If asceticism do not take up some such position it becomes a form of cynicism. In either case it should be impossible for such an ascetic to understand the value or nature of the positive activity of Shree Das Goswami prabhu.

The ideal of the service of Shree Raghunath Das Goswami is that of the self-less hand-maids of Sri Radhika whose service of Sri Krishna is the only sufficient service of the Supreme Lord. Shree Das Goswami accordingly does not covet the direct service of the Lord. He wants to be serviceable to Sri Radhika. This is the real nature and the positive significance of the spirit of Shree Raghunath Das Goswami's renunciation of activities that are not acceptable to Sri Radhika,

Doctrines of Sri Chaitanya

THE doctrines of Sri Chaitanya are identical with those of the revealed Scriptures. They are transcendental. They have come down to us through the eternal chain of the teachers of the Word. The Word is the Veda. It is not possible for us to approach the Word unless we are enlightened by the mercy of the teacher of the Word. The only way by which we may have access to the Word is by submissive listening to the exposition of the Word from the lips of his eternal teacher.

There are books from the pens of great devotees that contain the true exposition of the doctrines of Sri Chaitanya. Sri Chaitanya practised the doctrines that He taught. It should, therefore, be possible to understand His teaching by a careful study of His biography. Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita presents us in detail the Life of Sri Chaitanya as sannyasin that is to say as Teacher of the people. Everyone should read that book. But the book itself is really unintelligible to the convinced empiricist. It is open to everyone to admire the book without really understanding anything of its contents. It is in the same way also practicable to model one's life on those teachings without really understanding them. Such conduct will not, however, take us one step forward in the direction of the Truth. In the light of what has already been said on the necessity of receiving the Truth in the form of the transcendental sound from the lips of the bonafide teacher we should not also be discouraged by our failure to approach the absolute by the empiric method of studying the biography of the Lord. We require to be introduced to the proper method of study by the mercy of the teacher. He holds the key that will admit us to the plane to which the Life of the Lord belongs.

It is necessary to know the nature of our real self. It is also necessary to preserve ourselves from the delusion, which has such a strong hold on us at present, that we are non-soul. We are now under the power of the physical body and the ignorant mind. We have forgot the nature of our real self. It is necessary for us to regain the knowledge of our own selves. We can do so by accepting the teaching of Sri Chaitanya. But in our present condition it is not really possible for us to accept His teaching. We cannot accept His teaching as long as we are ignorant of our own selves. It is for this reason that it is necessary to accept the teaching of the Lord by the method of submissive listening to the words spoken by the bonafide teacher in pursuance of the Vedic method.

It is possible for our soul to understand the word of the teacher of the Truth. Our souls in the pure state possess consciousness which is fully open for receiving the Truth. Our souls are free from all hankering for ignorance. The soul is fully self-conscious. At present he is not so. He supposes that he is something else, that he is full of ignorance. This ignorance is of various kinds. They are either sattvic rajasik, or tamasik. The deluded soul regards himself as capable of knowing everything and thereby getting rid of all ignorance ; or he may think that his proper function is to do all kinds of work ; or he may prefer to remain passively inactive and ignorant. As a matter of fact the soul is the possessor neither of empiric knowledge, activity nor of inactivity. These ambitions are possible only in the deluded condition. All these different mistaken ideas regarding the nature of oneself give rise to differences of opinion in religion. It is in this way that the different religious sects have been formed.

Sects are the result of the attempts that are made by persons who are under the power of the physical body and ignorant mind, to understand and teach the Scriptures by their own efforts. These persons follow such method under the impression that thereby they will become happy. It is the apparently pleasant prospect promised by the method that appeals to them. But what is pleasant for the time being may not also be always for our benefit. Empiric controversy does not help in solving this difficulty. If I choose to think that ignorance is knowledge and that such knowledge makes me happy and if I also desire to be happy in this way, how can I be persuaded to give up my ignorance ? The teacher of the Truth, who alone can realise my plight, is always anxious to remove my delusion. But it will not be possible for me to understand what he says, if I do not give up my habitual preference for untruth on the ground that it is likely to make me happy. The teacher of the Truth desires to serve my soul who is perfectly self-conscious. He does not want to serve my ignorance. But as I like to think that I am ignorant by my nature I suppose him to be my enemy. The teacher of the Truth does not want me to give up anything but only to serve the Truth. Everything is to be gained, and nothing can be lost, by the service of the Truth. But the mind in its ignorance does not understand the real nature of the spiritual function. It persists in confounding the function of the soul with a certain form of mental activity. But the function of the soul has nothing to do with the ignorant mind or the physical body, or with this phenomenal world. It is the function of the mind that now-a-days ordinarily passes, even with the most educated persons all over the world, for that of the soul or, at any rate, as being akin to that of the soul.

This is the root-cause of all trouble. The mind is not the soul. The mind cannot understand the nature or the function of the soul. It is apt to attribute its own nature and function to the soul. The mind can serve only what is non-conscious. This is so because it cannot understand nor approach the entity that is termed unclouded consciousness. The mind has no cause to be dissatisfied by such service, as such service is in accordance with its own nature.

The mind is thus enabled to dominate and dictate to the soul. This is, however, an abnormal state of things. The soul is higher than the mind. The mind is also always dimly aware of this. It, therefore, uses the method of persuasion in its dealing with the soul. Aversion to Truth leads the soul to agree with the mind and serve the latter. This service of mind is of two-fold nature. It is either an attempt to gratify the senses by the method of enjoyment or an endeavour to recoup the power of enjoyment by the method of abstinence. The latter method is also called the path of renunciation. It is the path of the pseudo-salvationists and liberationists. The method of enjoyment is the path of the elevationists.

We can at once see how it is impossible for liberationists and elevationists to understand the function of the soul which is the subject-matter of the spiritual Scriptures. The difference between the mind and the soul is substantive and is not capable of being brought home to the mind by the method of controversy that is intelligible to the mind. Such controversy is apt to confound the mundane with the spiritual. Or it may take the form of an attempt to reconcile the two. As a matter of fact the mundane is wholly incompatible with the spiritual. Perfect ignorance is not in any sense compatible with perfect knowledge. It is this illogical trick of the mind that ordinarily passes for the quality of liberalism or toleration, with empiric thinkers. But this is really an uncompromising attitude of refusal to recognise the categorical nature of the difference between the Truth and non-truth and untruth. This is the chief obstacle in the way of empiric thinkers to accept the Scriptural method of search

They are apt to regard it as illiberal and dogmatic. This reservation prevents them from lending their whole attention to the representations of the other side in a really impartial manner.

Sri Chaitanya teaches the function of the soul. It is natural for the soul to serve Godhead exclusively and uninterruptedly. The service of Godhead is neither enjoyable, nor abstemious of enjoyment which alternatives alone are possible for the mind. The natural eternal function of the soul has been revealed in the Vedas. Its nature can be realised by the soul who happens to be under the power of the physical body and ignorant mind by his own choice effected by Maya by following the method that is laid down in the Vedas. That method is the srauta-pantha or the path of submissive listening to the transcendental sound appearing on the lips of the bonafide teacher of the Truth. There is no other method by which the fettered soul may be re-established in his natural condition of the willing service of Godhead.

The Brahma-Sutra contains the systematic exposition of the revealed Scriptures. The Srimad-Bhagabatam is the genuine exposition of the Brahma-Sutra. It is not possible to understand the Brahma-Sutra without the help of the Srimad-Bhagabatam. Those who try to explain the Brahma-Sutra in any other way deviate from the method of exposition laid down in the Scriptures. Those who are enabled to understand the real meaning of Srimad-Bhagabatam by the mercy of the bonafide teacher of the Truth find the Bhagabatam to be the crest-jewel of all the Shastras. To such a person there is no longer any irrelevancy or inconsistency or obscurity in any part of the whole body of the revealed Scriptures.

Sri Chaitanya taught the meaning of the Srimad-Bhagabatam by practising the pure service of Godhead as revealed in the Bhagabatam. This is the highest gift of Mahaprabhu. His Life has been made available to all persons by the biographers of the Supreme Lord. But the biographies themselves are also unintelligible unless one hears their exposition from the lips of the pure devotees of Godhead. The Bhagabatam or its exposition can be understood by no other method. Sri Chaitanya does not replace but only fulfils the Shastras.

A talk with a Moulvi

(By Sripad Nimananda Sevatmetha, Bhaktisastri, B. Ag. B. T.)

Moulvi.—Many a time I heard you talking on religious subjects. You talk from our Holy Quran. I wonder you are still not a muhammadan.

I.—I am glad, you appreciate me in the light of the Quran. But I do not understand why you should insist on my becoming a muhammadan. What is it to become a muhammadan ?

M.—You have to accept Hazrat Muhammad as His Rasul.

I.—This I do.

M.—But mere recognition of Him as the Prophet will not do. You will have to accept the form of worship that He has been so kind to prescribe for us.

I.—Is there any harm if I recognise Him as a prophet, but follow another, say Christ, or still another say Sri Chaitanya ?

M.—There's no harm. All religions have divine revelation as the basis. But Islam is the final and perfect revelation of God made through Hazrat Muhammad. It is for this reason that He is called the 'Seal of the prophets.' Hence the spiritual uplift that Islam promises cannot be found in any other of the existing religions of the world.

I.—Pardon me. Do you claim His superiority on the basis of Chronology ?

M.—No. Not alone on that. If merit be considered, we shall find God's wisdom made perfect in Him.

I.—Will you please show why Islam is superior to all other religions of the world ?

M.—Please do not mind if I happen to speak anything against your faith.

I.—Certainly not. I am an honest seeker of Truth. I am always ready to renounce my faith if I find a better one to attend to.

M.—In the beginning I must tell you what 'Islam' means. It means 'making of peace,' that is peace with God and peace with man. Peace with God means submission to His will and peace with man means doing good to one's fellow men. A true follower of Islam must not fail to do good even to the meanest of all creatures. The Holy Quran says :—"There is no beast on earth nor bird which flies with its two wings, but they are a people like you, and to their Lord shall they return" (chap vi—38). The Holy Prophet is reported to have said :- "Surely there are rewards for doing good to quadrupeds and giving them water to drink. There are rewards for benefiting every animal having a moist liver."

Evidently Islam is the "Religion of Peace," miscalled muhammadanism. It is the religion of all. Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Daood and Jesus all preached it. In fact the religion of every true prophet was, in its pristine purity, Islam.

God in Islam is the "Lord of the worlds." It denies all plurality of persons in Godhead and any participation of any being in the affairs of the world.

There's an ayat in sura Ekhlas which runs thus—"Lum e lid o lum en Lad." This means God neither gives birth to nor is given birth to. In the Bible Christ proclaims himself as the Son of God. In the Bhagabat Krishna is born as the son of Nanda.

In another ayat of the same sura it is stated—"Kol hoo o allahoo ahad." This means that God is self-sufficient. He depends on none but every one depends on Him. There is God and none but God.

But Krishna of the Bhagabat depends on Brahma for the creation, on Vishnu for its maintenance and on Siva for its destruction. There is thus an ever-existent class of Devs sharing with God in the Divine qualities. So there are many Gods instead of one.

Again Hindoos believe in the incarnation of God. But according to Quran such incarnation of God is impossible. Every religion aims at communion with God. But this communion is not attained by bringing Him down in the shape of man.

I—Thank you. Now before I enter into the discussion of the merit of all that you have said, I want to ask you one thing. Please tell me in whose light you interpret the Quranic texts.

M.—Why, every one who knows Arabic can read the Quran and interpret It.

I.—Do you not then mistake empiricism for God's knowledge ?

M.—How ?

I.—There is, I believe, an ayat in the Quran like this—"Jelika fadalullahe entihe mai asahoo," which means this knowledge is the gift of God ; He gives it him whom He chooses.

I remember to have read in sura fateha an ayat which runs thus—Chhira lal lajina an anata aleihim. This means "Lead us, O God in the path of those whom Thou hast favoured."

M.—Yes, there are.

I.—Hence so long as we are not chosen by Him as ones to know Him, we have no right to speak of Him.

There is always the danger when the blind lead the blind. We must always trust heaven's light for our guidance. Our knowledge that is based on our experience can never claim to be perfect. Hence such a knowledge, if employed in our spiritual investigation, will only give us the perverted view of the Divinity.

M.—Yes, but how can we say that this man or that man has not been favoured by Him ?

I.—We cannot equally say that this man or that man is favoured by Him, because he holds a great academical qualification. Hazrat Muhammad had none of it, yet He was chosen.

M.—He is a prophet, a God-sent one. The case is quite different with such ones.

I.—At least you must look for a Kamel Pir to lead you.

M.—You see I have lost all faith in so-called Pirs and Fakirs. They are all rogues.

I.—There may be real Pirs also.

M.—If there be any such, we are not sure to find them.

I.—Yes, but that is no reason why you should go without a guide. Hazrat Muhammad is reported to have said, "Manla sekha lahu fala thuhu saitanun," which means those who have no guide, are guided by the Satan. Guide you must have. You cannot explain Divine things in your own way. One must first reach that plane of spiritual consciousness where they become manifest and then go to preach them. Our mind, however trained or educated it may be, cannot be employed in handling Divine things or the latter will lose their Divine character.

M.—Where and how to get such a Kamel Pir who is 'momen' (faithful) and not 'monafek' (hypocrite) and who by his 'taojja' (initiation) can make the heart of the 'murid' (disciple) rebound with the Name of Allah and unfold unto him His hidden secrets ?

I.—It is not possible for us to know who is 'momen' and who is 'monafek'. But if we are sincere, God is sure to guide us. Through His grace we are to find out one such guide. I hear in the Quran there is a teaching like this—"mai ead dillahu fala mudillalahu o mai eudlillahu fala hadialahu", which means, none can lead him astray whom Allah guides aright, and none can guide him aright whom Allah guides astray.

M.—Do you mean to say that we have hitherto been not sincere ?

I.—That is for you to judge. The sincere never seek God for their own pleasure. They want to serve Him but expect no service from Him in return. In the Quran we find "And among men is he who sells himself to seek the pleasure of Allah ; and Allah is affectionate to the servants

(Ch. II 207). Lust after flesh makes men self-seeking. In the Bible the qualification of one that receives love of God has been stated thus—'Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

M.—Do you mean to say, a sincere seeker of truth must not have any worldly attachment ?

I.—Yes, he should not have any.

M.—Then why has God created this world ? Is it not for our enjoyment.

I.—It may be for our punishment as well. God is the sole enjoyer and we, as His servants, minister to His enjoyment. The servant is not the master. We are turned out as a thief as soon as we entertain a desire to enjoy. God does not want to live in heaven with a thief: We fall. Paradise is lost to us. If we want to regain it, we must do so through service. Service is the fundamental function of the Soul.

Love of worldy things is a sin. 'The lust of the flesh', that always allures us to commit it, is not of the Father. Christ says, "Whosoever abideth in Him sinneth not ; whosoever sinneth hath not seen Him, neither known Him." Evidently then one who does not know Him cannot interpret Him. He cannot either certify to the correction of one such interpretation. You cannot definitely say whether the interpretation of Quran of such and such man is correct.

M.—You see the Bible has been several times recast. So we do not get the actual teachings of Christ.

I.—May be. But truth is there. If anything laid down in the Bible is corroborated by what is laid down in the Quran, I think, you cannot have any objection to accept it as truth.

At least the truth in the above sayings of Christ is self-evident. All religions teach it. Hazrat Mahammad, I believe, does not teach anything different. His whole life is a life of renunciation. Repeatedly He said, "Al phakru phakiri," which means poverty is my pride. At the time of His death He called His wife Ayesha to His bed and said, "Ayesha I cannot depart peacefully. And why ? I think, you retain some money in the house." She said 'Yes, my lord ! I have four gold mohars.' "Give them", said He, "to the poor. Ah ! what shall I answer to Allah ?"

M.—Then, I think, we should give up the job altogether as hopeless. The cent percent of the so-called religious people of the world are really not religious.

I.—It is so. And hence we find even those who talk of wisdom as a gift from God in the form of revelation fighting among themselves to-day for difference of their opinions.

But why should we give up this as a hopeless task ? It is true we have attachment for the things of the world. But should we try to strengthen it or lessen it ? The sincere are those who do not identify themselves with their bodies and are not much concerned with the things that interest these bodies. God is ever vigilant ; and the sincere endeavours of an honest devotee will not surely go unheeded by Him. He is sure to supply you a guide.

M.—Yes, but how can I say that the interpretation of such and such man is not correct ? Especially when all endorse it.

I.—Certainly we cannot say 'no' as well. It is however not safe to accord sanction to any merely on the numerical strength of his followers. Let us for the time being confine ourselves to the academical study of the problems and see, if we can approve them with reason.

There had gone many teachers before Muhammad. I hear their number is more than a lac. Now, do you think they preached the same gospel ?

M.—Evidently they taught different gospels, when we see that the Quran is not the Bible. But the fundamental principles of their teachings were the same.

I.—Again you cannot say that all preached in the same place every time.

M.—There's no history.

I.—At least this does not stand to reason. The world is, indeed, very large, and is inhabited by many peoples. God cannot choose only one people and leave attending to the rest.

M.—No, He cannot. He is the Lord of all.

I.—Evidently then gospel preached to a people in one place may be different from what is preached to another in some other place ; as no two peoples are alike in their spiritual evolution. The revelation is made to suit the spiritual evolution of a people. We cannot receive what we do not want. Nay, even to a practical people God may reveal Himself in different colours at its different stages of evolution. You cannot preach Quran to those who appreciate the Bible, nor to those who have the inclination to appreciate the Bhagabat. Each is a revelation considered best in reference to the people to whom it is revealed. The difference in their philosophies is discernible only as long as they are studied without such reference. This study is exclusively reserved only for those who are in communion with God. They and only they know that food given to an infant differs from what is given to an adult. But they are both conducive to the respective growth of their recipients. All are being educated for the same purpose, i. e. to love God and serve Him. All quarrels cease there.

Ourselves

he tour of His Divine Grace in South India

His Divine Grace started from Sri Gaudiya Math, alcutta, on December 23, and arrived at Madras n the 2nd of January, after installing the Holy 'oot-Prints of Sri Gaursundar in newly built shrines t Jajpur, Sri Kurmam, Sinhachalam, Kovvur and Mangalgiri. After a stay of two days at Madras His Divine Grace started for Trivendrum visiting on he way the temples of Shree Varadaraj at Vishnu-anchi, of Shree Ranganathjee at Srirangam, of Sri anardan Vishun at Varkala. His Divine Grace eached Trivandrum on January 7. He next visited ri Anantapadmanava and then proceeded to Tiruvattar where he saw Sri Adi-Keshava. Sri Gaursundar discovered the manuscript of the Brahmasanhita at this place. His Divine Grace visited Sri Kanyakumari on the 9th. This is the southernmost point of India, otherwise known as Cape Comorin. His Divine Grace returned to Trivandrum the same day and presided at a public lecture delivered in the local Jubilee Hall by His Holiness Srimad Bhaktihridaya Bon Maharaj of the Gaudiya Mission. His Divine Grace returned to Calcutta on the 14th January by way of Madras where he presided at a second lecture of Swamiji Bon on the Life and Teachings of Sriman Mahaprabhu delivered at the local Madhva Association His Divine Grace had been pleased to visit the residence of Srijut Ramchandra Rao at the town of Rajmahendri, at his earnest prayer. This gentleman had made a free gift of some valuable lands at Kovvur for the erection of the shrine of the Foot-Prints of the Supreme Lord, in commemoration of his meeting with Rai Ramananda at that place in 1510 A. D. His Divine Grace was hospitably received on behalf of the Travancore State and provided with a suitable residence, during his short stay at Trivandrum, at the Padmavillash Palace.

Further propaganda at Madras

Their Holinesses Srimad Bhakti hriday Bon Maharaj, Srimad Bhaktiranjan Bhaktisar Maharaj, Srimad Bhaktirakshak Sridhar Maharaj and the party have been continuing the propaganda for the spread of the knowledge and practice of un-alloyed devotion in the Madras Presidency from the town of Madras as their headquarters. The visit of His Divine Grace to the town of Madras has given a great impetus to the movement. It has led to the establishment of a branch Math in Madras town in north Gopalpuram as the permanent centre of propaganda in the Madras Presidency. In the town itself all through the month of January, a regular series of public lectures have been delivered by Swamiji Bon and other preachers of the mission in the different quarters. These lectures have been always attended by large numbers of persons of all conditions, including a high percentage of the most cultured sections. The last lecture was delivered during the month by Srimad Bon Maharaj at Mylapur which was presided over by Sir Sivaswami Iyer C. I. E., K. C. I. E., formerly Advocate General.

Propaganda in Assam

The second session of the Assam Vaishnava Sammilan was held at Dhubri on the 6th of January. About 1500 persons attended from different parts. Sripad Nimananda Sevatirtha Bhaktishastri B. Ag. B. T. who is carrying on the movement of pure devotion in Assam under the guidance of His Divine Grace, presided. His scholarly and exhaustive address obtained the most cordial approval of the distinguished gathering.

Propaganda in Mymensingh District, East Bengal.

The anniversary celebrations of Sree Jagannath Gaudiya Math, in Mymensingh town were observed from January 21st to 25th. The programme included reading from the Bhagabatam, Kirtan and informal conversations at the Math every day. There was congregational chant in procession along the public streets every day, from January 23rd to 28th. A series of public lectures was delivered at the local Durga mandap from Jan. 23rd to 25th by His Holiness Srimad Bhaktiviveka Bharati Maharaj. Lectures were delivered in the Paradise Hostel of the Anandamohan College by Sripad Sundarananda Vidyavinode B. A. Editor of the Gaudiya, on Jan. 23 24 and 25 The devotees of the Jagannath Gaudiya Math, under the leadership of Sripad Jadubar Dasadhikary M. A. B. L. Bhaktishastri, Senior Professor of Sanskrit, A. M. College, spared no pains to make the occasion a most unqualified success. The Mymensingh public have nobly responded to the call on behalf of Sri Chaitanya Mahaprabhu.

FOREWORD

The earliest Bengali book touching the life of our Supreme Lord and coming out of the masterly pen of Thakur Brindabandas, the last disciple of Lord Nityananda, is Sree Chaitanya Bhagabat. The literary activity of Bengal was targetting this book as the pioneer production of the makers of the Bengali language. Although modern researches have found out that there existed several songs and other metrical scribblings in Bengali before this book was written, such as the lyrical poems of Vidyapati and Chandidas, panchali of Gunarajkhan and Lochandas etc. Yet some are of opinion that this book can safely be called the earliest product in Bengali metrical literature of real importance. The diction is an exemplary production of the able writer and this fact can not but be admitted even by the too fastidious critics who deal with literary merits in linguistic attainments.

The book was followed by another famous Bengali metrical work, Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita, by the renowned master writer Kaviraj Krishnadasji who has identified Thakur Brindabandas with Maharsi Vyasadeva himself who has left the most authentic accounts of the different 'Avataras' of Vishnu in his series of Pauranic productions. We can hardly give a better introduction than the said one from our revered Kaviraj Goswami.

The style of the book is so simple that it is accessible to all having only primary education in Bengali language. Throughout the book the style is pithy, flowing and spontaneous. The work can easily be accepted as the very compendium of aphorisms of the true tenets preached by the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya and His associated comrades. The descriptions are all authentic and most pleasing to all true and staunch devotees.

While going through the book malicious critics may find scope for their observations (criticisms) which simply bespeak their utter ignorance in higher Transcendental subjects. They might have, however, been excused in this act to some extent had the book been meant for the literary men only who are apparently apathetic to Godly associations and evince their earnestness towards unethical and atheistic activities. Such improper attitude can be softened and wrong judgment modified if those critics ever happen to come in contact with ardent devotees and receive their unstinted grace which can easily remove the common ideas prevailing among people indifferent to higher aspects of religion. However, this part is left to the consideration and choice of individual readers in order to get at the actual touch of the spirit of this spiritual writer. The author is not merely a poet but also an out and out theist, and not only that, he as a kind saint prepared to do the highest good to his reader goes to the length of inculcating on him the necessity and indispensability of severing all connections with men who are captured by ambition and busy in mundane activities, in order to turn him into a true devotee of the Supreme Lord.

The book is a bulky one consisting of three divisions, each division again of several chapters. This is the first volume in which the author has dealt with prefatory considerations and the early life of the Supreme Lord. Every line will help the reader to chalk out the real track for making advance in his eternal transcendental life by following the true spirit of the Sree Chaitanya Lila.

In order to retain the true spirit of the book, the able translator has left no stone unturned to present to the readers the genuine understanding and the innermost exposition of the heart of a devotee. The reader will no doubt find that Prof. N. K. Sannyal has done much to put the bonafide interpretation before his English knowing friends. So all people interested in the Gaudiya Vaishnava literature will, I am sure, thank him for his arduous and steady exertions. This book may help the English knowing public to get into the true essence of Vaishnavism, as well as a genuine painting of an original hand.

It will not be out of place to give here a short account of the author so far as it is known. Thakur Brindabandas was the Son of the niece of Shreebas-Pandit who is regarded as the inalienable component in the propagatory activity of Shree Krishna Chaitanya in Nadia.

The line of the author's paternal ancestors is not delineated by the later writers as his forefathers did not belong to the Vaishnava community. His mother was then merely a girl of four when the Supreme Lord Sree Chaitanya blessed her by kindly giving her the refuse betel as she was then an infant child in the house of Sreebas at Sree mayapur. The author is said to have beea born at Mamgachi within the district of Burdwan not very far from Sree Mayapur, on the other side of the river Ganges. Here his house still claims to maintain the memory of the author and his infancy. The author is considered as one of the strongest pillars of the Gaudiya Vaishnavism. He is better known to all Gaudiya Vaishnavas by his simple but impressive writings, and he will be adored with all veneration by one and all in all climes and times as one of the best teachers the Vaishnava Community can fortunately claim. He lived sometimes in the village Denurh, and we find, he had some important disciples who also took initiative after him to save the people from wrong understanding and misconceptions. More than this we know little of his later life.

Lord Nityananda

IT is all-important to understand the relationship of the individual soul to Lord Nityananda who is worshipped along with Sri Chaitanya by the community of the Madhva-Gaudiya Vaishnavas. The teachings of Lord Chaitanya have been recorded in the vernacular by some of the greatest of His followers. This has produced two kinds of delusion. The orthodox pandits, specially those who are not thoroughly versed in all branches of the Scriptures and are, therefore, disposed to favour a narrow interpretation of the texts, are sometimes inclined to take the view that the vernacular works do not rank as revealed literature. On the other hand there are persons who have no knowledge of the Sanskrit language and who are not, therefore, in a position to study the Scriptures in that language, who have sometimes been led to suppose that the religion taught by Sri Chaitanya is different from the religion that is to be found in the Sanskrit works.

As a matter of fact there is no text which declares that the process of revelation can be closed. Neither is there any text which considers that the Sanskrit language is the only medium of all revelation. The linguistic view of the Scriptures is denounced in no uncertain terms by the Scriptures themselves. Access to the real meaning of the Scriptures is not furnished by the language but by the spiritual preceptor, Sri Guru. It is the highest order of devotees who can make us understand the real meaning of the Scriptures. They can do so with or without the help of any language, or any other form of instrument, of this world. The process of enlightenment by the Sad-Guru is spiritual. Its nature or method cannot be understood except by his grace. This applies as much to the Sanskrit works as to the vernacular compositions. In neither case a person can do without the help and guidance of the Sad-Guru.

Sri Nityanandaprabhu is the source of the power of the Sad-Guru. He is the servant of Sri Chaitanya He is the Divinity Himself in the form of His servant. It is through Him that the Supreme Lord manifests Himself to the souls of men There cannot be any direct revelation of the Nature of the Supreme Lord to the spiritual consciousness of the individual soul. The individual soul is too small to be able to comprehend the Nature of the Divinity. He has to be helped by Godhead Himself in order to be enabled to understand the Divine Nature. This function of the Divinity is performed by Lord Nityananda and is known as the Power of the Sad-Guru.

Nityanandaprabhu serves Sri Gaursundar in the same way That Sri Balaram serves Sri Krishna. Both of Them are one and the same Person. Their functions are also identical. They are concerned with the task of reclaiming disloyal souls and preventing them from access to the Supreme Lord till they agree to give up their attitude of opposition to Krishna. The relation of Sri Nityanandaprabhu to the conditioned soul is that of the Saviour. But no person can be safe if he does not accept the chastening process laid down by the Scriptures as the method of reclamation for all offending souls. Sri Nityanandaprabhu makes this process available to all offending souls. He does not replace or alter the Scriptures by any contrary dispensation.

There is a widely prevalent error that the regulations of the Scriptures need not be followed by those who place themselves under the protection of the Sad-Guru. This error has its origin in the fact that it is not possible for the conditioned soul to understand either the ways of the Sad-Guru or the regulations of the Scriptures, which are identical. It is this incapacity that also leads superficial and incompetent observers to declare a difference where none exists. The regulations of the Scriptures are properly followed only by obeying the Sad-Guru unconditionally. But there is this real difference between the two that whereas it is possible and practicable for the conditioned soul to obey the Sad-Guru, it is neither possible nor practicable for him to follow the Scriptures without the guiding help of the Sad-Guru.

There is something more. One cannot also neglect the voice of the reason that is within himself. If this voice is listened to with due care it will also be found to be indentical with the advice of the Sad-Guru. But the voice of reason is powerless by itself to discover the real meaning of the Scriptures. Reason has no access to the substantive Truth. Its function is inferior and auxilliary to those of the Sad-Guru and the Scriptures. When by the grace of the Sad-Guru one is enabled to obtain access to the Truth he finds that the Sad-Guru, the Scriptures and pure reason point equally and exclusively to the Truth. The reason of the conditioned soul cannot be saved from the state of unavoidable ignorance by its own exertion. If it tries to do so it only makes its position worse by its blundering attempts. This is the plight of the consistent empiricist. There is a function for the reason in the quest after the Truth. But that function is of a secondary nature. It can confirm the propriety of the regulations of the Scriptures after their true meaning is found out by the mercy of the Sad-Guru. If it does not observe these wholesome and rational limits to its operation it is bound to go astray. Such abuse of the faculty of reason need not be misnamed as freedom of individual judgment.

There is no loss of freedom in recognising the real existence of the Source of all enlightenment. There is both unity as well as harmony in the Source of all cognitive activity. It is, of course, perfectly inconceivable to the un-enlightened reason that it is at all possible for it to approach, by any reasonable method, the Source of all cognition. But it need not, therefore, postulate by any inconclusive assumption the impossibility or undesirability of approaching the Source by the method of natural and unconditional submission.

Sri Nityanandaprabhu made his appearance in this world as the precursor of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya. Lord Nityananda was commissioned subsequently by Sri Chaitanyadeva to preach the Holy Name of Krishna at the doors of all persons without exception. This shows that the Power which is wielded by Lord Nityananda belongs really to the Supreme Lord Himself. There is thus no distinction between the Power of the Supreme Lord and that of Lord Nityananda or that of the Sad-Guru whose power is identical with that of Lord Nityananda. But it also proves that there is such a thing as the real delegation of specific function of the Supreme Lord to appropriate agents. Sri Krishna Chaitanya is no doubt the Supreme Teacher of all persons. But Lord Nityananda exercises this function on behalf of the Supreme Lord. He exercised it even when the Supreme Lord Himself appeared in this world.

Sri Krishna Chaitanya is the Supreme Teacher of the world by His own example. This is also the specific nature of the function of the Sad-Guru. Sri Krishna is also the Supreme Teacher. But He does not teach by His own example. Sri Krishna Chaitanya is identical with Sri Krishna. He is, therefore, also the Master. But He chooses to conduct Himself as His Servant. Lord Nityananda performs the external part of this function of the Supreme Lord. He is the connecting link between the external world and Sri Chaitanya. There is also an inner world in which Lord Nityananda has a function which is different from His function concerning the external world. A conditioned soul has no access to the inner world but may have direct connection with Lord Nityananda or with the Sad-Guru who is identical with Nityananda.

The service of Sri Gaursundar is identical with the service of Sri Krishna because Sri Chaitanya is identical with Sri Krishna. But the Activity of Sri Chaitanya is different from that of Sri Krishna. There is for this reason a corresponding difference in the methods of their respective services. Sri Gaursundar is to be served as the Supreme Teacher Who teaches by His own example. He is at the same time the Supreme Lord Himself. These two principles require to be combined in the service of Sri Gaursundar. The service of Sri Gaursundar alone can in this Iron Age enable the conditioned soul to attain to the service of Sri Krishna.

But Sri Gaursundar can be truly served only by the method of serving Lord Nityananda. Lord Nityananda is also Divine Functionary. But He is more merciful than even Sri Gaursundar Himself, because He is accessible to all conditioned souls even of this Iron Age. For this reason it is also much more difficult to understand the real nature of Lord Nityananda. He has been accordingly widely misunderstood by both contemporaries and succeeding generations. There is no other road to Vaikuntha, the Holy Abode of Lord Nityananda, than a sincere heart. It is possible to get rid of mistakes to which a sincere nature is liable. But when the muddled intellect is allowed to mislead the heart by its casuistries the plight of the offending soul is rendered very much worse. Such is the condition of most persons, and especially of the Pandits, in this Iron Age. It was, therefore, necessary for Lord Nityananda Himself to come down into this world for the deliverance of the sophists and pharisees of this quarrelsome Age by exploding their long-spun nostrums, for good.

Installation of the Foot-Prints of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya in the temple of Varahadeva at Jajpur, Orissa

The Scriptures speak of the Archavatara. The Archa is of eight kinds. The Archa appears in this world in order to make available to us, who are most unfortunate and possessed of the densest of judgment, the causeless mercy of the Supreme Lord. Krishna appeared in this world in the remote Age of Dwapara. We are so unfortunate that we have been born after such a long period from that time. This would have made it impossible for us to have a sight of Krishna if His Holy Form as Archa had not condescended to bless our sight by His appearance in this world at all times. Those who do not accept the testimony of the Scriptures on this point are most unfortunate, indeed. Neither are they any more fortunate who persist in regarding the Archa as merely mundane symbol of the Divinity which can be set up machanically by any ordinary workman in the same way as he makes dolls for children.

One must not regard the Archa of Vishnu as merely a piece of stone: One who thinks the Archa to be stone wholly misunderstands the Divine purpose. It is because Godhead is pleased to make His appearance among us in the Form of the Archa that it is at all possible for us, who are possessed of extremely dense judgment and power of vision, to approach Him by way of worship. The worship of dolls made by man is no doubt idolatry. But the method of archana laid down in the Scriptures must not be confounded with idolatry. It is the special prerogative of the devotee of Godhead to bring about the appearance of the Divinity in the Form of the Archa Whom all people of this world may approach for the purpose of worship.

The installation of the Foot-Prints of Lord Chaitanya must be understood as an act inspired by the desire to serve the Divinity by this method enjoined by the Scriptures. It was in 1510 A. D. that Lord Chaitanya performed the Lila of visiting Sri Varahadeva at Jajpur. Some former devotee of the Lord in immemorial antiquity had been the agent for bringing about the appearance of the Sri Bigraha of Sri Varahadeva on the holy site on which His temple stands to this day, for enabling all persons to have an uninterrupted sight of Sri Varahadeva who originally appeared in this world in the ante-diluvian period of which the account has been preserved in the Puranas and which event took place long before the earliest hymn of the present collection of the Rig-Samhita was composed.

The Veda is identical with knowledge of the Divinity. The Veda is eternal. To the saints the knowledge of Godhead appears in its true form, which is spiritual and without beginning or end. But the Veda also appears in a symbolical form to the apprehension of worldly people. It does so in the exoteric form. This exoteric form is subject to seeming growth and disappearance. In this manner the Veda disappears from the view of the people of this world at the appointed periods. Then we have what is called in the Scriptures the great Deluge. From the bottom of the deep waters of this periodical Deluge the Supreme Lord in the form of the Holy Boar lifts the Scriptures. So the Scriptures even in their exoteric form are prevented from being lost to the world. The Holy Boar is one of the eternal plenary Forms of the Divinity. It must not be supposed that His Function of rescuing the Veda from the Flood is an event that belongs to the category of the events of this world. This event in its spiritual or esoteric form, is eternal. Therefore, it is possible for a person by the mercy of the Supreme Lord to be able to obtain the sight of the real Form of Sri Varahadeva at all time. The Archa of Sri Varahadeva at Jajpur presents only His exoteric view to those unfortunate persons who are constitutionally averse to the pure service of Godhead.

But the testimony of all the Godless people of this world can neither prove nor disprove the existence or appearnce of the Holy spiritual Form of Sri Varahadeva at Jajpur. In this case we are necessarily placed at the mercy of the pure devotees of Godhead. They alone are privileged to have the sight of the Archavatara as He really is. No knowledge of the Divinity is possible unless it is made available by the causeless mercy of Sri Varahadeva. Sri Varahadeva prevails against the Deluge. This is the meaning of the worship of Sri Varahadeva. It is the favourite worship in the South of India. The worship of Sri Varahadeva is appropriately combined with that of Sri Nrisinghadeva. Sri Nrisinghadeva is the eternal Protector of the pure devotees of Godhead and the Subduer of all enemies of the devotees. The devotee can never be put down by the hostility of the enemies of Godhead.

Those who are sincerely inclined to serve the Truth realise in every act of service the enlightening and protecting functions of the Divinity. A devotee of Godhead has no ambition of conquering the enemies of the Truth by his own un-aided power. He knows very well that all power really belongs to the Supreme Lord. Unless this humility is realised there can be no real service of Godhead. Atheists refuse to accept the mercy of the Supreme Lord and His devotees. They do not want really to serve anybody or anything. It is their ambition to become possessors of all power by their own right. Such ambition is due to utter ignorance of their own real nature. They are infinitesimally small in comparison with Godhead. It is not possible for everything to serve such a small thing. There are many small things both in this world and in the realm of the Absolute. These small things may either try to lord it over one another, to co-operate with one another in lording it over themselves or they may serve things that are greater than themselves. In this world the small things pursue the first two methods. This is ego-worship. It is a very mean thing because the ego is so small. These ego-worshippers are punished by being endowed with an abnormal vision which is incapable of perceiving any thing which is really greater than themselves. To such persons the Archa of Sri Varahadeva appears as an idol made by man.

Lord Chaitanya taught the people the method of getting rid of their abnormal vision. This makes it necessary for all to worship the Feet of Lord Chaitanya as a preliminary to the worship of the Archa of Sri Varahadeva. Lord Chaitanya is no other than Lord Krishna Himself appearing in the Form of His own devotee. He taught the service of the Supreme Lord, that is of Himself, by Himself practising the same. But Lord Chaitanya is not a small thing. If Lord Chaitanya is supposed to be a small thing it will not be possible to follow His teachings or that of His associates. The Dispensation for the Kali Yuga has been proclaimed by Lord Chaitanya. This function, by the testimony of all the Scriptures, can belong only to the Divinity. Those who do not recognise the Divinity of Lord Chaitanya cannot have any faith in the method of worship taught by the Supreme Lord. Lord Chaitanya instituted the mode of worship in the form of the congregational chant (Samkirtanam). The Scriptures have proclaimed the Samkirtanam to be the Divinely ordained form of worship for the Kali Yuga. It will not do to belittle the explicit testimony of the Holy Scriptures, because no worship can stand at all except on the Scriptures.

The shrines visited by Lord Chaitanya are thereby rendered, for this reason, the holiest tirthas of the Kali Yuga. They have always been holy tirthas. But in the Kali Yuga the Divinity is not visible to the people on account of the prevalence of atheism and hypocrisy. Therefore, the holy tirthas themselves had become powerless to purify the hearts of men. It was necessary to infuse vigour into the sanctifying power of the tirthas themselves. This was done by the pilgrimage of Lord Chaitanya. The temple of Sri Varahadeva at Jajpur in Orissa was one of the tirthas that was sanctified by the auspicious visit of Lord Chaitanya.

There can not be a greater obligation on every follower of Lord Chaitanya than to undertake the pilgrimage to the holy tirthas visited by the Lord. They should specially visit the Varaha-Nrisingha temples in the South of India in order to obtain the enlightening and protecting mercies of the Supreme Lord. Without such mercy it is never possible for a person born in this faithless Age to acquire any strength of real spiritual conviction.

Sri Sri Vyasa-Puja

THE anniversary of the advent of the present Acharyya His Divine Grace Paramhansa Paribrajakacharyya Sri Srimad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj was duly celebrated on the 7th of February by the community of the Madhva-Gaudiya Vaishnavas who follow Lord Chaitanya. The worship of Sri Guru is known as Sri Vyasa Puja.

The Acharyya is the spiritual Head of the community. He possesses authority over the members of the spiritual community which cannot be challenged by any one within the community. If any member opposes the authority of the Acharyya he is automatically excluded from all communion with the other members. The authority of the Acharyya is not derived from the members of the community and cannot, therefore, be taken away by any or all of them. The un-conditional, willing submission to the authority of the Acharyya alone admits to membership of the spiritual community. In this sense there is nothing illogical or improper about the autocratic power of the Acharyya.

The authority of the Acharyya is maintained, in its external appearance, by the willing submission of all members of the community. But no one is forced, as a matter of fact, to act against his individual conviction in any case. This is bound to puzzle all persons who are confirmed believers in the exclusive excellence of the democratic method. The service of the Acharyya is truly democratic in the sense that it involves no compulsion against any individual member while securing the whole-hearted and unanimous co-operation of one and all individual or communal activities. This is certainly the substance of democracy in the process of working, but not in the process of origination, of authority.

Spiritual authority is always and necessarily fully authoritative. This is so because it is the real thing itself. The so-called authority which is exercised in this world by one fettered soul over another is always really challengeable by the equal authority of every other individual who professes to be under it. In such arrangement no one is really either master or sub-ordinate by inalienable right. Everyone only plays a part that suits the occasion and for the time being. Therefore, the terms 'authority', 'obedience,' etc., refer really to the same process which is described by the Scriptures as that of the futile attempt to dominate over apparently indestructive and unsubduable forces and principles. There is, however, always present the hope of ultimately succeeding in the self-contradictory process of mastery over equals.

Even when a human being is allowed to have any authority over anybody or anything he knows very well that such show of conferring power does not really modify in any way his actual position of utter helplessness. He is entirely as much under the power of every one of his followers as the latter happens to be under himself. The vanity of power is the hollowest of all vanities. If I have to persuade in order to command and if that is also the condition of every one who is available for co-operating with me in this process, are not both of us misguided if we suppose that any of us can really either command or obey the other? Possession of power is as much necessary for being able to command as to obey. Both of us are bankrupts in that matter. The process, therefore, despite every possible variety of shuffling and manipulation, can never get rid of its actual unreality. It is for this reason that no one can expect or feel any real satisfaction by such wild-goose-chase.

All of us can fortunately distinguish between the substance of power and its mere shadow. It is also our nature to dseire to deal with the substance. If it be equally the nature of the substantive Reality to be the only Possessor of all power then we can have no dealing with Him if we do not really want to obey in the absolute or true sense of the term. It is not possible for one who has no access to the real Possessor of power to understand the nature of real obedience. The Master, servant and service, in the absolute sense, become realities simultaneously to the soul as soon as he attains the plane of spiritual service.

The spiritual Head of the community of the servants of Godhead possesses authority over all members of the community by Divine delegation. His possession of power is thus saved from the transgression against the Divinity associated with its attempted usurpation. The same fact makes real obedience to the Acharyya not only possible but natural and legitimate for pure souls who alone are also in a position to render such obedience.

The Acharyya, however, exercises his real power solely in the service of the Divinity. He does not accept the obedience of the members of the community as rendered to himself as Master, but as the servant of the Master and for the service of the Master. But he is not accountable to anyone else except the Master for the proper exercise of his authority. This is the only rationally conceivable arrangement by which real service can be rendered to Godhead by the process of constant support from Above but without losing our freedom of initiative. The worship of the Acharyya is, therefore, not only perfectly compatible with the principle of pure monotheism, but absolutely necessary for truly serving the Divinity without in any way encroaching upon His Omnipotence.

We tread upon delicate ground when we approach the issue as to whether the Head of the spiritual community must be unconditionally obeyed by all persons who desire to attain the spiritual service of Godhead. In other words, is the Acharyya the only authoritative teacher of the whole world? Spiritual authority cannot, of course, be divided into parts that are really independent of one another. There must be an un-interruptible chain of relationships leading up to undivided and unconditional allegiance to the sole Master. The Acharyya is, therefore, supreme within his proper jurisdiction. There cannot, however, be more than one Head of the community. The power of the Head as Head cannot be delegated to any individual member or even to the community as a whole. It is inconceivable how there can be more than one spiritual Head in the world at one and the same time. All the others must be under the Head. They may have subordinate authority under the Head but no authority equal to or independently of the real Head of the spiritual community.

It also follows that there can be only one spiritual community in the whole world. This is not sectarianism. It is the inevitable corrollary of the Absolute position itself. The Absolute cannot tolerate any co-existent entity that is not absolutely dependent on Himself. The Acharyya, within His jurisdiction, is identical with the Absolute.

The 57th anniversary of the auspicious advent of the Acharyya of the Madhva-Gaudiya Vaishnava community was observed by all members of the community in the truly catholic spirit indicated above. It is open to every pure soul all over the world to join the community by the method of unconditional willing personal submission to the Acharyya for the purpose of being enlightened regarding the true nature of the spiritual function that can alone satisfy the real want of every individual soul. The response made by the Acharyya to the offers of homage rendered by all members of the community on this occasion, appears on a separate page. Earnest attention of all persons all over the world without distinction of caste, creed, colour, sex or age, is invited to the pronouncement of the Acharyya on the occasion. The Acharyya speaks in a language which directly approaches the soul and should, therefore, be listened to in that spirit. No seemingly obstructive conditions of this world need be supposed to have power to prevent the effective communion of soul with soul in the real sense.

Sri Vyasa-Puja Homage

My most affectionate Divine Master,

In the deepest gloom of Ne-science
While there enveloped I lay,
The voice of an unknown friend
Brought me tidings of the day.

A mere casual occurrence,
It has e'er seemed so to me :
Verily it was th' beginning
Of the life eternal and free !

It is the way of Krishna,—
And of all who serve His Feet,—
To come upon the conditioned soul
When he does not expect quite.

Krishna is the One Attracter,
Most Perfect and most Un-known ;
His Majesty and Divine State
Wear yet a delusive Form.

His exquisite Charm the dull intellect
Of man does never impress.
The Lord is eternally about us,
Who only see Him by His Grace,

Our pre-conceptions of His Glory,
Like dreams of riches of the poor,
Only prove our own bankrupcy,
And nothing more.

Krishna is Un-confinable ;
His Ways never can be fixed ;
They hover mid-way, reaching out
To the greatest and the least.

His real Perfection He ever hides
By perfection's own living Ways ;
There's no condition so un-promising
That may not Him express.

Such is Krishna ; such are also
The ways of those who truly serve Him;
It's not given to man to measure
The span of the State Divine.

So let us humbly bide the hour
When it may please the Lord
To come to us in the promised Form
His Knowledge to afford.

That Form art Thou, Teacher of the Truth.
With reverence to Thee I bow,—
The servant whom the Lord Himself
Hath sent to us below.

But we, in our vanity, cannot know
The really perfect and true :
We love to worship rank and state,
Or stop to hug the false and low.

But you seem neither ; and yet,
So familiar appear all your ways,
That our wisest formulœ afford
No clue to what you deign express.

Such, indeed, it needs must be,—
The ways of the immaculate soul ;
He is self-poised in the bliss
That silently draws the hearts of all.

Our wish for joy's own self is faint :
The world itself has ceased to hope.
Thy words have brought the tidings
That will yet afford the scope.

Thy words fill the whole world
With the new expectation of life,
To live to serve the feet of Krishna
Which can make us truly live.

Krishna's Will must ever prevail,
By His living agent's Will,
Krishna's Mercy alone may help us
Loyally to serve Him still.

But we are doubtless sorely prest ;
And, in this hour of utter need,
May Krishna's Mercy guide us still
To find the friend indeed.

We cannot say we understand
Fully what you do declare ;
But still you, surely draw our hearts
To commune with you in prayer

And we find we can really pray,
With all the grace of love,
When yourself lead the prayer,
And there is no necessity to grope.

For this alone we have come to you,
To tell you frankly as we feel,—
So the Scriptures also bid us,—
For gaining your goodwill.

By your goodwill th' new-born hope
Will never cease to grow ;
And how we are to serve the Lord
We shall really learn to know.

May your Holiness graciously
Accept this homage of our hearts ;
So by your blessing we may learn,
At your feet, to love the Lord.

And may your Grace for aye abide
In the chamber of our hearts ;
To guide us also from within
And teach the loyal servant's part.

In loyal obedience,
Your Divine Grace's humble servant
Sri Jaigopal Das Adhikari

Sri Vyasa-Puja Homage

MY MOST AFFECTIONATE MASTER,

I am at a loss to find suitable language by which to address you. I want to tell you my heart, I do not mind whether anybody else may understand. My trouble is with myself. I pray to you to give me the language that will make me know that you approve what I say.

I do not understand you. I know that you always guide me aright and that I cannot do without your constant guidance. Nothing also can give me real satisfaction unless I feel it to be your guidance. Even now as I speak to you I am disposed to hold my breath till I am able definitely to feel your guidance. I have no taste for confidence in myself. I know very well that I can, indeed, of my own accord do whatever I like, without consciously depending on you. I confess that I have also to do so very often, from, what seems to me to be, sheer necessity. I also can often realise after doing so that your hand had not relinquished its hold of me even when I was quite unconscious of its support. In fact I am never wholly unconscious of your support. Still I can find a special satisfaction in always consciously imploring your help. I feel helpless when I do not do so. At any rate I do certainly feel unhappy when I do not duly observe this piece of most useful formality.

In offering this homage I pray to you, entirely for my own unreasonable satisfaction, that I may do it by your conscious support. In your conscious support consists the whole of my originality. I always find that I can excel my utmost expectations of success with such help. Even those who do not accept this method for themselves admit its wonderful efficacy in my case. But they probably do not value my method for its originality, as I do. I alone find in it my own proper self fully expressed. This may appear to be self-contradictory, but I know it to be the perfection of consistency, as a matter of actual, direct, personal experience.

I do my prostrated obeisances to your Divine lotus feet. In this performance of homage your acceptance is the one thing needful for me. Whatever pleases you has the natural quality of pleasing me in the only really satisfactory way. Therefore I claim the credit of doing what every egotist would do if only he knew what it really is. To you entirely belongs the credit of making it known to me without my seeking for it. How, indeed, could I seek for that of which I happened to be wholly ignorant ?

This address is an infliction on you. You permit it as you know very well that I would be miserable if I am not permitted to do it. If you had not permitted, it would have been equally satisfactory for me to abstain from it. Now that you actually permit, it is better to do it than not. But this rule also does not hold always. It is not least satisfactory to feel very, very sad, indeed, after wilfully disobeying you. So in every way it is satisfactory to have to deal with you knowing what you really are.

The only thing necessary is to know you as you really are. But that also is probably impossible. It is sufficient to know anything of you in a friendly way. It is only necessary to know you as the only friend. Anything short of this is not to know you at all. Because you are always apprehended as the only friend. Those who tell me that I have any other friends besides you, are my real enemies. By this test also I have found a great many real friends after I made your acquaintance. They are the only other friends, besides yourself, that I have.

I wonder why there should be so many persons who really do not know you. I myself once happened to be quite unaware of your very existence. That was one kind of ignorance. There is another kind. There are persons who are found to know you but who do not recognise you as the only real friend. This is partly your doing. Because I know that you can make them know you truly, if you like. It is impossible to understand your ways fully. But those who know you are well aware that you are the only friend of every-body. Those who do not know you are, however, the only persons who are wholly miserable. I now know it, by your cause-less mercy.

What am I to say to you on this occasion ? How am I to worship you in the formal way ? You are constantly present in the heart. Is that not real worship ? That is at any rate in accord with the the definition of upasana. I feel your constant loving touch in every activity. Yes, at times I miss it also, and do not always feel sad on such occasions, as I know that it is your way not to show yourself continuously in the same form. I am content to watch your ways most attentively. After the seeming intervals of absence of direct touch you always reveal yourself in much more loving relationship than ever before. But this is also not easily realisable. They who know your moods perfectly well, alone can always find out your real intention. But the full content of no incident regarding you can be exhausted by description nor is it communicable to one who does not know you.

Those who have known you only once, cannot misunderstand you wholly. It is only to them that it is worth one's while to describe you as you really are. The greatest of happiness consists in describing you to those who know you. They are never satiated by hearing about you from the lips of those who really know you. Those who know you are never tired of speaking about you to please those who know you. Those who love you less than they can, find the talk of your devotees un-intelligible.

I have heard of God-head from your lips. Therefore I believe in Him. But as a matter of fact I really do not know God-head in the same way as I know you. You are to me the only sure standard of all real knowledge. If I am to find God-head I have to find Him in you. But I am not very anxious to find God-head, as I have yet very little knowledge of Him. It may or may not be my good fortune to be ever able to really know Him. I would, however, wish to know Him through you, in order to please you only.

You are the link between me and your other servants. It is you who made me know them as they really are. They are dear to me because they enable me, by every act of theirs, to know you more and more intimately. From this I infer that when you will introduce me to God-head He will enable me to know you fully and permanently. This supremely beneficent quality of yours is more than human.

You are the best-beloved of the Lord. In this consists your Divinity. It is, of course, possible for an ordinary mortal like myself to attain to the service of yourself by your grace and also to recognise it as identical with the service of the Divinity. It is also possible to realise one's association with yourself, in a subordinate way, in such service. But it is never possible for a mortal to understand the nature of your relationship with the Divinity as the Object of your worship. This impossibility is known in every act of serving you.

You appear to be identical with God-head and yet not manifestly the same. This puzzle is never solved. You are nearer to man than God-head Himself Who is the sole object of his worship, who cannot understand this except by your grace. It passes the understanding of man to realise your boundless mercy. You are truly the Embodiment of Divine Mercy in Her most exclusive Form. By you we realise the magnanimous Nature of Shree Gaursundar Himself. The worldly-minded are disposed to be sceptical, because it is unthinkable that the Divinity can really be so near to ourselves. They are, therefore, apt to think that you are on the level of ordinary mortals. This is so because you choose to meet us on this mundane plane without concealing your Divine Nature. The very magnitude of your mercy is the real obstacle in the way of our understanding your real nature.

Man cannot conceive how it is possible to be both reasonable and merciful to perfection at one and the same time. But this is exactly Your Nature. Your mercy, therefore, always appears to man as being less than human. In this infatuation he has not even the patience of listening to your explanation of your conduct. Nay, we are quickly enough disposed to regard your explanation as even worse than your conduct.

I have found lots of persons who are most patient to all other people, but can have no patience at all for you. It is verily the nemesis of the crime of the possession of the sense of merit by one's own right. Egotism in every conceivable and inconceivable form, is the real rock on which all worldly persons are sure to make a complete and deserved ship-wreck in their quest of you. It is those very egotists who think that you are the worst of their class. This is the logical result of rank egotism. The graceless egotist is sure to mistake all manifestations of real candour by reason of his having no principle to know it by.

That is also my own difficulty, even although I have had the rare good fortune of having been allowed to associate in your service of God-head for a considerable period. I often feel it extremely difficult to sympathise with you in the most characteristic portions of your activities. I can well understand that you have always to come to my level in some inconceivable way in order to enable me to understand my error by your participation in my activity on my own line. But even so I do not fully understand either my own error, or your true purpose in regard to myself. As soon as I am allowed to be in touch with you I feel that I can then function independently without the chance of going wrong in any way. And the march of progressive improvement is only then fully assured.

The attitude of objection to accepting your constant guidance is the outcome of our ignorance of the real nature of the spiritual function. We are apt to assume hastily that the spiritual function is only the perfection of the physico-mental function in some partially conceivable form. This is the basic blunder. The spiritual is certainly perfect. But it is by no means the same as the physical or the mental. It is not the mental function. But we are too much habituated to regard the mental, or at any rate the perfection of the mental, as the spiritual. It is not really possible for us to avoid thinking so, even after its mischief has been pointed out to us in an unmistakable way.

There is a categorical difference that completely separates the mental from the spiritual. It is necessary to stop the functioning of the mind, not partially, but fully. Or rather when the soul begins to function the mental activity is automatically altogether eliminated. The soul functions without any other help except his own. But the mind has no faculty by which it can at all realise this. The mind can experience only either physical or mental function. It can also try to guess the spiritual function in terms of these. By this foolish trick it falls into most pathetic blunders without being able to be really conscious of the nature of its un-avoidable plight.

The mentalist is within his rights in refusing to accept constant mental guidance from another. It cannot expedite the mental function, because the mental process itself is always imperfect. The minds of no two persons can act in perfect unison. Could they really do so the distinctive personality of one of them at least would be lost. Even when two minds profess to agree about any subject they can agree only by differing. There cannot and need not be identity of views as between two minds. Even when two minds agree most perfectly neither of them, as a matter of fact, can really know the other. For all these reasons, and many more, one mind finds it useless to try to be constantly guided by another, even if such a course were not also wholly impracticable, as it is.

Mental guidance accordingly, naturally and necessarily, takes the intelligible form of the attempt to persuade. The function hardly deserves the name of guidance. In the case of children, indeed, more than persuasion may be attempted, but this additional factor is nothing but compulsion. The compulsory method of education also does not produce any real agreement. There is no sufficient ground for assuming that even mathematicians can agree in any perfect manner. In cases where a good deal of known ignorance is felt to be unavoidable some sort of working, that is fictitious, agreement (?) is adopted as a method. This starting convention conditions all subsequent deductions based on it. Thus we obtain what are known as mathematical identity and agreement. It is true that these assumptions are found to be of help in reaching hypothetical conclusions that are supposed to enable mankind to utilise the opportunities provided by physical Nature for effecting the assumed well-being of their body and mind. But the whole of this optimistic system may well appear to be nothing more nor less than that proverbially undoubted wisdom that only makes its appearance after the event. Unless Nature herself chooses to disclose her secrets to our hypothetical nature it is not possible for us even to know hypotheses, not even with the help of the so-called science of mathematics.

But the spiritual function is not a hypothetical one. The hypothetically wise are, indeed, quite free to object to this and to prefer their blundering hypotheses. Only let them not also wilfully confound the one with the other.

Mental guidance is really sheer contradiction in terms. It is like one blind man leading another. If any blind man resents such guidance and prefers to go astray by his own blind contrivance we need not suppose him to be altogether foolish

But as the object of all of us is to arrive at the Truth, it will be impossible to do so by either method. There is, however, a way, the only way, by which we can reach the Truth. That way cannot be known except by your special grace. The bestowal of this knowledge is your distinctive function. It cannot be shared by any other. Those who suppose that the Acharyya is not the world-Teacher, cannot know you at all. There is no other teacher of the Truth in this world. Those who agree with you, by such agreement are also enabled to teach the Truth ; but even they cannot impart the actual knowledge of Him. They can only direct the sincere seeker to you.

The Acharyya wields the power of Krishna Himself. His utterances are those of Krishna Himself. If they are not intelligible to any person it only shows that the person has not obtained the mercy of the Acharyya. That is all. You always warn us not to approach the Absolute in a challenging spirit. If one approaches you in the genuine submissive mood he is enabled gradually to understand you. Krishna does whatever you ask Him to do. But Krishna never forgives one who does not wholly submit to you. It is this that you mean when you advise us not to approach you in the challenging spirit.

Your guidance is, therefore, absolutely necessary for every one of us, to whatever caste or community we may profess to belong. No plea will save us from the terrible punishment of utter ignorance if we withhold our full submission from you. In this matter there is no choice.

Similarly every creed and dogma must owe you perfect allegiance if they want to be True. There is no difference, either in the method or the goal, in the true function of the individual soul. I find the truth of everything and all the revelations in you. The Absolute can be nothing less than yourself. Those who oppose your due, can have no real love for the Truth.

The difficulty is that we have been too long accustomed to admit the claims of so-called religious teachers who have been content to accept something far short of complete homage for the Truth Whom they have professed to give away to their hearers. They themselves did not know what they promised. I am afraid none of them ever seriously proposed really to give the Truth to anybody. Neither did any of their disciples admit to have actually received Him at their hands. The disciples, indeed, could not receive what the teacher himself has not in his power to give. You profess to give everyone, who follows your teaching, the eternal life for the eternal service of Krishna. You do not purpose to bestow on mankind merely the barren gift of a plausible system that leaves us where we are.

These are not words of adulation. I describe what every one of us really want. None of us should care to have anything at all, rather than have less. All of us require equally the Truth Absolute, at any rate from a teacher of the Absolute. But all of us also require nothing more nor less than the Truth. You declare yourself to be able to give us the Truth. This is the only function of the Acharyya. Why should, therefore, any one look aghast when your true nature and function are described and one is asked to deal with you accordingly ?

You are not an ordinary mortal like ourselves, despite the apparent complete semblance. Those who deal with you as an ordinary mortal are not allowed by the deluding Energy of Krishna to have any real knowledge of you. Why should any person approach you at all, unless for the purpose of learning about the Truth ? In order to learn the Truth it is necessary for one to follow the proper method of enquiry. If, nevertheless, anyone takes it into his head to come to you for a different purpose but tells you that he wants to know the Truth, should not the Deluding Energy of Krishna, whose function is to keep at a safe distance from Krishna all those persons who have no real love for him, prevent him from even suspecting your real nature ? The resources of Maya are infinite. Not even the cleverest of atheists can see through her stratagems.

In offering this humble homage at your lotus feet I thought that I could do nothing more congenial to the pure devotees of Krishna than describe your mercies by your grace. It is not my intention to try to please any one else in this matter. The occasion is not such that I should try to please any atheists, even if I could ever like to do so. I believe, however, that there is no one of that class in this gathering here to-day. If unfortunately there be any, I beg to be excused for trying to tell the unvarnished Truth Whom he is not prepared for the present to admit at all.

I make my prostrated obeisances to the holy lotus feet of Shree Gurudeva Who is most graciously pleased to open my eyes, sealed with the impenetrable gloom of utter ignorance, by the spike of the collyrium of Knowledge.

May your Divine Grace be mercifully inclined to accept this humble offer of submission and make it real by your causeless mercy in accepting the same.

Your Divine Grace' most unworthy servant,
Narayandas Adhikari, Bhaktisudhakar, Bhaktisastri.

Sri Vyasa-Puja Response

(Speech by His Divine Grace Paramhansa Paribrajakacharyya Sri Srimad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj, Acharyya of the Madhva-Gaudiya Vaishnava Community, at the Abidyaharan Natyamandir of Sri Chaitanya Math, Sridham Mayapur, on Feb. 7th, 1931, 9 P. M.)

'OBEISANCE to Sri Guru by whom the eyes, sealed with the profound gloom of utter ignorance, have been opened with the spike of the collyrium of knowledge.'

This is the day which affords me leisure for worshipping the lotus-feet of my Sri Guru. I had this good fortune of worshipping Sri Gurudeva also last year. That opportunity has presented itself again to-day. By the mercy of Godhead we obtained the opportunity of serving Sri Guru for the period of one year. If the lotus-feet of Sri Guru intended to deprive us of his service we would not have been given to live through the year. We have been allowed to live for one full year. The time has arrived when we are in a position to consider whether we have been able to serve the lotus-feet of Sri Guru in proportion to the opportunity. The lotus-feet of Sri Guru have said that we shall serve Godhead in association with one another. By the word 'we' he did not mean any one individual. There are many persons who are very selfish, indeed. They say, 'I alone shall serve. It is incumbent upon me alone. No one else has any claim to my service of Godhead'. But the kind heart of Sri Gurudeva says, 'Come, let all of us jointly worship Godhead by giving up malice.' The service of Godhead is the highest of all function. But the lotus-feet of my Sri Guru cherish no malice. He does not say that others will be unable to do the work because it happens to be the highest. Neither does he say that he will not allow any other person to serve Godhead, on the ground that it is the highest of all functions. The chant that is performed jointly by all persons is samkirtanam. 'That kirtanam which is performed by many jointly is alone samkirtanam'. Prayer, praising Godhead, is included in samkritam.

Judged by external appearance the position of one who prays, or praises, is observed to be lower than that of the Object to whom prayer or praise is addressed. A third party who is prepared to lend his ear, is in a very good position to understand how far in the function of praise the greatness of the person who praises has advanced beyond that of the Object praised, or is possessed in excess of that of the latter.

These are the words spoken by Sri Gaursundar Himself that 'It is necessary to be humbler than a blade of grass if one is really anxious to take the Name of Godhead.' One never supplicates another unless one realises his own littleness. When we pray for the help of other persons we consider ourselves helpless. A certain work cannot be done by myself; it is, therefore, necessary to take the help of others, if I want to do the work at all. Any work that can be done only by five persons acting together is not possible to be performed by one's own un-aided efforts. Sri Gaursundar has told us to take the Name of Godhead. We hear these tidings from the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. Sri Gaursundar has told us to call upon the Name of Godhead, which means that He has told us to accept the help of Godhead. He has also told us to be humbler than a blade of grass when we call upon the Name of Godhead. If we call upon Godhead for converting Him into our servant or want to take His help for doing any work on our own account we cannot preserve the quality of humility greater than that of the blade of grass. External exhibition of humility is not that quality of lowliness which is humbler than the blade of grass. Mere show of humility is nothing but insincerity or hypocricy. That manner of calling which is responded to by one's subordinate does not reach Godhead. Because He is the Supreme, Independent, Perfect, Self-conscious Entity Who is subject to none. It is necessary to fully establish one's individuality in the state of guileless humility. If this is not done one's prayer does not reach the Perfect Autocrat.

There is another condition. It is necessary to call upon Godhead by being humbler than a blade of grass. It is also necessary at the same time to be possessed of the quality of patience. If we are not patient we cannot call upon Godhead in the manner that will reach Him. We become impatient whenever we covet anything. Covetousness is the opposite of humility. We must fully believe in Godhead. We must believe in His Plenitude. We can have no wants if we call upon Him. If we have this perfect faith we cannot be wanting in patience. On the other hand if we are covetous, if we are betrayed into inconstancy by our impatience, if we secretly cherish any plan of gaining our object by means of any ability or merit of our own, then we are no longer in the condition to call upon Godhead.

Prayer to Godhead is also impossible if on the contrary one is occupied with the attempt merely to destroy one's self-conceit.

On many occasions we suppose that it is due to our own innate kindness that we at all pray to Godhead or recite His praises; that it is open to us to be engaged in any other work without calling upon Godhead as a matter of necessity. Such judgment is also indicative of want of patience. It is necessary to have a Protector to save us from such inclinations of the mind. It is necessary to have a Protector to save us from being deprived of the quality of guileless humility greater than that of a blade of grass. It is necessary to have a Refuge for being saved from such evil tendency. Thakur Narottam has said, 'He who serves after obtaining protection is never abandoned by Krishna. All the rest die needlessly.'

It is first of all necessary to obey the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. It is recognised as necessary to have to submit to a teacher to obtain capacity for work, knowledge or the fulfilment of any desires other than Krishna that are available in this world. But the knowledge that those teachers give produces only a variety of small results. The louts-feet of Sri Guru Who teaches about the highest good, do not give trivial fruits like the above. The lotus-feet of Sri Guru provide for our real good. Sri Guru is Godhead in His Function as Protector. The moment there is cessation of the mercy of Sri Guru, diverse evil desires are bound to make their appearance in the world. It is necessary to have the constant help of the spiritual teacher to show us the way. It is necessary to be constantly advised regarding the method of seeking the protection of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru, to be instructed about the mode in which to deal with the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. If the spiritual teacher do not constantly teach us all these matters we are bound to lose in no time even the treasure that we might receive.

The service of the Holy Name is undoubtedly the only method by which we can really serve Godhead. It is Sri Gurudeva Who bestows on us the gift of this method of service. It, therefore, stands to reason that it should be our duty, above every other thing, to worship the lotus-feet of Sri Guru at the beginning of the new year. In the Bhakti-Rasamritasindhu Sri Rupa Goswami prabhu has said, 'Accepting the protection of the feet of Sri Guru is, therefore, the first duty. The next duty is to learn from him about Krishna by the processes of diksha, etc. Then follows the duty of serving Sri Guru on a footing of intimacy. This is the path that is followed by the sadhus.

It is our duty to follow their example'.

It is possible for a person to possess a great variety of abilities. It is not possible to make any progress in a realm that is wholly un-known, or which has to be known with great difficulty, by means of any ability however great which we may happen to possess. As an example we may take the case of those future worlds which are kept out of our view, or the entity that is known as the future. It is not possible by our own efforts to make any progress in the knowledge of these matters. The mode of judgment that is applicable to this world is not able to lead us into the realm that is only intelligible to transcendental judgment. In regard to all those periods that are past we have obtained knowledge born of the senses. But we have no knowledge regarding to-morrow. Our eyes can see only to a distance of one or two miles. Our ears can catch the sound from a limited distance only. By means of knowledge that is accessible to such senses we cannot know anything about the transcendental realm which is full of all perfection. If we try to advance into such a realm by no other method than our own ability we can never reach the goal. The demon Ravana tried to build steps by means of which it might be possible for all persons to reach heaven without difficulty. But this structure could not be completed. It tumbled down after it had been constructed to a certain height, for want of support. Nothing can remain for any length of time in the open space without any support. It is bound to break to pieces and fall down. If we try to ascend into the unknowable realm by depending on the stock of our own ability we only tumble down by such effort. We also fall down if we choose to fancy what is trivial or light to be of much consequence or weighty.

It is our duty to judge as to who is Guru and who is of no consequence (laghu). He alone is Guru Who serves that complete substantive Entity Who is the only Object of worship of all persons of any consequence (Guru). I am not speaking of those Gurus who teach the sitar or the art of wrestling. Such Gurus cannot save us from death. We find in one of the shlokas of the Bhagabatam that 'That Guru is no Guru, that father is no father, that mother is no mother, that devata (god) is no devata, that kinsman is no kinsman, who cannot save us from the jaws of death, who cannot give us the eternal life, who cannot save us from the ignorance of death in the shape of addiction to this material world.'

We fall into the jaws of death certainly by reason of our ignorance. We do not fall into the jaws of death by reason of wisdom. We gain a certain kind of knowledge in this world. But that knowledge is of no avail if we become mad, or are stricken with paralysis or after we are dead. If we do not seek the real truth we lose the power of knowing. He who cannot rescue us from the jaws of death can only delude us for a certain number of days. He who tempts us by the sensuous impulses of his words, hands, feet, anus and the organ of generation is a cheat. But the lotus-feet of Sri Guru have power to save us from all deception. It is, therefore, certainly our duty to worship only the lotus-feet of Sri Gurudeva Who is so merciful, at the beginning of every year, at the beginning of every month, at the beginning of every day and at the beginning of every moment, of our lives.

It is my Gurudeva Who is graciously present about me in all the different forms. If He is not graciously present in all these different forms who would then preserve me? Those whom my Gurudeva had made His own are my saviours. But may I never have occasion to see the face of that wicked person who is a source of evil, who maligns the lotus-feet of my Sri Guru or who countenances in any way such a slanderer.

The lotus-feet of my Sri Guru draw me constantly towards Himself. The moment I fall away from those lotus-feet, forget them, I certainly fall away from the Truth. As soon as I fall away from the lotus-feet of Sri Guru I find myself encompassed by an enormous amount of innumerable wants. I run in a hurry for my bath. I become busy for preventing catching cold. I run after other occupations different from the service of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. It is the lotus-feet of Sri Guru that alone protect me constantly from all this attachment for objects other than the Truth. If I do not remember the lotus-feet of Sri Guru at the beginning of every new year, every new month, every new day and every new moment, then I am sure to fall into far greater inconveniences. If I do not do so I want to dress myself in the garb of the Guru. I become liable to the bad desire of seeking to be worshipped by other people as Guru. It is this which is addiction to other things than the Truth. It is not the fact that I have come to perform the worship of the Guru for this day only. We serve Sri Guru every moment, every day.

Gaursundar is directly the same Entity as Krishna. He has appeared here as the world-Teacher. He spoke His teachings in eight stanzas of verse. The Mahanta-Guru and all the other Vaishnavas who are submissively attached to the lotus-feet of the Mahanta-Guru instruct me in every way in those teachings of Sri Gaursundar. All the other Vaishnavas who are submissively attached to the lotus-feet of the Mahanta-Guru, save me from all dangers.

The order of the Gurus who are of the nature of the protecting power of the Divinity, are always present in different forms and figures to bestow their mercies on me. All of them are specific manifestations of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru Who confers spiritual knowledge. The image of the world-Teacher is reflected in a variety of mirrors. The lotus-feet of my Sri Guru is reflected in every object. Krishna as Object of worship is one-Half, and, as the Support of His worshipper, He Himself is the other Half, of the Whole. The variety of reciprocal activity of these Two Moities constitutes the Fullness of the Divinity. Krishna is the complete realisation of the Object of worship. The lotus-feet of my Sri Guru is the complete realisation of the Support of His worship. The transcendental reflections, which are also of the nature of supporters of the worship of the Divinity, which appear in the different planes of cognitive existences, are my Gurudeva in His different forms. He Who is constantly showing us how to serve Godhead, throughout life, is no other than our Sri Guru. The lotus-feet of Sri Guru are reflected in the heart of every individual soul. Sri Guru is present in every object as the supporting principle. He is graciously present in every object. 'All ye trees that be resident on the bank of the Yamuna for benefiting others, chyuta, piyala, panasa, asana, kobidara, jambu, arka, bilwa, bakul, amra, kadamba, neepa and others tell us the way by which Sri Krishna has been seen by you to pass. Our hearts are bereft of all their contents and are feelling very lonely, by separation from Krishna.'

CHAPTER I.

362 'All those who saw knew it to be without precedent.
All said, 'This Person is Narayana Himself.'

363 'Some said, 'Vyas, Suka, Narada or Prahlad
This mercy equals theirs.

364 'All of them held Thee by all their strength.
Thy Mind presently was recalled to external objects.

365 'Thou know'st nothing of all these happenings.
We shall now speak of another subject to which we crave Thy attention.

366 'During these ten days it is only the Name
Krishna and devotion to Krishna
That Thou explain'st as the Meaning of all Shastras and every word.

367 'These ten days our studies are held up.
We all experience a great fear in telling Thee of it.

368 'The infinity of meanings of every word lies open to Thy view.
Even that which Thou explain'st lightly in a laughing mood who has power to contradict by an answer ?'

369 The Lord said, 'If for ten days your study has been in abeyance
It were meet for you all to have already spoken to Me about the same.'

370 All the students now said together, 'Thou explain'st truly.
Krishna is true. This is the significance of all the Shastras.

371 'This is the real study, the essence of all the Scriptures.
Yet in as much as we donot still accept it,
the fault is wholly ours.

372 'That which Thou explain'st is the fundamental truth and the only knowledge worthy of the name.
That our minds do not take to it is due to the offence of our own misdeeds.'

373 The Lord was pleased at the words of His pupils
And began to speak, manifesting the height of mercy.

374 The Lord said, 'My brothers, you have told the truth.
These My words it is not meet to give out elsewhere.

375 'An Infant with the dark complexion plays on the flute.
This is the only thing I see. Brothers, where-fore I speak without ado.

376 'Whatever I hear with My ears is but the name 'Krishna'.
I behold all the world as the Abode of Govinda.

377 'To you all this is my humble apology.
From this day for Me study is no longer.

378 'May all of you learn from the person
Who meets your choice. In this fear naught from Me.

379 'No word except Krishna manifests itself to Me.
I have told you truly My inmost mind.'

380 The Supreme Lord, having given vent to these words,
Tied up His books with eyes moistened by tears.

381 His disciples said after making their obeisance.
'We also make the same resolve as Thine,

382 'All of us have studied even with Thyself.
What manner of knowledge of the books can we have from any other person ?'
383 In the agony of separation from the Teacher all His pupils
Spoke thus amid tears :—
384 'May the reflexion of all expositions that we have heard from Thy lips
Persist in our hearts in every birth.
385 'What else shall we learn, and from whom ?
That is surely sufficient which we have learnt from Thee.'
386 So saying and joining their palms in supplication to the Lord
All the pupils with the hand tied up their books.
387 The students shouted the Name of Hari !
The Jewel of the twice-born wept clasping them to His Bosom.
388 The disciples cried with heads held down
All the pupils were immersed in the supreme bliss.
389 All the students found their voices chocked.
The Lord, Son of Sri Sachi, blessed them.—
390 'If, indeed, I have been the servant of Krishna even for a day,
May the hearts' desire of all of you be fulfilled.
391 'May all of you seek the protection of Krishna.
May the mouths of all be filled with the Name of Krishna.
392 'May you hear constantly the Name
'Krishna' in your ears.
May Krishna be the Treasure and Life of you all.
393 'What ye have learnt is enough, there is no need of further study.
Let us all say Krishna and fare together.
394 'May all the Scriptures manifest themselves in all of you by the Grace of Krishna.
All of you are My friends in every birth.'
395 The disciples on hearing the nectarine words of the Lord
Forthwith in their minds experienced the highest bliss.
396 My obeisance to the feet of those disciples
Who had the high fortune of attaining the discipleship of Chaitanya.
397 All those are the servants of Krishna, know this as certain.
Can one whom Krishna Himself instructs,
be any other ?
398 The very sight of any of them who be held that pastime of learning,
Frees from the fetters of this world.
399 Sinner that I am, I was not born then ;
So was I deprived of that blissful sight.
400 Even so may this mercy be vouchsafed to me
That the selfsame pastime of learning may ever continue to possess my heart.
401 The Hero of Vaikuntha taught at Nabadwip ;
Even to this day there is testimony of this over all Nadia.
402 There is no beginning nor end of the pastime of Chaitanya :
The Vedas only speak of their 'Appearance'
and 'Disappearance.'
403 In this manner was consummated the pastime of learning.
And there was manifestation of the beginning of the congregational chant.
404 The students cried on all sides with tears choking their voice.
The Lord, moved to compassion, spoke these words,— 405 'For many a day ye have studied and listened to My teaching.
Now let us chant together the Kirtan of Krishna as its fulfilment.'

406 "What is samkirtan ?" asked the disciples.
The Lord, Son of Sri Sachi taught it to them Himself.

407 'Hari ! unto Hari obeisance ; Krishna unto Krishna obeisance ;
Gopal ! Govinda ! Rama ! Sree Madhusudana !'

408 The Lord showing them the way by clap of hand, Himself chanted the Kirtan with His students.

409 The Lord of Kirtan Himself chanted the Kirtan ;
All the disciples sang together encircling Him on all sides.

410 The Lord, engrossed in the sweet taste of His Own Name, Rolled in the dust under its overpowering influence.

411 The Lord fell down repeatedly and on all sides crying 'Say on'.
The earth was cracked by the repeated fall.

412 On catching the sound of the uproar the whole town of Nadia Came running to the residence of the Lord.

413 The homes of the Vaishnavas were not far off.
All of them came quickly on hearing the chant.

414 On beholding the Lord overpowered by the spiritual mood
All the devotees thought they had never experienced anything so exquisite.

415 All were highly satisfied in their minds.
'Now at last there is, indeed, Kirtan in the town of Nadia.

416 'Is there such rare devotion in the world ?
The purpose of the possession of the eye is fulfilled by the sight of such devotion.

417 'This Biswambhar is the limit of all arrogance.
We behold love that is scarce attainable by Narada and his peers.

418 'If such arrogance be capable of such devotion,
We donot understand the will of Krishna what He may not yet be.'

419 Lord Biswambhar manifested His external consciousness after a while,
But the Lord continued constantly to utter only the Name of Krishna.

420 He did not talk of any external objects even when He was conscious of them.
He cried, falling on the necks of all the Vaishnavas.

421 All of them by their joint endeavour succeeded in claming the Lord.
Then all the Vaishnavas departed with great delight.

422 Certain of His students in company of the Lord
Betook themselves to the life of renunciation by the pleasance of love.

423 The supreme Lord began to manifest Himself.
The grief of all the devotees was ended.

424 Sri Krishna-Chaitanya is the Life of Nityanandachand
At Whose twin feet sings Brindabandas.

Here ends the First Chapter entitled 'The description of the beginning of Sri 'Samkirtan' in the Middle Part of Sri Chaitanya Bhagabat.

Interview granted by H. E. the Governor of Madras to His Holiness Srimad Bhakti Hridaya Bon Maharaj

His Excellency Lieutenant Colonel the Right Honourable Sir George Frederick Stanley G. C. I. E., C. M. G., Governor of Madras was pleased to grant an interview on the 4th of February to His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Hridaya Bon Maharaj who has been deputed by His Divine Grace for preaching the religion of unalloyed devotion in the Madras Presidency. His Excellency was pleased to express his sympathetic appreciation of the work of the Gaudiya Mission and assured His Holiness that his Government was prepared to grant the same facilities to the Mission that were enjoyed by the Christian Missionaries. His Excellency was also pleased to intimate his willingness to perform the function of opening the Hall of congregational chant (Samkirtan) of the Madras Gaudiya Math when it would be constructed. Srijut T.P. Ramaswami Pillai has undertaken the pious service of building at his own expense the Kirtan Hall of the Madras Gaudiya Math. The Hall will be a commodious one measuring 90ft by 45ft.

Festival of the anniversary of advent of Sri Sri Nityananda

The mahotsab of the anniversary of the advent of Lord Nityananda was only celebrated during Feb. 1—4 at Sri Yoga Peetha, Sridham Mayapur and at the different Maths all over the country,

Sri Vyasa-Puja

The fifty seventh anniversary of the appearance of His Divine Grace was celebrated at Sri Chaitanya Math, Sridham Mayapur by the community of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas on Feb. 7 and 8. There was a large and representative gathering of pure devotees from all parts of the country. Addresses of homage were offered to His Divine Grace in various languages. The English addresses appear on a separate page. The address of the devotees of the Gaudiya Math entitled 'Supplication for mercy' and another striking address bearing the title of 'Acharyya-adhyayana-anusaran' were in Bengali. The address in the Assamese was named 'Bhaktyarghya'. There were also addresses in Oriya', Hindi and other languages. Press telegrams were received from the Madras devotees and Madras Gaudiya Math which were read at the gathering. Srijut Biraj Mohan De, proprietor of the Dacca Monomohan press, made an offering of the first part of the Speeches of His Divine grace printed at his own press at his own cost. His Divine Grace' kind response was made in Bengali—Its English translation appears on another page.

Visit of the Divisional Commissioner to Sridham Mayapur

Mr. Frederick Wynne Robertson I.C.S. Commissioner of the Presidency Division paid a visit to Sridham Mayapur on February 15. He was received by the members of the community and a distinguished gathering of local sympathisers. He was presented with an address of welcome on behalf of the Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha and expressed his high appreciation of the activities of the Mission.

On foot to Sridham Mayapur from Belobera (Pabna)

A party started from Belobera (Pabna) with chant of Kirtan on the 16th of February and journeyed on foot to Sridham Mayapur arriving at their destination on the 19th. The distance traversed by the party is 110 miles.

VOL. XXVI I | APRIL 1931, Chaitanya-Era 445 | NO. 11.

The Advent of the Supreme Lord

THE Supreme Lord (Mahaprabhu) made His appearance in this world on the 18th of February, in the year 1486 of the Christian Era at Sree Mayapur in the centre of the holy town of Sree-Nabadwip. The Supreme Lord was born with the rising of the full-moon in eclipse. His appearance in the womb of His mother, Sree Sachi Devi, has been indicated by the authorised narrators of His Lila as resembling the less perfect splendour of the rising of the terrestrial moon from the womb of the great Ocean. The Supreme Lord was born as the Son of Sree Jagannath Misra.

The Birth of the Supreme Lord in the Form of a mortal man may appear to the average human understanding as involving a sheer impossibility. The empiric historian is always close at hand to correct the theological aberrations of his erring fellow-mortals by the confident offer of his own departmental futilities. But no empiric historian can go beyond the evidence of his own admittedly erring senses and strictly circumscribed outlook and need not trouble to speculate on the Absolute even on his own terms. It is the evidence of the senses of contemporaries that is found wanting at the bar of the Absolute. The contemporaries of the Supreme Lord did not hasten to acknowledge the Divinity of the New-born Babe. But with the progress of the empiric Science we have grown less sceptical about the reality of transcendental appearance on the plane of three dimensions. It will be no violence to the scientific sense of the Twentieth Century to affirm that an event of the fourth magnitude may disclose itself to the actual view of observers located on this plane of three dimensions without being recognised as such by any of the spectators. The Birth of the Supreme Lord has not been stated by those who are endowed with the necessary powers of superior vision as an event of three dimensions although appearing on the lower plane. What all of us, including the empiric historian himself, have, therefore, to do in the matter, is to allow the transcendental narrative to be told in its own way, offering to it our co-operating attention unhampered by any predilection for our cherished notions of the plane of three dimensions. It is in this mood that the reader is invited to listen to the following dissertation on the transcendental Birth of the Supreme Lord. We are, on our part, under the obligation to place nothing before our readers that does not belong to the higher plane. We may further state from our own actual experience that the transcendental, as transcendental, necessarily possesses the power of self-communication of Himself even through receiving instruments that may appear to us to belong to the third dimension.

Godhead is supposed to have no birth since He is regarded as existing eternally. But this conclusion, however plausible it may appear to our poor understanding, requires to be given up in favour of one that is higher. Godhead is both without a beginning and has an eternal beginning. Godhead without a beginning is only the negative aspect which alone is available to an observer from the plane of three dimensions and amounts to nothing more nor less than an unqualified confession of our failure to understand the real nature of the Absolute with the resources at our command. Beyond the range of this deluding negative thought is located the realm of the positive Absolute to which the transcendental Birth of the Supreme Lord belongs. Objections similar to the above need not, therefore, prejudice us in advance against the probability of the truth of a transcendental narrative.

We now come to the more opposite issue—viz., as to why the Supreme Lord chose to appear in this world under the specific conditions detailed above. Is the New-born Babe, Nimai Who was by the evidence of many sensible persons of His time nothing more extraordinary than any other mortal child, to be regarded as Divine simply on the self assumed authority of a number of persons who may choose to declare his Divinity from their own unverifiable, intuitive knowledge? No, that is not exactly the claim of the narrators of His transcendental activities. They claim that the whole career of Nimai, if considered with due attention, will establish His Divinity by making the mind of the person so attending capable of receiving the impression of the real Truth of Whom he can have otherwise no idea whatever.

The Birth of the Supreme Lord is an event that is located on a plane that is transcendentally higher than our highest. Our ultima thule is the negation of limited occurrences. Does it help us in the least to be told that Godhead is not born at all? This would also be inaccurate even by the test of our own logic. How, indeed, can we presume to set any limit to the Unlimited? If we say Godhead can be limited we of course contradict ourselves. But how can we also escape from the fact of our incapacity to make any statement regarding Godhead even by the adoption of the negative trick?

Would it not be infinitely more logical to desire to know something about the birth of the Supreme Lord as it must be a possible and, therefore, certain event with the Lord. This should be easily recognisable as the properly Theistic attitude. The reward of adopting such attitude towards the real Truth will be to attain to Him. There can be logically speaking no other method of finding the Truth. The risk of failure is no greater than in the methods of empiric search; but there is the chance of knowing the Truth Who is admittedly unattainable to the empiric quest.

The reason of the Appearance of the Lord has been communicated to us by Sri Rupa Goswami who was authorised by the Lord Himself to write about these occurrences for enlightening all succeeding generations. Sri Rupa says in effect that there were primary and secondary purposes for the Appearance of the Supreme Lord. The primary purpose was to realise His own sweetness as Lover as He appears to His eternal Counterwhole Sri Radhika. It was for this primary purpose that the Supreme Lord put on the hue and disposition of Sri Radhika and and appeared in this world as His premier devotee.

There was a secondary purpose. The Supreme Lord willed to do what had never been done before by any of His secondary Appearances. He willed to give away to all persons without reservation the most intimate and unconventional, the highest form of His own loving service. Sri Rupa says that no one had previously any idea of such service. It is the highest of all revelations that could be given away only by the Supreme Lord Himself Personating as His own Best-beloved. The Supreme Lord is the only and eternal Teacher of His own service. This putting on of the Personality of His Best-beloved is not a casual whim but is His own proper Personality. The Supreme Lord as Teacher is the Source of all service of Himself. The Supreme Teacher in His own proper Person came into this world for teaching the highest and only proper form of service of Himself by His own example, thereby perfecting all previous revelations.

Arrived at this point the next question would naturally be 'Should we regard the birth of the Lord as an act of service also ?' There is a categorical difference between the birth of a mortal and the appearance of a servant of the Supreme Lord in this world. The latter comes here by the Will of the Supreme Lord as the agent chosen to carry out the Divine Purpose. The ordinary mortal is born in the flesh as the result of his previous activities on this mundane plane, in accordance with the Divine Dispensation regulating the affairs of this world. The mortal is thereby rendered subject to all the limitations of this temporal existence. The principles of cause and effect, of reward and punishment, are allowed by the Will of the Supreme Lord to appear to have power over all persons so born.

The appearance of the devotee of the Lord is not brought about in the above manner. He is only apparently under the power of the material potency. The laws of this physico-mental existence have no power over the agent of the Supreme Lord. His birth is not, therefore, of the nature of punishment nor of reward for activities previously performed in this world. It is absolutely causeless, even as the operation of the Will of the Supreme Lord is causeless. There is, however, the causeless Divine Purpose behind such appearance. It is this which raises it to the plane of spiritual service.

Our real difficulty is presented by the fact that we are altogether in the dark as regards the nature of the real existence We are, therefore, unavoidably prone to suppose that the conditions of the plane of three dimensions, apply in some way or other to existence on the plane of four dimensions. It is in some such way, we choose to fancy, that the phenomenal is made to be included in the transcendental. It is no doubt true that the phenomenal is incorporated in the transcendental. But what passes our understanding is the fact that the nature of this incorporation is also inconceivable to our present faculties.

The empiric critic does not make due allowance for this.

The Birth of the Lord is not for the purpose of serving sinful humanity, but for its deliverance. The devotee of the Lord also comes into this world for the same purpose. The nature of the service of the Supreme Lord is inconceivable to our limited understanding. The birth of the devotee is not merely for the service of the Lord, but is also itself such service. Whenever an event is consciously connected with the Source of everything it acquires thereby the nature of spiritual service, or in other words, ministers to the reciprocal pleasure of the Supreme Lord. This is the definition of service. The Lord does not require our service in order to make up any deficiency of His. Nor does the poor and irrational theory of material utility explain any event even superficially. The Lord is served by every event. We require to be lifted to the higher plane to be able to really understand this apparently self-evident truth.

The summum bonnum does not consist in getting away from anything but in being able to live the truly rational life in which everything is preserved in a system of perfect relationships. The Birth of the Un-born is an Event of the highest enlightening significance. It is never possible to understand it separately in the empiric way. The present article is intended to meet empiric objections against the possibility of such event. The substantive knowledge of the Event has to be gained by following the Scriptural process of listening to the narrative of the Divine Birth from the lips of the spiritual teacher by the method of unreserved, active submission.

Harmony.

FULL of discordance is this chaotic earth.
There is no harmony
In the symphony
Of the music that has in this world its birth.
We in our delu-ion sing and work and pray.
In furtherance of the wish,
Full of anguish,
That deliberately seeks to perpetuate the disharmonious sway.

The fettered soul is ever in love with utter discordance ;
He is enamoured
Of the record
Of all the misdeeds wrought by his concurrence.

The perverse soul opposes all counsel of true repentance.
He makes a show
Of seeking to know,
Only to snub all the more effectively his neighbour and his race.

But for all this the angel of the Lord does often descend.
From the sphere Divine,
To this discordant scene,
To reclaim the soul that is so apt to offend.

And the cosmic discord is temporarily lulled by his voice ;
The process of Nature
Ceases to ensnare ,
And the perverse soul is once more given a choice.

All the world is made to listen as the angel delivers
The message of love
To make us serve
The Lord like himself in all our earthly endeavours.

The angel is the saviour who lives, moves and suffers
With men as man,
To prove how we can
Serve best the Lord in conditions that are most adverse.

Let us then, for the good of our souls, forego all malice
The destiny of man
Hangs by the plan
Divinely ordained to bring about the real peace.

Harmony destroys nothing but preserves and fulfils all,
By the simple process
Of chastening grace,
It finds the healing use for the most venomous gall.

So let us exercise all patience through the best of grace ;
To change the heart of evil
Without necessity to kill,
By the gracious help from Above that alone can really bless.

Krishna has gone away from the place of the Rasa-dance. The Gopis, who are un-fettered souls, are seeking for Krishna by approaching every object. Was the external sense-perception of the Gopis then very strong ? Was their sensuous knowledge then very powerful ? There comes an occasion to hear about all these matters from the lotus feet of our Sri Guru. Nanda-Govinda, Yasoda-Govinda, Sridama-Govinda, Chitraka-Patraka-Govinda, Bansi-Govinda, Go-Govinda, Kadamba-Govinda, etc., are the various Pastimes of the pure cognitive principle. They are the Pastimes of Sri Radha-Govinda replete with all rasas. It is possible to be able to observe the movements of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru in the heart. If one obtains the blessed sight of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru in his heart it is only then that the true nature of these words manifests itself. It is Sri Guru Who enlightens us in every matter to enable us to worship Godhead. There is no other way of obtaining the service of the Absolute Integer except by the method of the worship of Sri Guru.

We have had occasion to-day also to hear many things. We have heard words expressive of constancy. Although many things have been said in the English language * there was a good deal in them that deserved to be heard by us. May we show such constancy to the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. The reflected form of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru in different receptacles constantly reveal many new matters for our instruction. I am a little jeeva, full of arrogance. Why then am I enabled to hear all these topics ? The lotus-feet of Sri Guru have afforded me this opportunity of hearing all those words expressive of constancy. In this manner he is telling me every moment, 'O you little soul, do you show such constancy to the lotus-feet of Sri Guru.' I think in my mind as I observe the disposition to serve Godhead of the reflected forms of the lotus-feet of my Sri Guru in different receptacles, that I may be born crores of times in order to practise the service of Hari in their company, that my aversion to the service of Godhead that has accumulated during crores of births may be dispelled by their companionship.

I once went to Mangalgiri in the southern part of the country for installation of the shrine of the Foot-Prints of Mahaprabhu. At that time certain persons from among ourselves put this question while we were still at Mangalgiri. 'When we first came to Math we felt great hope and enthusiasm by noticing the character and love of the service of Godhead of our friends. Now-a-days our out-look is being gradually stunted. We have begun to think in different ways. Several Brahmacharins have turned house-holders by accepting the method of Samabartan.' In answer to this I said, 'I am unable to say that it becomes necessary to give up the service of Hari if one becomes a house-holder. On my part I see all about us many wonderful Vaishnavas. I find that their Vaishnavism, devotion to Hari, has grown a good deal more. What a great pasanda I was! How greatly my impiety has diminished by associating with them! I find that, although I am averse to Godhead, they are all serving Hari. I have been enabled to know by the mercy of the lotus-feet of Sri Raghu Nath Bhatta Goswami Prabhu that he never lent his ears to listen to the tidings of condemnable actions of the Vaishnavas and that it sufficed for him to know only this much that all serve Krishna.'

I find that every one is serving Hari by making progress on the path of devotion. The House-hold of Godhead has prospered in every way. Only no benefit has accrued to me. All have been undoubtedly benefited. You have become agitated by small insufficiencies. Your anxiety for serving Godhead is very great. It is for this reason that you want that they should serve Hari in still greater measure. You are unable to feel satisfied even when you and them in the very act of serving Hari. You want that they may serve the Lord of your life with a billion-fold greater devotion. But my heart is a little one, my vessel is small. It is for this reason that I am unable to contain their great service of Hari in my small vessel. Their endeavour for the service of Hari is over-flowing my little cup. I feel it impossible any longer to keep squeezed within the limits of my small vessel the vastness of their service of Hari. They are fast passing away setting an example of the most wonderfully ideal lives of service. I alone am unable to serve Hari. I alone am busy to detect the defects of others. I ought to have progressed on the path of service. But I have chosen to be busy in searching for the defects of Vaishnavas instead.

Who are those that try to find the draw-backs of the Vaishnavas? They are the community of empiricists whose only resource consists of the eye, ear, nose, etc. deluded by external objects, all those who are averse to the service of Hari. When anyone tells me that a particular person has given up chanting the Name of Hari I think in my mind that the service of Hari of such a person must have certainly increased to an extraordinary extent, that his heart must have been very much improved and that it is for this reason he has been enabled to be engaged in other work by giving up the service of Hari which is the only path of well-being. He has grown immensely wealthy. He has been satisfied and, therefore, does not want to undergo the trouble of earning more riches.

Sri Bhagaban has said in the Gita that no harm can ever befall the devotees of Godhead, that they can never die,—'My devotee is not destroyed.' 'Even if one whose habits of life are highly condemnable serve Me with a singleness of purpose, he should certainly be considered as righteous. His conduct is surely altogether perfect. He becomes virtuous in no time and quickly attains the eternal peace of the soul. Son of Kunti, do thou swear that My devotee never comes to grief.'

Can those who serve with a singleness of heart ever fall away from devotion? They have certainly gained the state of well-being. My eye-sight is bad. It is for this reason that I am unable to obtain my own good. 'Never either praise or condemn the character and activity of other persons seeing that the whole world is one by its proper nature, by mutual union of Prakriti and Purusha, the Support and the Object of worship.'

If I turn out an empiricist I am deprived of the service of the transcendental, the service of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. It is when evil overtakes myself, and by reason of being in such evil plight, that I am put in mind of the misfortunes of other persons. It is because I am myself honey-combed by a thousand defects that I am attracted by the task of seeking for the defects of other persons. If I am in a position to secure my own good I have no longer leisure for finding the faults, the misfortunes of other people. 'If any person, after being initiated in the lotus-feet of the Sad-Guru, chant the Name of Krishna it is our duty to entertain for him high esteem in our hearts. If such a person being engaged in the service of Hari serve the holy Name on the spiritual plane it is our duty in every way to honour him by means of obeisance and other marks of submission. The best of devotees, the maha-Bhagabata, is possessed of exclusive reliance on Krishna. Being devoid of any other consciousness excepting that of Krishna the heart of such a person is free from any discordant mood leading to slander or malice against any person. The maha-Bhagabata is thoroughly versed in the process of intimate spiritual service of Godhead. One who has made considerable progress on the path of spiritual service is alone in a position to recognise that the maha-Bhagabata is the best of friends with whom it is possible to cultivate the closest relationship as he never feels disturbed by the claims of intimate relationship of the nature that should subsist between pure souls. If we are fortunate enough to realise the supreme excellence of the maha-Bhagabata we should be able to recognise that it is our duty to express our loving regard for such a person by the methods of obedience, sincere questioning regarding the Truth and by rendering loyal service.

This life has a short duration. Last year we met at this place for the purpose of worshipping the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. Those to whom Godhead has been merciful, have departed from here. While we continue to be actively engaged in this realm of Devi in the enjoyment of the objects of this world for the purpose of seeking out the defects of other people and becoming thereby an object-lesson of absence of the quality of humility greater than that of the blade of grass.

The lotus-feet of Sri Guru abstains from seeing the defects of other people. Yet there is no other function of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru than to constantly point out my hundreds of thousands of defects and to caution me constantly against any evil that is likely to befall me. May we not be deprived of the ideal of the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. If I live again for another year from to-day I shall serve Sri Guru at every moment. I will give up criticising other people. I am given to belittling other people. 'I am very clever. I am very learned, very intelligent. I am a great speaker. That person is illiterate, foolish, cannot properly talk about anything.' If we try to diminish the practice of discussing in this manner the defects of other people, and discourse about Hari, instead, I think it would do us good. Nevertheless we must never show any regard for aversion to Godhead.

The lotus-feet of Sri Guru is the predominated moity of the Son of the Chief of Braja Who is indivisible knowledge. Krishnachandra Himself as the lotus Feet of Sri Guru is engaged in beholding Himself as the Object of contemplation by seeking His Own Support. I am also under the protection of Sri Krishna being incorporated with the lotus-feet of Sri Guru. 'I have recently passed a brief spell of time on the wings of hope, which has, indeed, been full of the Ocean of nectar. If you do not vouchsafe your mercy to me I certainly have nothing to do by living. O Possessor of the Form most pleasing to Krishna what are life, Braja or even the Slayer of Baka Himself to me if I am devoid of your mercy?

I have been asked sometimes by different persons why we do not give away the realised method of service to all persons. As for myself I cannot understand how the condition of self-realised souls and that of novices may be supposed to be identical. It passes our judgment to understand how the service and realisation of souls free from all defects can be practised during the period of novitiate which is full of such defects. If any person happens to belong to the order of self-realised souls he may kindly intimate to me the fact. I can then know about the specific nature of his realised self.

Sri Gurudeva is the daughter of Brishabhanu in the madhura rasa (spiritual quality of sweetness of Divine amour). There are different ways in which different persons, whose faculty of spiritual consciousness has been aroused, judge about their own requirements. Every enlightened person is privileged to have a sight of Sri Gurudeva in accordance with his particular mode of judgment. Sri Gurudeva is that real Entity Who thus reveals himself to the view of enlightened souls in a variety of ways. Realised by the method of the rasa of parental affection Sri Gurudeva reveals himself as Nanda-Yasoda. In the rasa of friendly affection he is Sridama-Sudama. In the rasa of the devotion of servants to the master the lotus-feet of Sri Guru is Chitraka-Patraka. The consideration of all these Ashrayas of the Bishaya rises in the heart as one progresses in the service of Sri Guru. These subjects do not manifest themselves in the heart by any artificial process. They are aroused spontaneously in the consciousness of fortunate souls on the appearance of the disposition for spiritual service of the Divinity. We have no other function except the service of Sri Guru. By means of the adulterated consciousness of the material world it is not possible to discuss about the eternal Pastimes of Godhead that are inaccessible to Shesha, Siva, Brahma, and their peers.

I am making my prostrated obeisances at your feet, at the feet of the order of my Gurus.

Morality.

THE appearance of the ideas of right and wrong, good and bad, has been supposed to be the decisive mark of, what is called in the English language, the civilized condition of human beings. This test is supposed to be equally applicable to individuals as well as communities.

Man is supposed to be alone endowed with the possession of the moral faculty. Its possession particularly distinguishes mankind from other animals and all lifeless objects. Moral activity is declared to be not merely purposive activity. The purpose must also be righteous. It is quite possible for a person to have a bad purpose. Badness is considered to be distinguishable from ignorance. It is possible for an ignorant person to be a good man.

But it is not so easy to say clearly what makes any act either good or bad. Adultery may be taken as an example. Is it bad or good? It is generally supposed to be immoral. But has any perfectly satisfactory reason been given by any moral philosopher why it should be considered as a bad thing? True, the practice of adultery involves certain consequences both to the individual practising it and to others. But these consequences are not necessarily peculiar to unmarried sexual intercourse or to sexual intercourse in contravention of the rules of mrrriage. The reasons, if there be any against adultery, would, most of them, if not all, apply also to sexual intercourse itself. It would, therefore, be difficult logically to regard the sentiment against adultery as anything more than the result of a longstanding, generally observed, social convention. The good points of the practice of chastity may be admitted without extreme or illogical advocacy of a physical relationship. The married state enjoined by the scriptures is not made to rest on the merely mundane basis.

All the so-called virtues could be proved in a similar way to be, at least in a very great measure, the offspring of habit. It is considered to be a good act to relieve physical suffering. It certainly is welcomed by the person who may be the recipient of the benefit of it. But how do we know that pleasure is morally better than pain? If a drunkard suffers from the troubles of a bad liver how can we say that he does not deserve such suffering, or that such suffering may not do him real and legs by giving up its alliance with the principle of wolrdly utility. In that case it may claim to be absolute by its own right. If it tries to do so the real difficulty will be in defining it, the existing conventional code being found ineffectual in practice. It will be neither safe nor practicable to overlook this material difficulty of the existing code. If an attempt be made to draw up a new code free from the worst defects of the present one such an attempt may have to advocate the legalising of certain forms of conduct that would go against the fundamental principles of the existing code. The democratic or legislative method is, therefore likely to be unfavourable to the cause of morality as it has been ordinarily understood up till now.

The nearest equivalent of the term 'a-sat' (অসৎ) is non-permanent existence. It is possible to classify entities into really existent or 'sat' and not really existent or a-sat. The soul belongs to the category of real existence or 'sat.' The mind and physical body are not real existence. In this world the deluded soul seeks all kinds of relationship with the body and not mind. But the soul can have no real relationship with either. This misguided affinity of the deluded soul towards non.substantive existence, is the cause of all suffering and evil that afflict everyone in this world. If it be our object to lessen physical and mental suffering it will be necessary to find a method for removing the delusion which is the cause of such suffering.

Pleasure and pain are non absolute i. e. relative existence (a-sat.) Neither of them can really satisfy the soul. The soul is everlasting. Neither pleasure nor pain can be everlasting. On the contrary they are the co-ordinate faces of the deluded experience. The same is true of all similar other couples which are the offspring of the activities of the material mind. Right and wrong, good and bad are not substantially different from one another. But all of them are substantially and eternally different from the absolute existence or the sat.

The moral codes that have been invented by the erring mind can only perpetuate the evil which it does not understand and cannot remove. But the relative existence, a-sat, also really exists. It is, therefore, a source of real trouble to all of us. The deluded soul may pretend not to be able to recognise this. He may also be disinclined to recognise that his abnormal alliance with the mind and body is the real and only cause of all his miseries.

But even the conventional moralists are never tired of declaring from the house top that they are also believers in the absolute purity, at any rate potentially, of the soul. If this is really lasting good, in the sense of making him willing to drink less in future?

There is even more serious objection to admitting any real value of so-called morality, than the above. Morality may be after all only a convenient device for exploiting the ignorant and the weak by the intelligent and the strong for the furtherance of the immoral interests of the latter. For example it is almost generallyadmitted as the moral duty of every civilized country to make suitable provision for the education, health and feeding of the poor. In capitalistic countries this duty is so managed that the interests of the rich are thereby served at the expense of those of the poor.

The moral principle as conceived by the empiricists must always point to some form of mundane utility. It is the nature of such utility to be limited, deteo.. .s, and to a certain extent positively harmful. The practice of such morality can never give all-round satisfaction even to a limited number of persons though only for a short time. For this reason it is quite possible for a number of persons to quarrel with one another by invoking the particular moral principle in defence of his conduct that is best calculated to serve his special purpose. So that ultimately professions of morality become utterly powerless and come to be discredited as of any help for the promotion of real well-being.

This is the reason why at the present moment almost all over the world there is observable almost a definitely general movement against the tenets of the fashionable moral code. The apologists find it impossible to secure the re-acceptance of a worn-out system that has been tried and found wanting. The world is drifting into a non-moral position which is bound to be destructive of regulated social life whose consequences it is not pleasant to contemplate.

If everybody does in society what he likes will it be possible to exercise sufficient check upon the rascals and fools? The non-moral condition will quickly degenerate to all intents and purposes into the professedly immoral. This may be a triumph for the reason but at the expense of everything that makes human life at all interesting. But the ideas of right and wrong cannot be got rid of by simply ignoring them. They are bound to have their revenge if they are attempted to be hustled out so unceremoniously. Animalism is lower than moralism, than even empiric moralism with all its patent defects. If reason cannot discover a morality that is higher than that of the empiric brand it will not certainly be justified to commit suicide by falling back into animalism.

There is a third alternative. Morality may be supplied with real admitted they should be able to recognise the distinction between the relative and absolute existence sat and a-sat, and also to recognise this distinction as alone affording the only basis for a true science of conduct that is proper for the soul. Instead of running after socalled bad and good, right and wrong, it is necessary to try to understand the real nature of absolute existence, the sat, in the first place.

The distinction between sat and a-sat is not merely subjective. One cannot become sat by simply wishing to be sat. The conditioned soul cannot get rid of his fetters of relative cognition by his own efforts. Mental speculation is bound to lead its victim into a blind lane. No amount of mental cogitation can produce real enlightenment or afford real relief from our blinding limitations. It will not do to call any condition good if it is to be found to be of no use to the soul. All impermanent relief is thus proved to be really illusory and, therefore, harmful in one way or another, in as much as it tends to perpetuate the delusion. This is the radical defect of so-called conventional morality. This defect cannot be removed by persisting in the old groove. It is necessary to find out a method of getting out of the vicious groove if any permanent and real relief is to be expected.

The quest of the Absolute thus becomes necessary also for the Utilitarian by the pressure of perpetual disappointment. As neither present, past nor prospective experience offer any escape from the tragedy of the vicious circle the irrational advice of the empiric ethical philosopher has not proved wholly acceptable to the present generation which is aggressively pragmatic and realistic.

The distinction between good and bad is real although it is unattainable by the light of the empiric philosopher. It is necessary for us to know what it is. Our Scriptures tell us that the substantive entity, by whose unwholesome shadow we wrongly suppose ourselves destined to be perpetually deluded, is to be found only on the substantive or absolute plane. This, as will appear from the above, is fully in keeping with the requirements of the rational instinct. That which is absolute is natural, i. e. necessarily and fully good, for the soul. What we are required to find is our own selves. The soul is not in his natural condition at present. The soul is naturally good as he is free from all limitations. This perfect condition is also realisable, by the admitted and familiar process of honest apprenticeship, on his own terms, with a person who really knows. The Scriptures help us to find such a person. This help comes at first from within. But this light cannot grow beyond a certain point if it chooses to confine itself to this selfish, individualistic source. It has to expend into a congregational function by being lifted to the plane of the service of the One Person by many individual persons in concert. In this spiritual community every individual member is related to all the rest as disciple to teacher, to use a very unsatisfactory phrase to denote the mutual relationship subsisting between all perfectly pure souls.

New Earth—New Heaven

BY

Dr. H. W. B. MORENO

One nation yet the world shall see,
The union of humanity
One fatherland of real worth,
And it shall stretch o'er all the earth
One law, all other laws above,
The universal law of love ;
One great religion all to span,
The noble brotherhood of man ;
These unto mortals shall be given
And then shall come new earth, new heaven.

A Talk with a Moulvi

I.—You cannot say that truth revealed in the Bible is not higher than what is revealed in the Quran; still again, what revealed in the Bhagabat is not also the highest.

M.—But Hazrat Muhammad was the last and greatest Nabi.

I.—He might be the last, yet he might not be the greatest. Again he might be the greatest, yet might not teach the greatest. What parts will a professor show before a class of pupils not acquainted with the alphabets? The chronological order in the advent of the prophets does not make any difference in the quality of their teachings. The latter differ with the different capacities of the taught.

History shows that when the Hindu Aryans were reciting Rik-Veda hymns, the rest of humanity was being rocked in the spiritual cradle. The historians put this date at 4000 B. C. But the people, versed in astrology take the date as far back as 10000 B. C. Evidently these two classes of human beings must at any time require different treatments for their spiritual growths. An adult and an infant cannot be made to sit at the same dish. Appearing as late as in the Seventh Century A. D. Muhammad had to deal with a class of people at a certain stage of spiritual evolution. They were idolators, deifying matter worshipping 'Lat', 'monat' and 'gora' their original deities, till the number of their gods grew to be three hundred and sixty. They observed national mourning, if by accident any limb of any of these gods were broken. They understood brute force more than any thing else. They were divided into different tribes and these tribes were always fighting with one another. When Muhammad began to preach they firmly stood for their traditions and began to conspire to put an end to his life. Muhammad averted the danger by taking to the sword. It was a necessity. What Christ did by love and suffering Muhammad did by love and violence. By the sword he gave them peace and by the sword his followers maintained it. Even now the custom prevails in the Muhammadan society of punishing a social crime by the method of public flogging.

It is supposed by many that the sword aggravates the peace-breaking tendencies. Whoever takes up the sword is supposed to break the peace. Again the sword, while it punishes the crime, leaves untouched the cause. Suffering love may also remove the cause and excite love in return. The victory of the soul-force over the physical force is thus consummated. Love manifests itself in a soul functioning in his full spiritual consciousness. All, in their relation to God, become the objects of love of such a soul. Christ cannot be held to have succeeded among the Israelites, Muhammad was more fortunate among a neighbouring people, the Arabs. While the latter effected his object by making his enemies bleed under his stroke, the former laid down his life on the cross with no less powerful admonition,—"Father forgive them for they know not what they are doing." Christ died, and with him died all that loved him. They died in the body to live in the spirit. "For", says St. Paul,"the love of Christ constraineth us ; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead : And that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again." The followers of Muhammad wanted to live properly in the body also. "Fight," says Muhammad, "in the way of Allah with those who fight with you. ..... And kill them wherever you find them and drive them out from whence they drove you out." (Ch. II—190-191). Thus while Muhammad advised His followers, 'Resist evil : Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy." Christ advised His followers without in any way contradicting Muhammad, 'Resist not evil : love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you. That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven."

M.—Do you mean to say that Hazrat Muhammad mistook physical facts for spiritual ones ?

I.—I don't say that. He could not make any such mistake. He did not resort to the sword as a method of preaching His faith. It was a necessity for Him to fight with those who came with swords to turn out and kill the Muslims. He fought neither for conversion, nor for booty, but "to end persecution and establish religious freedom." It was a necessity from another consideration. He had to deal with people in a very different way from that in which Christ dealt with them. Christ's gospel of love in that form would not at all have a chance with these people who understood nothing better than physical force, and took material prosperity to be the emblem of the spiritual. Though for smallness of number the followers of Muhammad at first hesitated to risk their life in a battle with a large well-armed body of the enemies, Muhammad exhorted them to do so as ordained by Allah. He says, "Fighting is enjoined on you, and it is an object of dislike to you ; and it may be that you dislike a thing while it is good for you, and it may be that you love a thing while it is evil for you, and Allah knows, while you do not know"—(Ch. II, 216)

The sword in the hand of Muhammad was like the magical rod of Moses. He wrought miracles in the battles. With 313 ill-equipped and inexperienced men, he routed a large well-trained and well-equipped army of Quaraish of Mecca at Badr. People began to flock to his camp. It was more the love for fighting and collecting booty than his faith that attracted those people in such large numbers. Islam began to manifest more as a power than as a faith. Soon after Muhammad had passed away his followers began to strike terror into the hearts of all by their cry, "Allah ho Akbar" which losing all its spiritual significance became merely a war cry. The vast territory extending from Spain in the west to Burma in the east felt the weight of their arms. Many forceful conversions were made and many abominable atrocities were committed during all this time. It was all against the Quran and the pious wish of the prophet. For the Quran says, "Fight in the way of Allah with those who fight with you, and do not exceed the limits ; surely Allah does not love those who exceed the limits. And kill them wherever you find them, and drive them out from whence they drove you. But if they desist you must also desist. And fight with them until there is no persecution ; but if they desist then there should be no hostility except against the oppressors" (Ch. 11, 190-193).

Against all these clear injunctions of the Quran they began to fight aggressively with all the neighbouring nations. Instead of fighting in the way of Allah they began to fight in their own way. They fought these wars as jehad bringing untold sufferings upon millions, either defenceless or ill-defended, but certainly not aggressive. Muhammad fought "to end persecution and to establish religious freedom." But his followers began to fight to enforce religious persecution and to establish religious intolerance.

Every where they were indeed, dreaded but not loved ; though they themselves held in esteem all these their military achievements as the emblem of spiritual progress leading them to Behast. In fact the gospel of love that Muhammad wanted to preach, was entirely lost upon many of his followers. It is now very difficult to say whether by Islam as it was practised by most of the kings and conquerors we would understand 'making of peace' or 'breaking of peace.'

M. Don't mind the bad followers. By the religion of that section of his followers you cannot ascertain the religion of the prophet. With regard to the actual creeds of the different prophets I think we cannot say any thing positively one way or the other.

I. It is true a tree is said to be known by its fruits. You cannot deny that the whole nation showed this mentality. But they could not leave the sword which Muhammad, compelled under certain circumstances, advised them to use. When any of the muslim warriors committed an act of atrocity the whole nation acclaimed it. I shall be glad, if you admit that Muhammad's followers went astray as soon as Muhammad had passed away. They aggressively fought with the Hindus and the Christians, demolishing their temples and churches and building mosques in their stead. Are you prepared to characterise all these activities as un-islamic ?

I can give you from our own Scriptures an instance how the prophets teach different things at different times. Lord Buddha has been described as a plenary manifestation of Vishu in our Scriptures. He is said to have preached a religion without having any reference to the Vedas. This is the view of Buddha's own followers in the historical period. And why ?

The Hindus at the time misunderstood the teachings of the Vedas and were bathing their altars with blood of animals, nay of human beings. No religion can claim a high altitude that does not provide for the safety of the lives of the lower order. Slaughter of animals for food as well as for sacrifice is abominable. Whole India turned Buddhist. There was no alter to receive the blood of the animals, and no house to cook fish or meat. The object for which He came was achieved and He passed away. The people, however, could not be left for a long time without Godhead to love. Sankaracharyya who is no other than Siva, then appeared on the scene by the command of Vishnu. He showed the way how to investigate in to the truth with the help of the Scriptures. People began to worship the Vedas again. India then got rid of Buddhism.

Now should we take to Buddhism again ? Certainly not; for in that case we would be attempting to go back. Our Scriptures also prohibit it.

In the same way a follower of Islam who should follow Muhammad and respect the Quran, must not aggresively fight nor encourage others to fight with anyone under the pretext of a 'jehad'. If anyone does so, he is but a lip-deep loyalty to the teachings of the Quran.

At the same time it is no harm if any one thinks a particular form of revealed worship, to be the best, and sticks to it. But he surely commits an unpardonable offence when he demands a general acceptance of his faith. It is wrong because, as I have already told you, people differ in spiritual gradation.

The apparently different teachings of the different prophets are really not different as regards their fundamental principles. After we have received a sufficient measure of spiritual culture we should see all these different religions reconciled. We should then consider it practicable for a Hindu, a Christian and a Muhammadan shaking hands with one another.

Though prophets appear at different times in different places, yet one does not come to annul the teachings of another. Nay one practically preaches the doctrine of those that went before him and will come after him. Thus in Ampara in sura baiena we get two ayats ...2. Rasulum sinallahe italu suhufan motaha-haratan fiha kutubun, kaiimaha. 3. Ama takar chakal Lajina ootul kitaba illa mimbade ma ja-at homol bai-illaha—which mean, "He who is sent by God-head recites all the holy documents where there are firm truths."

In Chap. 2 and verse no 136 it has been definitely laid down that Islamic baptism requires a belief in all the prophets of the world. We here below state the verse in the translation of Moulvi Muhammad Ali, M. A. LL. B. "Say : we believe in Allah and (in) that which has been revealed to us, and (in) that which was revealed to 'Abraham and Issmael and Isaac and Jacob and the tribes, and (in) that which was given to Moses and Jesus, and (in) that which was given to the prophets from their Lord, we do not make any distinctien between any of them, and to him do we submit". By "Prophets from their Lord" he wants us to understand "prophets of the world, prophets of all nations and all ages."

Evidently you do not sufficiently respect your prophet, if you dishonour others. You dishonour the Quran if you dishonour the Bible or the Bhagabat. All are His prophets and all are His books.

The imperfection which you see in Christianity is, in fact, no imperfection. In Christ's fatherhood-conception of Godhead we should not look for flesh-and-blood relation. Such relation does not obtain in that place of spiritual consciousness in which Christ lives. Things of the spiritual plane must not be confounded with those of the physical one though they are expressed in human language. In the former spirit responds to spirit but in the latter intercourse is possible only through the medium of matter. Matter is never sanctified into spirit nor does spirit degrade into matter. Spirit descends in the matter. but he should never be designated after the flesh. It is a sin to know a prophet after the flesh. When the people made mention of Christ as the son of David, Christ told them, 'How then doth David in spirit call him Lord saying, "The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy foot-stool. If David then call him Lord, how is he his son ?"

Any theistic philosophy must seek out relation between soul and soul, and between soul and Godhead. The former is automatically settled when the latter is settled. "Love your brothers because you are the sons of the same father." Christ not only designates himself as the son of God but designates all as such. If you love God as Father, you must love all as your brothers. If you love Him as the creator, you must love all that are created by Him. If you love Him as the Lord, you must love all as His servants. Certainly the love shown into Him as father is much intenser than all the rest.

The Festival of Circumambulation

(of Sridham Nabadwip)

THIS Festival has been instituted by the Acharya of the Gaudiya community as a practice of the function of un-alloyed devotion testified to by all the Scriptures as being the exclusive, eternal function of the individual soul in his natural condition of free loving service of the Supreme Lord. The function was not known in this world till the most auspicious Appearance of Sree Krishna Chaitanya Who was causelessly pleased to confer the only proper service of Himself by the only method, viz. His own Example, by His Appearance in this world.

There have been secondary appearances of the Lord for coferring a measure of His service. The perfect, and, therefore, the only unalloyed form of service, it was beyond the power of any agent to confer.

Sri Nabadwip Dham is the plane on which this service means the simultaneous appearance also of the corresponding plane of service. The service of Sridham Nabadwip is part and parcel of the practice of the proper function of the soul.

The service of Godhead is not something mental or physical. It is supposed to be a mental process by those who confound the soul with the mind. But as a matter of fact a mental activity is also activity on the physical plane in a refined form. Both the gross and subtle forms of material and mental activity are subject to identical limitations. What has to be denied of the one form is thereby denied also of the other.

The service to Godhead is rendered on the only real plane viz, that on which the Lord Himself abides in all His Divine Plenitude. That plane is the Abode of the Supreme Lord as Teacher and of His disciples. In co-operation they practise there the eternal function of loving devotion to Godhead, as the sole Recipient of all service. It is the Supreme Lord Himself Who can and does teach His own service which is, however, rendered to Himself as Master and not as Servant.

Godhead as Master or Recipient of service is Sri Krishna. Godhead as Teacher or performer of His own service is Sri Krishna Chaitanya. These Names are not concoctions of the clever brain of man. There are names, as those of the objects of this world that lie exposed to our senses, that are made by man to signify the entities of this phenomenal world. The Names Sri Krishna and Sri Krishna Chaitanya are identical with Godhead. There is only one Godhead. He has got two Names. He has one Name as Master, another Name as Servant. The Servant is however, in this case identical with the Master. Those who make a difference between the service of the Servant and that of the Master on the plane of the Absolute know nothing of the real nature of Divine service.

It is on the plane of the eternal realm of Sri Krishna Chaitanya, viz. Sri Nabadwip Dham, that the only proper service of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna is available.

Sri Nabadwip Dham is also not a certain area of measured space of this mundane world. Those who see Her to be material space do not see Her at all. To such spectators the Holy Realm of the Supreme Lord only presents Her deluding aspect.

It is the duty of the Acharya to make available the service of Sridham Nabadwip to all sincere souls who really seek the service of the Lord. Sridham Nabadwip is not a place that may minister to our sensuous enjoyment like the various localities of this mundane plane. She is a servant of the Supreme Lord and ministers exclusively to His pleasure. We, by our proper nature, are the dissociated counterparts of the eternal servants of the Supreme Lord. As under-servants of the Supreme Lord we are constituent parts of Sridham Nabadwip and She is really the kind Mother of all of us. If we want to serve the Lord at all it will be necessary for us to be allotted our proper location in the Abode of the Supreme Lord for the purpose. To allow us to serve Her is the function of the Acharya.

By Sj. Kisori Mohan Paul B. L.

THE province of Dravida is one of the holiest lands of India. She is literally the mother of jewels in every sense just as Sri Gaur Sundar, Embodiment of magnanimity by manifesting Himself with His realm and paraphernalia sanctified the country of Gauda (Bengal) which has since become the objective of pilgrimage, so the Vaishnava acharyyas who are founders of the four Vaishnava-sects, by appearing in the province of Dravida scattered broadcast the rays of devotional service throughout the world. Eternal and everlasting by its nature the principle of transcendental devotion first of all dawned upon this world to the mind of Vedavyas in its exclusive state, in the grassy land of Brahmmabarta on the bank of the Saraswati and passed through the stages of infancy and boyhood on the holy plains of the Naimisha forest on the bank of the Gomati. By the fostering service of the four founder-acharyyas, the process manifested its adolescence on the banks of the holy streams of the province of Dravida finally displaying its full maturity on the bank of the most sacred Ganges, in the town of Nabadwip in the country of Gauda by the touch of the holy feet of Sriman Mahaprabhu, in its perfect manifestation as the mellowing principle of higher (spiritual) amorous love (unnata ujjvala rasa).

Sree Rangakshetra lies on the beautiful bank of the Koliron, an arm of the Kaveri in the province of Dravida. The place has been designated as Sree Rangam or Rangakshetra after Vishnu or Sree Ranganath. Tirumongoi Alwar, a great saint in the order of preceptorial succession anterior to Sree Ramanuja Acharyya, made his appearance in the province of Dravida in the remote antiquity. In the Tamil language, the great Vaishnava saints go by the name of Alwar or Dibyasuri. Etymologically the word 'Alwar' means administrator hence it shows that the Vaishnavas are really the universal Gurus and as such all Jivas should come under their Divinely authorized spiritual jurisdiction as Guides.

Once upon a time in course of travels with his disciples, when Tirumongoi came to the temple-yard of of Sree Ranganath he was mortified to find the ruined condition of the temple which was encompassed by flourishing jungles on all sides. Finding the temple turned into an abode of bats and the haunting-ground of ferocious wild animals, Tirumongoi said to his disciples, 'You see, volptuous people by misappropriation and misapplication of their Master's money are getting steeped in luxury, but the master or Lord, who has manifested Himself in the form of the Sree Bigraha, stands here utterly neglected and abandoned'. Therefore, to collect funds for the restoration of the temple, Tirumongoi, with his disciples, went from door to door of all well-to-do people and accosted them thus—'Wealthy people, don't you see, your wealth has become productive only of your selfish enjoyments. It should not be so, but service to Godhead alone should be rendered by the instrumentality of all your wealth'.

But all advice fell flat on deaf ears and in some instances, Tirumongoi had to meet with harsh rebuffs from people intoxicated with the arrogance of wealth. Finding the people to be in such abnormal condition Tirumongoi determined to collect by hook or by crook, from the opulent people, money which is meant for the enjoyment of its sole Enjoyer viz., Godhead alone. Although this extraordinary conduct of Tirumongoi may appear condemnable to certain schools of empiric thinkers, yet it is symptomatic of the exclusive devotion of one who has surrendered himself body and soul to the Feet of Krishna. Having collected large funds by the method of apparently heartless exploitation he finished the work of the complete restoration of the temple of Sree Rangam, a structure on such a gigantic scale that it remains incomparable and inimitable example of its kind among the whole range of edifices dedicated to religious purposes in India.

In the month of Ashada of 1433 of the Saka era, corresponding to 1511 A. D., the sky with dark clouds lit up by occasional flashes of lightning, wore a beautiful appearance. The eleventh day of the moon from which the period of vow of continence for four months (chaturmasyabrata) commences every year, was near at hand. A young ascetic of golden hue with hands extending to the knee shedding all round the wonderful halo of His bright person, was passing along one of the roads of the country of Dravida fully absorbed in contemplation, chanting with His mouth, "Rama ! Raghava ! Rama ! Raghava ! Rama ! Raghava ! Pahi mam, Krishna ! Keshaba ! Krishna ! Keshaba ! Krishna ! Keshaba ! Raksha mam," and a Brahmana carrying a water-pot used by ascetics following Him. This Sannyasin passed through many holy places of pilgrimage sanctifying them by His touch. On the way He had held many discourses about Sree Hari with one of His most loved favourites, Ramananda Ray, in Vidyanagar on the bank of the Godavari. From Vidyanagar, passing through Gautami Ganga, Mallikarjuna, Ahobala Nrisingha, Siddhabat, Skanda-kshettra, Trimath, Briddha Kasi, Bauddhasthan, Tripadi, Trimalla, Papa Nrisingha, Siva Kanchi, Vishnu Kanchi, Trikalhasti, Bridhaka, Siali Bhairabi etc, He now reached the beautiful bank of the Kaveri and performed His bath in her sacred water. Being most highly favoured by the touch of the holy Feet of that Sannyasin, in token of her gratitude the Kaveri showed the effusion of her delight by the deep agitation of her high-heaving waves. After bath the Sannyasin had the sight of Sree Ranganath and danced and sang before Godhead with rapturous love. The effulgent beauty, splendour and majesty of the young Sannyasin struck unforeseen wonders into the hearts of the beholders who stood in silent awe like painted picture and gazed at Him without taking off their eyes. Reader, have you been able to recognise this young travelling Sannyasin of golden colour ? He only wears the disguise of a sannyasin. He is an Object incomprehensible to the yogins and the rishis. Even the devas are unable to have the sight of His form and are apt to get bewildered in the attempt. He is the self-revealing supreme Reality. Non-devotees over-powered by his deluding Energy cannot obtain the sight of His incomprehensible actual form. He is unique and there is none who is either equal or superior to Him. He is Godhead Himself and all visible and invisible things are His servants, the 'Brahman' of the Upanishads and the 'Paramatman' of the yogins are the lustre of His All-holy Person and His partial Manifestations respectively. This Sannyasin is Sree Krishna Chaitanya, the same as the Son of the chief of Braja (Brindaban), the only Saviour of this Iron Age, Who appeared in this world to give away to all souls the treasures of His Own Name and Love for Himself Who are identical with Himself.

The Magnanimity of Sree Gaursundar, the Embodiment of Divine Pity in His fullness captured the attention of a fortunate Vaishnava belonging to the theistic community which follows the Consort of Vishnu viz., Sree Devi. Venkatta Bhatta who hailed originally from Northern India but was then a sojourner in Sree Rangakshetra, was the name of the Brahmana who now prostrated himself at the Feet of the Supreme Lord and invited him to His home for doing Him the high favour of accepting his hospitality. He had two other brothers, Trimalla or Tirumalaya Bhatta and Tridandi Swami Prabodhananda. The latter was a sannyasin of the school of Sree Ramanujacharyya. Sree Prabodhananda's vast knowledge of the Scriptures had earned for him the scholastic title of 'Saraswati'. Venkata Bhatta was a pious householder devoted to the service of Sree Narayana. He had a jewel-like son named Gopala.

CHAPTER II

Summary :—This chapter contains the following narrative :

The devotees informed Adwaita of the Lords of love of Krishna. Adwaita was delighted on hearing the same. Adwaita spoke about his dream to all the devotees. The Lord made obeisance as soon as He chanced to see Sribash and other devotees and the devotees in their turn blessed Him. The Lord accepted their good wishes and manifested the ideal of the service of the Vaishnavas in diverse ways. Devotees showed their blessings and formed high hopes at this. The Lord expressed confidence in the devotees on hearing of their griefs caused by the turbulent conduct of the haters of Vaishnavas and slandering atheists resident at Nabadwipa. The Lord was filled with anger against the Pashandis. Ignorant persons requested mother Sachi to arrange for His medical treatment supposing that the Lord was afflicted with nervous malady. One day Sribash went to the house of the Lord and beheld on the person of the Lord the signs of the prevalence of the highest devotion. The Lord embraced Sribash on hearing his declaration to that effect. The mother gave up her suspicion that her Son was suffering from nervous malady on hearing the words of Sribash as he described to her the love of her Son for Krishna. The Lord visited the home of Adwaita in the company of Gadadhar. Adwaita who practised archan of Krishna by the method of love worshipped the feet of the Lord. Adwaita hymned the Lord. Gadadhar who enjoyed the confidence of the Lord prevented the same and expressed his surprise. On regaining His eternal consciousness the Lord hymned Adwaita by concealing His own identity. This did not prevent Adwaita from realising in his heart the coming of the Lord. Adwaita went to Santipur to test the magnanimous nature of the Lord's appearance. The Lord chanted daily the Kirtan of Krishna in the company of the devotees. The Lord, under the over-powering influence of loving separation, described to His inner devotees His vision of Krishna in His dawning youth resplendent with the yellow sheen of the tamala tree and the hue of fresh clouds in the neighbourhood of Kanai's Natsala on His way back from Gaya, and swooned away during the recital. The devotees with great joy praised the Lord after He regained this external consciousness. Even after His return home the Lord manifested continuous experience of the state of over-powering bliss and tendency to enquire of all persons regarding Krishna. One day the Lord attempted to tear open His own heart with His finger-nails on hearing from Gadadhar that Krishna dwelt in His heart, and could be induced to be patient only by the persuasions of Gadadhar for which Sachi Devi who was most devotedly attached to her Son, warmly praised the tact of Gadadhar. Sachi Devi manifested reverential fear for her Son, instead of motherly affection. The Lord in the company of His devotees listened in His own house in the evening to the singing of Kirtan by Mukunda. The performance of all-night-Kirtan was began. The Pashandis were angered by reason of interruption to their pleasure of sleep. They were filled with chagrin especially against Sribas, which led them to spread the false rumour of the King's displeasure against Sribas. The Lord appeared in this four-armed Divine Form before Sribas while the latter was engaged in his house in worshipping Sree Krisinghadeva and encouraged him by His words of mercy. Sribas hymned the Lord realising that He was Krishna Himself. On hearing the hymn of Sribas the Lord manifested His own Form and commanded Sribas with his wife to have a sight of His Divine Form and worship Him. Sribas with all members of his family worshipped the Lord and expressed his humility. The Lord then spoke to Sribas in order to remove his fears. At the command of the Lord Sree Narayani, the daugher of Sribas's brother forthwith swooned away and in view of all the devotees crying 'Krishna' and then began to weep. Sribas was relieved of all his fears of the Pashandis' by beholding all these Divine manifestations and chanted the praises of the Lord. Sribas was permitted to have the sight of the manifestation of the Divine power which is attainable with difficulty even to the Vedas. The Lord forbade Sribas to divulge His hidden appearance. The Lord returned home after giving Sribash His assurances of support against all danger. The author's eulogy of the glory of the household of Sribas is full of the service of Krishna. The author declares that the service of the devotees of Krishna is the only means of obtaining the service of Krishna. The author ventured to set upon the composition of the work by command of Nityananda.

1 All glory to Gaurchandra, the Well-being of the whole world !
Vouchsafe to the heart the gift of thy twin Feet !

2 All glory to Gauranga with the Society of His devotees !
By listening to the narrative of Chaitanya devotion is gained.

3 On beholding the love of the Lord the minds of all the devotees
Were filled with the greatest astonishment

4 With the highest delight, to Adwaita
All of them narrated whatever they had seen.

5 Through the force of the bond of devotion
Adwaita, of great prowess
Knew full well that the Lord had appeared.

6 Yet the Truth that is One and Indivisible may not be understood.
He manifests His appearance and is forthwith self-concealed.

7 On hearing the Truth Adwaita was filled with great joy.
He began to speak with the highest inspiration,—

8 'Brothers all, listen to my words regarding this day;
I have found some indication during the night.

9 'Not having understood well the meaning of what I read in the Geeta
I had remained without food through sadness of mind.

10 'When a part of the night had passed there appeared a certain person who said to me,
'Get up, Acharyya, quickly take your food.

11 'This is the text that was read,—this is its meaning that I tell you.
Get up, eat your food and worship Me.

12 'Why do you feel further sorrow ? You have obtained all,
That for which you had resolved is fulfilled.

13 'All the fasting and all the worship that you have performed,
All the tears that you have shed crying the
Name of Krishna,

14 'The selfsame Lord Whom to bring down,
'You vowed with hands uplifted, has now appeared.

15 'There will be Kirtan of Krishna in all lands,
In every home and in every town and at all time.

16 'All the devotion that there be and scarcely attainable even by Brahma,
All the people will now behold by your favour.

17 'In this home of Sribas all the Vaishnavas
Will witness realisations hardly possible even to Brahma and his equals.

18 'May you have your food, I now depart
I will come again while you are at your meal'.

19 'On opening my eyes I saw—this Biswambhar.
I could scarcely see, as He quickly disappeared.

20 'I donot understand at all the mystery of Krishna;
In which form He manifests Himself or in Whom.

21 'His elder-born, by name Biswarup, formerly Used to come and expound the Geeta with me.

22 'This Child, possessed of most delicious beauty,
Came to my place to call His brother.

23 'Being so beautiful the child stole all the faculties of my heart,
I blessed Him saying, 'May there be devotion to God'.

24 'By high lineage He is the Son of a great person.
He is the daughter's son of Nilambar Chakravarty.

25 'Himself also is most erudite and possessed of all good qualites.
It is meet that He should have devotion to Krishna.

26 'I am very happy on hearing the tidings.
May all of you bless Him saying, 'Be it so.'

27 'May the mercy of Krishna be manifested to all.
May the whole world be intoxicated by the Name of Krishna.

28 'If there be truth, then to this place
All will come, even to this worthless
Brahmana'

29 For joy Adwaita rolled forth the mightiest ejaculations.
All the Vaishnavas raised the chant of jubilation.

30 The mouths of all uttered continuously the Name of Hari.
There arose the manifestation of Krishna in the Form of the Kirtan.

31 Said some, 'When Nimai Pandit will be cured of His illness
Then we could perform the Samkirtan with the greatest zeal'

32 The company of the devotees having made their obeisance to the Acharyya Took their departure, chanting joyously together the Samkirtan of Hari.

33 Every one of those who happened to meet the Lord
Greeted Him with the greatest cordiality.

34 In the morning when the Lord set out for His bath in the Ganges
He met all the Vaishnavas.

35 At sight of Sribas and his companions the Lord made obeisance.
The devotees were gladdened and blessed.

36 'May thou have devotion to the Feet of Krishna.
Say 'Krishna' with thy mouth hear 'Krishna' with thy ears.

37 'It is only by worshipping Krishna that everything becomes true.
If Krishna is not served, beauty and learning go for nothing.

Circumambulation of Sreedham Nabadwip Feb. 22—Mar. 1

The huge Kirtan procession consisting of several thousands of devotees from all parts of the country for the circumambulation of Sreedham Navadwip on this auspicious occasion of the Advent of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya started from Sree Chaitanya Math on the 22nd of February and was led on the first two days by His Divine Grace Sreela Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj in person. From Sree Godruma-dwipa onwards the charge of the function was made over to the other Tridandi Sannyasi Maharajas of the Mission. The procession of chanters in an imposing array passed through Koladwipa (Town Navadwip) on the 27th February and returned to Sreedham Mayapur on the 1st of March without any accident having accomplished the greater part of the journey in very foul weather. A short exposition of the function appears on a separate page.

Festival of the 445th Anniversary of the Advent of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya at Sreedham Mayapur March 4

The festival of the 445th anniversary of the Advent of the Supreme Lord was celebrated in the great Audience Hall of Sree Chaitanya Math by a vast assemblage of devotees, on the evening of the 4th of March. His Holiness Tridandi Swami Sreemad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj led the chant of the account of the Appearance of the Supreme Lord as the Divine service was performed with due solemnity on the rising of the full-moon in the evening. This was followed by a lantern lecture exhibiting the Lila of the Lord. Not less than ten thousand persons were present to honour the mahaprasad in the spacious compound of Sree Chaitanya Math. A rich variety of mahaprasad was distributed without stint among those present.

The Advent Anniversary of the Supreme Lord was duly observed by all the branch Maths. The reader should also consult the opening article of the present issue in this connection.

Thirty-seventh annual session of Sree Nabadwip Dham Pracharini Sabha, March 5

The Sabha held its thirty-seventh annual session in the Natya Mandir of Sree Yoga-peetha in Sreedham Mayapur from 5 to 10 P. M. on the 5th of March under presidency of His Divine Grace Paramahansa Paribrajakacharyya Sree Sreemad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj. A short account of the proceedings of the meeting will be published in the next number of the journal. The meeting was attended by a very large number of members and other persons from all parts of the country and was very successful.

Sampradaya Vaibhabacharyya and Bhaktisastri examinations 4—5 March

The above examinations were duly held in the Temple premises of Sree Chaitanya Math, Sreedham Mayapur on the 4th and 5th of March respectively.

Bhakti-vijaya Bhaban March 4

His Divine Grace made His formal entry into Bhakti-vijaya Bhaban on the anniversary day of the Advent of the Supreme Lord by the ceremony of congregational chant. This elegant two storeyed house is the offering of Sreepad Sakhi Charan Bhakti-vijaya prabhu for the residence of His Divine Grace. The event was celebrated by the distribution of mahaprasad of every rich variety, on the following day to not less than ten-thousand residents of the adjoining villages.

Removal of Sree Ekayan Math to its own Buildings at Hanskhali, March 7

His Divine Grace accompanied by a party of His Grace' prominent followers and admirers paid a visit to Hanskhali and declared the spacious buildings at the place newly purchased from Government as the permanent site of Sree Ekayan Math which was thereby transferred from Krishnagar City to its own buildings at Hansakshetra. A large assemblage of people from the adjoining villages gathered to witness the ceremony.

Propaganda during the month of March in Calcutta

Sripad Sundarananda Vidyavinod, B. A., lectured on the difference between the views that prevail in the current forms of the Vaishnava religion and those preached by Sriman Mahaprabhu and represented by the activities of the Gaudiya Math at the palatial residence of Srijukta Amulyadhan Adhya, the millionaire Zemindar of Chetla before a distinguished gathering on the 22nd of March from 6-30 to 9-30 P.M. The Samkirtan was led on this occasion by Srijukta Pramole Bhusan Chakravarty Pratna-Vidyalankar.

24 Perganas

His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Vaibhab Sagar Maharaj expounded the Bhagabat at the residence of Srijut Jiban Krishna Dasadhikari in the village of Ramanathpur and later on at the Kutchery of the Hon'ble Raja Rishee Case Law C.I.E. in the village of Dhanyaghata.

Pabna

His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Vilas Gabhastinemi Maharaj lectured on "The Great Gift of Sri Chaitanya" on the 8th of March from 5 to 8 P. M. at the Town Hall of Pabna City before a gathering of over 400 elites of the town. Srijukta Jahnabi Charan Bhowmik presided. All present expressed their high appreciation of the exposition of the Swamiji.

Midnapur

His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj toured through the District of Midnapur delivering public lectures at the following villages—

13—16 March at Malpar on Sanatan Dharma (Eternal function).
17 March at Naogaon on the religion of pure devotion.
20 " at Masumpur on spiritual function (Dharma)
23 " at Sitalda on the function (dharma) of householders.
26 " at Raichak, exposition of the Bhagabatam.

The great success of the tour was mainly due to the selfless exertions of Srijukta Pulin Behari De, Kenaram Samanta, Iswari Chandra Mandal, Bhagabat Das and other devotees.

Hooghly

His Holiness Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj expounded the Lila of the meeting between Sree Rupa and Sanatan from Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita at the village of Rajbalhat in the District of Hooghly in the spacious compound of the Natyamandir belonging to Srijukta Nibaran Chandra Bhar on the 29th of March. Rajbalhat is situated three miles from Tara-Antpur station on the Howrah-Champadanga Light Railway. Tara-Antpur is the Sreepat (place of the performance of intimate service of the Divinity) of Sree Parameswari Thakur, one of the twelve gopalas. This function was followed on the 30th by a huge Samkirtan procession through the village and exposition of the career of Sree Prahlad Maharaj from the Bhagabatam. His Holiness Srimad Aprakrita Bhaktisaranga Goswami prabhu delivered a lantern lecture on the principles of pure devotion on the 31st.

Srijukta Gostha Hari Das, Fakir Chandra Bhar and Jahar Lal Bhar promised handsome donations for the furtherence of the devotional activities of the Mission.

To our subscribers and readers

It is a pleasant duty to approach our readers and subscribers on the last day of the year to propose the continuance of the journal for another year, by the method of mutual co-operation. We do not hold the view that we are the instructors of our readers, because such view is opposed to the teachings of the Scriptures and also to the rational principle of natural spiritual subordination to every existing entity that should guide the minutest detail of the conduct of every pure soul.

It is only in so far as this only standard of the truly rational conduct is actually followed in practice by one that he will be in a position to co-operate to that extent either as reader or writer of the spiritual journal. We, therefore, invite our readers to kindly extend to us the privilege of serving them in the spirit of true humility to enable us to gradually pick up by means of the loyal effort to follow the process, eligibility for serving all existing entities without discrimination. This consummation is the one that is proposed to every fettered soul, like myself, by the Supreme Lord Sree Gaursundar. It is on this common platform of unconditional spiritual service that the infinity of the outstanding issues of suffering humanity have their only rational chance of perfect and real solution.

In view of the fact that it has not been possible for us to make up our arrear in the matter of the regular appearance of the journal during the year just elapsed we have decided to issue a combined number for May and June without increasing the size correspondingly and counting the New Year from July instead of from June, as we have done hitherto. The years of the journal will, therefore, in future run from July to June instead of from June to May. This will not involve any loss to the subscribers as they will have received twelve numbers of the journal for their annual subscription viz., Rs. 3/- only for one complete year.

Subscribers are requested to kindly expedite the remittance of the amount of their annual subscriptions so as to reach the Manager before the end of the first week of July to enable him to post the first Number of the journal of the New Year in proper time. It is our intention in future to post the journal within the first week of the month to which it belongs. Subscribers are, therefore, requested to promptly inform the management of any delay in receipt of the journal beyond the corresponding date of its delivery at destination. Subscribers are also requested to join the service of the journal, if they happen to be convinced of its view-point, by actively trying to introduce the journal to the circle of their friends and constituents.

Empiricism versus Religion

THE empiric propaganda against Religion is strongly intrenched in the secular literatures of the world. The charge of fanaticism is no less applicable to the empiric thinker, of every school, than to the pseudo-religionist who is really an empiricist of a particular stamp. The direct empiric opposition to religion takes a great variety of forms. It is to be remembered that the empiric thinker makes his appeal ultimately to the self-sufficiency of the limited understanding of humanity. This may be called his forte which he is pleased to call by the catch-word 'non-sectarianism.' The empiricist always prides himself on his absolute freedom from this so-called sectarian bias. 'Look', says he, 'at the sciences that have been built up by the patient allegiance to the truth of the greatest geniuses of the race. Let us be guided by their teaching. The sciences are, no doubt, far from being perfect. They themselves do not claim to be perfect. But neither do they profess to be what they are not. For one thing they never ask us to take anything on trust. They always prove the truth of what they want us to accept. It is for this quality that they are bound (?) to receive the allegiance of every thoughtful person. Moreover they teach truth that is always verifiable (?) by every one on his own separate (?) account. They teach truth that has always a universal application and which is always (?) open to be rectified (?) by the successful rational challenge of every individual. It is no water-tight(?)nook of any unchangeable system into which they want to squeeze the infinite possibilities of our powers of understanding. All these good points, they contend, distinguish the empiric sciences from Religion as that subject has been ordinarily understood in the history of the world.'

There are empiric apologists of Religion who have consciously or unconsciously been playing into the hands of their compatriots of the opposite camp. These religionists have either claimed to be enemies of all rational thinking on the subject of religion or have agreed to convert religion into one of the departments of the empiric sciences. The extreme fanaticism of the opposite school may be inferred from the fact that every concession on the part of these pseudo-religionists has only strengthened the empiric opposition to religion. Such a result was not very difficult to foresee and must have been either actually intended by those who offered such concession or opposition, or might have been deliberately intended only to put off what was desired by a few years or centuries.

We mean to do neither in this short paper. We know and are fully prepared to admit the propriety of the convinced empiricist making every honest effort to propagate his particular methods and opinions if he thinks them to be really beneficial for humanity. But we are not equally prepared to admit that he possesses the same toleration for the methods and doctrines of Religion which he rightly or wrongly demands for his own views. He has been taught to suspect the bonafide of the rationale of the point of view of all revealed Religion. He has sought to find a mischievous plea for entertaining such suspicion in the fanatical and compromising attitudes of the pseudo-religionist towards his own position. We say that this kind of suspicion and the virulent propaganda based on such wrong suspicion that is being carried on against Religion itself by an influential section of the responsible leaders of empiric thought all over the world, deserve the severest condemnation on the very principle of rational toleration of all hostile opinion claimed by the empiricists themselves as their greatest virtue and monopoly.

Let us illustrate our position by a concrete example. Objection was openly taken to the introduction of this Journal to the reading-room of the professors of a certain educational institution on the ground that no one should on principle lend any countenance to a denominational paper which professes to carry on propaganda of a particular sect. This motion was not moved to a division for reasons of civility and was not also probably on the whole well received. But it nevertheless shows the bias against religion being regarded as a proper subject for the serious consideration of everybody, as capable of being seriously entertained by responsible empiric thinkers. If the empiricist really wants to be true to his own logic he should be genuinely prepared to give his unbiased hearing to the exponents of Religion on a footing of strict equality with the exponent of empiric science. He should not allow himself to be put down by the fanaticism or insincere dodges of either prejudiced scientists or pseudo-religionists, of any school or community.

The above is only symptomatic of a tacit propaganda behind the back. We are always prepared to meet any open rational objection by a reasoned elucidation of our position. What we are troubled about is not direct opposition but indifference due to hasty prejudice. The literature of the day is devoid of any serious thought for the true Religion which alone is able to supply the real need of our souls. This self-satisfied secular taste has grown to such inordinate lengths especially in our schools and colleges that Religion has been banned by almost common consent to shift by itself. If secular pedantry cannot be expected to provide for Religion being taught or considered in the public places of popular education under the plea of giving a wide berth to sectarian controversy, may not the people insist on at least the free admission of an adequate body of healthy literature on this all-important subject to which every body especially the unsophisticated students, should have easy access ? We wish that this should be provided out of the public funds in the spirit of a wide toleration to enable both students and teachers to arrive at a rational state of opinion on the subject.

This is not demanding too much when it is borne in mind that the propaganda of the opposition camp is being mechanically supported on a scale of gigantic magnificence at the public cost. We do not want to shut the door of our public schools to any religious sect or opinion for banishing the subject of religion. The comparative point of view in our opinion is all-important also in the proper understanding of the problems of Religion. The educational institutions of the people should secure an impartial hearing for every school of opinion on principle and this should be practicable at a very small pecuniary outlay. The Colleges which stand for culture as culture, cannot be pardoned if they choose deliberately to follow the narrow and irrational policy of exclusion under no tenable plea.

The study of Religion should be raised to the dignity of that of a subject that concerns the whole of humanity and not merely any particular section of the same. No opposition on the part of fanatics of any camp should be allowed to stand in the way of providing for this higher comparative study of the problem of Religion in the truly catholic spirit. Such an arrangement will be welcomed by the leading exponents of all the principal religions so far as can be gathered from their published views. The Harmonist also hopes for a place in one corner of the hospitable reading-table of every rationally conducted public seminary.

Sreepad Sundarananda

THERE have been many persons who have gained the undoubtedly rare distinction of being successful authors. There is also no manner of doubt that more persons will yet gain the same enviable distinction in the times to come. Many undoubtedly great philosophers have already given us their brilliant expositions of the philosophy of Nescience conceived by the empiricists. More commanding intellects will undoubtedly gain further world-wide renown by offering even more brilliant expositions of the subject on the same lines in the long Ages still unborn. There have similarly been, and will be, an unending series of geniuses giving the empiric exposition of the system of Differentiated Absolute (Tattvavada). Many have achieved, and more will achieve, the great distinction that is rightly due to the successful orator. Many have already attained and more will yet attain the sterling quality of sincerity. Many have earned and many more will yet earn the priceless eligibility for the service of the Guru.

From some time past there has been visible on the horizon of the Gaudiya firmament a shining star who combines in his single personality, before our very eyes, the amazing distinction of having been successful as an author, orator, an excellent judge of the comparative merits of the schools of empiric nescience and differentiated absolute of possessing a developed aesthetic knowledge and high tact in the artless service of Hari, Guru and Vaishnavas. Such an event is a very rare occurrence in this world.

Have the contemporaneous critics and reviewers had occasion of keeping due watch of this notable fact? If they have they must have been led to realise that there is great need for the appearance of such a desired luminary in the dark firmament of the present Age full of the blindest ignorance of the only Truth.

What a curious medley of speculations is being allowed now-a-days to pass unchallenged as devotional literature! Neither is there the least want of any amount and degree of filthy simulated madness that is allowed to parade itself under the much enduring designation of Vaishnava Philosophy,—of the very worst variety of literature that is bringing down unmeasured corruption into the society in the name of aesthetics!

Has the reader had occasion to give his serious thought to that gladdening point of pure light who has been shedding, during these several years, his penetrating radiance, so amply promotive of the peace of the conscience of all sincere seekers of the Truth, for dissipating once for all the thousand and one of these most pernicious influences?

The readers of the Bengali religious Weekly which bears the name of the Gaudiya and which is being published these nine years from the Gaudiya Math of Calcutta, must have been following with breathless interest the highly instructive movements of this peerless disc of serving light.

In this connection we feel it to be our duty to invite the special attention of our readers to the fact that it is never possible for a hireling to be a writer who deserves to be heard on the score of the possession of any real worth. It is never possible for a person, who is subject to the temptations of the world to be impartial. No one who is bent upon advertising his own greatness by artificial diligence, can be an unbiased Truth-serving literature. If one intends deliberately to cherish wrong selfish interests and is led by consequent inevitable inflation of silly vanity to learn to perform the wildest antics on the stage of this subsidising world, there is no longer any chance of the Truth being uttered by him with the perfect fearlessness that is his due. By freeing himself wholly from the fatal grip of all these temptations the unprecedented opportunity of being engaged in the true function of the soul that the Editor of the Gaudiya, Sripad Sundarananda Vidyavinode, has been affording to the readers of the Bengali Literature by his own personal example of undeviating devotion to the Truth, must indeed be pronounced as being without a parallel.

The straightforwardness and intense desire of benefiting others of this unpurchased literature and philosopher will be brought home to every reader who will go through the illuminating pages of the thirty-eighth number of the Gaudiya of the ninth year just published. We cherish the hope that the path that is to be followed in the future by other preachers and workers of the Gaudiya Math will be settled in pursuance of that trod by Sreepad Sudaranauda. Sincerity of disposition makes its appearance as a matter of course if one can have regard for the Truth. Uncultured bullies failing to understand the unmixed goodness of the genuine devotee mistake impartiality for ruffianliness. There is not an iota of hope for the enrichment of the Gaudiya literature by the labours of an infinite array of the heroes, who dedicate themselves to immoral activities. It is comparatively easy to find hundreds and thousands of heroes of good and bad worldly activity. But the chanter of Hari is very very rare, indeed. If the numerous body of hypocrites with the insatiable aptitude for worldly activity, whose inner conduct is always bound to be different from their external behaviour, betake to reforming their own character by the careful study of the priceless articles of the Gaudiya, they would thereby effect the true well-being of the present Age by being themselves benefited.

Presidential Address at the All-Theistic Conference

THIRD DAY'S SITTING

SUBJECT—Regarding Reference : the categories of object of worship and worshipper : Knowledge of real and non-real entities.

[N. B. The instalment of the Presidential Address published in the December (1930) issue of the Journal, pp. 202-8, is the concluding part of the second day's Address and should be read as such. The second day's Address should therefore be read in three instalments in the following revised order viz., 1st instalment published in January '31, 2nd in February '31, 3rd in December '30.]

'Will Sree Chaitanya once more appear within the scope of my vision, even He Who is the constant Object of worship, possessed of the Human Form, bowed to by many felicitous speakers such as Shiva, Brahma, and others engaged in instructing His devotees in the activity of His own intimate service ?'

There is a function which is called 'Upanayana' (bringing near). We come to learn from the words of the Sruti that the birth of a man is three fold, viz., (1) seminal birth, (2) by Gayatri, (3) by initiation. The seminal birth comes first in order of time, from the mother's womb. Then comes the second birth on the attainment of purification by the Gayatri-mantram. The next birth is brought about on receiving Spiritual enlightenment (diksha). We obtain a body from the mother's womb by vital fluid from the father. This is our first birth. The body that we get by this process is one kind of body. The second kind of body is that which is born by the union of the Acharyya as father and the Gayatri as mother at the time of our investiture with the Holy thread. Then the Acharyya-father binds us with the thread of Sacrifice for the purpose of introducing us to the study of the Vedas by means of the Mantras, 'I will lead thee into the presence of the Veda etc.', the birth to which we are thereby subjected in the home of the Acharyya, is our second birth. The ceremony of tying the Sacrificial thread does not import that thereby the physical body may be preserved but that the Veda or true Knowledge may be gained by its means. Our third birth takes place on the occasion of the ceremony of imparting spiritual enlightenment by initiation into performance of worship (Yajna).

This is spiritual birth proper by attainment of enlightenment. The function of the body born of the ceremony of imparting enlightenment is performance of Divine worship (Yajna) or 'upasana' which latter means 'to live in close proximity' this being the etymological meaning of the word 'upasana'. The performance of yajna or upasana is the function that has to be practised subsequent to receiving spiritual enlightenment (diksha). The function which we perform on appearing in the presence of the Holy Form of real Knowledge (Veda) is termed upasana. The Person in Whose presence we dwell on gaining access to His proximity is the Object of upasana (upasya). He is the Veda-Person, Lord of Yajna, Vishnu. The function for the performance of which we dwell with Him is upasana or worship which is also Yajna or sacrifice.

The prescribed method of Yajna is different for the different Cycles (Yugas). For the Satya Yuga—when virtue is fully prevalent—the method prescribed is that of meditation (dhyana). In the Treta Age—when the prevalence of virtue has decreased by one quarter—the Yajna is of the form of sacrifice by fire (makha) In the Dwapara Age when dharma has decreased by one half it is of the form of ministering to the person of Godhead as a servant attends to his master's needs (paricharyya). In the Kali Yuga when virtue has gone under to the proportion of three quarters the yajna has the form of preaching or kirtana. In this Iron Age virtue is totally on its last legs and in consequence the other methods have no chance of success.

The code of scriptural regulations, known as the Veda has come down to this world as Sruti (that which has been heard) from preaching (kirtan) as its source. The present is the Age of controversy (kalikala). In this Age whatever proposition may happen to be put forward forthwith provokes active discussion of its pros and cons and raises a storm of reasoned opposition. The chanting or preaching of Hari is the only Scriptural method (Srauta pantha). That absolutely consistent expounder of the Sruti, Srimat Purnaprajna Madhvacharyya, in his commentary on the Mundakopanishada quotes the following words of the Narayana Sambita :—"In the Dwapara Age Vishnu is worshipped by all people by the method laid down in the Pancharatra (division of the Scriptures treating of their rational). In the present controversial Age (Kali yuga) the Supreme Lord Hari is worshipped by means of His Name alone."

It is needful to consider about the Object of our worship. If we obtain access to the presence (upasana) of any inanimate object or happen to be situated in its vicinity we are thereby induced to put it to some use or in other words, to the attempt to extract some service to ourselves from it. But the entity that happens to be self-conscious is necessarily also a free agent. If I make the attempt to get up his shoulders he is apt to offer his opposition to such activity. We have no power at all whereby we can put to our own service One Who is fully self-consciousness and therefore, fully free. On the contrary it is we who find ourselves irresistably put to His own service. The current Utilitarian theory is always busy to find a use for every thing, for the natural current of the flowing river, for the free air of the atmosphere, for the falls of the Niagara. But we cannot employ any self-conscious entity least of all, the fully Self-conscious and fully free Entity—in the same way in our service. He never submits to us.

During our sojourn into this world the consideration viz., that other objects may serve our pleasure—that we may become the worshipped has come to prevail. Is the show of service that we display in the garb of worshippers towards other entities of this world, possessed of a mixed quality or unalloyed purity? The generations of the Rishis practised sacrifices, meditations,(yajnas, dhyanas) etc. They never entertained the judgment that they are eligible to receive the service of others. They offered their services to their Devatas. In the portions of the Veda treating of worship (upasana) we find them making use of the following mantra (which saves from thraldom to the mind) in their hymn of praise of the gods.

'Thou, fire (i.e. Vishnu), may Thou lead us unto the treasure of the supreme desideratum (paramartha) by the good path. Bright one, may Thou lead us in unison with the movement of the whole cosmos and by the method of the knowledge fully directed to Thyself. May thou destroy all our sins in the forms of nescience and insincerity. We bow to Thee time and again'. They praise the gods by means of this and other similar hymns. They consider these hymns as the constituent limbs of the acts of upasana (lit. abiding in the presence of the object of worship). The proof of these statements has been most clearly preserved in the oldest Vedic history. The Rishis did not regard themselves as objects of worship. They were worshippers of the Devatas. This disposes of the allegation that the process which bears the name of upasana is a comparatively modern innovation. The method that is approved by the school of pure knowledge or exclusive Monism is that the proper object of life is to merge in the Brahman. It is found to be the historical fact that in times long before the origin of the method of the attempt to merge in the Divinity the desire for service for upasana was the only spiritual impulse which existed among all people while their disposition retained its natural, primitive simplicity. Now-a-days in this Age which is so inordinately fond of discordant controversy (Kaliyuga), the opinion which is opposed to History has become fashionable that the method of Spiritual activity of the form of upasana, is of recent origin. Such a view is altogether erroneous. Wheresoever the function of consciousness has been found to exist the tradition of upasana is also seen to have prevailed from the very beginning of history. Brahman or the Entity of real Knowledge (Veda) the real Truth, first manifested Himself in the heart of Brahma, the first progenitor of all animated beings of this world.

The Rishis and the Devatas are the offsprings of Brahma. The Devatas possess the quality of self-effulgence in a boundless measure. It is for this reason that the Rishis served the Devatas with infinite devotion. This relationship of the worshipper with the worshipped must have always subsisted between the Rishis and the Devatas.

We also notice that in the first dawn of our consciousness as well as in the beginning of our cultured state or intellectualism that service or upasana is the universal natural impulse. In the subsequent periods if we carefully consider the diverse forms of religion also in the pre-historic Ages, we find that the impulse of service is always spontaneous in human nature.

It is in this Age of Discord that there has arisen such an amount of disputation on this subject. The reason is that we are now-a-days unhesitatingly occupied in the engrossing task of trying to lord it over one another. The Utilitarian theory has undergone its due expansion and is aspiring to yoke everything into our so-called service. We spare no manner of close endeavour (upasana)—every one of us does it to the best of his power—to become the recipients of service (upasana). This familiar process known as barter made its appearance with the beginning of civilization. If I perform some service for another he pays me its value. Men are thus placed towards one another in relation of servant and master. In this world we possess different sense organs to the number of eleven for doing service viz., the eye, ear, nose, tongue, skin, speech, hand, anus, leg, generative organ and mind. By means of these instruments we adjust our respective occupations as towards one another. One thus becomes the master of another who in his turn becomes his servant or subordinate. One occupies a high the other a low position. One is engaged in rendering obedient service to another.

Every human being—all animated, all conscious and non-conscious entities—are thus located in the system of the threefold relationship of worshipper, worship and object of worship. Each entity is related to another as servant and master. Wherever we find more than one or many entities each of them is seen to be engaged in ministering to the wants of another. We observe this process called 'upasana' in constant operation in both animate and inanimate worlds and yet we are anxious to establish the view that the Reality is absolutely devoid of all distinctive features and to congratulate ourselves on possessing sound judgment and wonderful power of argument, by which we are enabled to reach such a grand conclusion. If the knowledge that is devoid of all distinctive features be the object of my worship, the endeavour which I put forward for the purpose of serving such object is itself the process of my specific kind of worship.

The person who is engaged in the quest of the Undifferentiated Brahman says that at the point where the three seperate lines of consideration of knower, object of knowledge and knowledge merge into one indivisible activity (?) of cognition, the logical limit of the cognitive process itself is reached. 'Let the diversity end. One is observing, another is showing himself to his observer. Let the functions of both cease'. Such a consummation is called the desirable state of non-activity. If the observer of the light and the process of observing the light could be extinguished it is supposed that such an event could free us from the necessity of worship (upaśana), rescue us from the grip of the process of the triple texture. We are in the midst of, we are engaged in the performance of, certain forms of activity. If this process is destroyed we are disposed to imagine that the principle of activity itself is thereby eliminated.

We are located on the marginal line forming the boundary between this perishable world and the realm of the Absolute (Vaikuntha). All speculations involving any reference to the phenomenal world will cease if we could reach the marginal line. So long as we happen to be engaged in the quest of the principle of non-cognition we are led to think that we might escape the clutches of our evil lot on the cessation of the seperate existence of object of knowledge, act of knowledge and knower. The goal to which such a proposition leads is devoid of both categories, there being no reference either to the phenomenal world or to the realm of the Absolute in such goal. The composite position of knower, knowledge and object of knowledge is evolved from the marginal power. It forms one of the perishable divisions of the Reality. In the marginal position we engage in diverse activities and are enabled thereby to experience the existence of the worshipper, worshipped and act of worship. All of these are, also not one but many. In common parlance we say that one cannot serve many masters. When we try to serve the entities of this world we find ourselves committed by such endeavours to the slavery of lust, anger, greed, infatuation, vanity, malice etc. If the object of worship, the act of worship and the worshipper merge into one category a condition of intense maliciousness is found to prevail as the sequel of such consummation which exist only in one's imagination.

Those who possess sound judgment declare that the activity of service has prevailed at all periods in the history of the world. Every object is always found to be closely bound to every other object by the relationship of servant and master. If any entity adopts on its own account the role of master it thereby falls into the evil condition of such activity.

Should we be worshippers or worshipped ? There is a certain sect which is called "Baul" or insane. The Baul says, "I am enjoyer. This home is for my enjoyment. This tenement is meant to serve myself". There are two kinds of Bauls, householder Bauls and recluse Bauls. A number of Bauls renounce the world. They, however, put on the garb of Krishna for the exclusive purpose of enjoying the world. They intent to become Krishna in right earnest. Their point of view is that all other persons should place themselves body and soul at their entire disposal.

Sree Gaursundar does not endorse the validity of such opinions. He says that the undifferentiated monistic view cannot be considered as the real meaning of the Vedanta or of the Veda. He says that there are found three kinds of propositions in the Veda viz., those regarding the nature of relationship, those regarding the practice of relationship and those regarding the object of such endeavour. These different groups cannot be made to lose their distinctive specifications. Mahaprabhu tells us of the process of the Evolution of power. He does not advocate any process of mere confusion of one thing for another (Vivarta) as the explanation of the principle of evil.

The good old Vaishnava Acharyyapada Sree Madhwa says, "Vishnu Himself is the Ultimate Real Substantive Entity." The seeker of the undifferentiated Brahman maintains that the featureless Great One (Brahman) is the ultimate Principal. But this last is a proposition that can be put forward only by those who are themselves in the conditioned state. In the state of freedom such consideration automatically ceases to be entertained. The Entity Who is the source of every thing, is Vishnu. The transcendental quality of surpassing everything is in Vishnu. All beauty has its source of existence in Vishnu. We also notice in the formula (mantram) that saves from the plight of mental speculation, that we have to utter at all time, that in the pure state and in the state of defilement, in all conditions, he who recollects the Possessor of the Lotus Eyes (Vishnu) is pure both internally and externally.

One is higher than another in proportion as his conduct is more in conformity with the requirements of the spiritual standard. The Brahmana is the highest of all the Varnas for the reason that he has learnt to behave properly from the Acharyya i. e. one who practices the function of the soul and establishes others in the same. The Kshatriyas (military class) are the protectors of mundane society. They devote themselves exclusively to politics. Those who have similarly to busy themselves very much about knowledge of the Brahman and worship of Godhead, have also very little time to spare for other kinds of activities.

The life of the Brahmana is that of the beggar. It is the duty of society to serve, to help, those whose sole profession is to cultivate the knowledge of the Brahman. The Brahmanas also should obtain what they require by the method of begging. If there is left any surplus on their hands over and above what they require for their own use they should give it away to others as free gift. They must not accumulate anything as a provision. That function belongs to the Kshatriyas.

In many places, as for instance in the Government census operations, the whole body of destitute beggars have been put into one class with the sadhus. If the ordinary beggar who is in want of necessaries be regarded as identical with the Tridandi or Sadhu Bhikshu of the Bhagabatam the true position is reversed.

The Vagrancy Act is not applicable to the bona fide itinerant preacher viz., the Tridandi Bhikshu. If the seeker of the knowledge of the Brahman has to find much time for getting his food and clothing the margin of time left to him for finding the knowledge of the Brahman is unduly curtailed. It is for this reason that Manu has said that the whole world belongs to the Brahmana as its proprietor. This is perfectly true. Those who worship Godhead accept what they require at any time by the method of meeting only the requirement of the moment. They entertain no anxiety on this account. The society is under obligation to provide them with neither more nor less than what is necessary for their cultivation of the knowledge of the Brahman. The society which does not place itself under the guidance of those who possess the knowledge of the Brahman (Brahmanas) will sink down to the uttermost depths of difficulties.

The Brahmana, the Kshatriya and the Vaisya are the proper objects of worship of the Sudra. If in this world any one is disposed to entertain any principle of superiority he must go by this rule. He who does not seek for the Entity Who is the object of quest of the Brahmana, is landed into the thousand and one futile topics of this world, that are absolutely different from the quest of the Brahman.

"The four Varnas with the Ashramas sprang separate from the Face, the Hands, the Thighs, and the Feet of the Supreme Purusha (Indweller). He who does not serve or fail to render due respect to the Purusha Who is the Lord Himself and the source of all souls loses and falls from his possession."

The Face of the Purusha is the highest of all His Limbs, His Hands are next below His Face in the order of excellence. His Thighs are lower than His Hands and His Feet are lower still. In otherwords, there is gradation of descent from the higher to the lower, from the Face to the lower portions of the Form of the Purusha. In like manner the Brahmana is the best of all ; the Kshatriya is next lower : the Vaishya is lower than the Kshatriya ; and the Sudra is the lowest.

of all. The face is the best of all limbs. In the face are placed the brain, the seat of intelligence, and the mouth, the seat of speech (Kirtan). That Brahamana who devotes all his time to the chanting of the best of Purushas viz., Vishnu, the Source from Whom he has sprung, alone is properly Vaishnava. The head performs the functions of judging and deciding. The Brahamana who is the brain of the society controls all activities of the hands and thighs of the social body. It is the brain, the Brahmana, who tells the feet in what manner they should move. He tells them where to go and where not to go. It is the Brahmana who tells them to walk on the plane of Krishna in the eternal realm. "It is the function of the house-holder, the husband to betake himself to his wife at the due season. But My worship is obligatory on all."

If the community of the recluse Bauls demand, "We will indulge in the unchecked gratification of our senses by putting on the garb of Krishna, or if the Baul who is addicted to domesticity, think, 'I will enjoy the pleasures of my home, it may be asked how long it would be possible for a servant who belongs to this external world, by his own admission to continue in such service? If the Brahmana do not serve the Supreme Lord who is the source of all souls, if he do not serve Him Whose eternal servant he is by his proper nature, he gradually sinks lower in the scale of his function, suffering successive degradation into the respective conditions of Kshatriya, Vaishya, Sudra, Antyaja, Mlechcha and others.

There is a certain class of persons who are devoid of ordinary common sense, who say, "The function of the servant of this world is the worst of all. We have, therefore, no intention of practising any similar function in the next world. We intend to be masters, to be objects of worship." As if the transcendental realm is full of unwholesomeness, is tortured by the triple quality, as is the case with this world! If one is ignorant of the true meaning of "Vaikuntha" one is liable to fall into this kind of poverty of judgment. He is apt to attribute and imagine the existence of the unwholesomeness of the perverted reflected image to the undisturbed substantive entity itself. Into that realm where there is no principle of limitation, no question of evil, where there is only unmixed good, it is not our duty to carry from here any thing that is productive of evil. The sun is a self-revealing entity. It is not necessary to carry any lamp to the sun.

There is popular tale to this effect. A certain boatman was troubled by the idea that the operation of pulling at the cord for towing his boat was a miserable job involving great hardships, in as much as it required him to trudge painfully along most uneven ground over thorns and brambles which often stuck into the bare soles of his feet. Therefore, if he could manage to get rich by some how he would be in a position to tug at his cord by bestriding quilts and mattresses which he would take care to spread over either banks of the river. The boat-man of the story was so foolish that he intended to carry all the miserable affairs of his poverty-stricken state into the condition of affluence. The consideration, that if he could get rich it might not be necessary for him to tug at the cord at all, would not penetrate his foolish pate. Those persons who are bent on journeying to the transcendental realm laden with all the superstitions and mat judgment of this world, who are anxious to export their sense-ridden logic to the transcendental realm, who choose to imagine that in the realm that lies beyond this world there can be any scope for the unavoidable slave mentality of this world or any form of service which is in any way characterised by the factors of unwholesomeness of this world, are fully as stupid as the foolish boat-man of the story. The function of the servant that prevails in the realm of the Absolute—the servitude of the soul in the state of freedom from the fetters of material bondage—is the natural condition of the soul i. e. perfect subordination to his own proper nature (swadhinata). By such servitude even Unconquerable Godhead Himself is subdued—the Supreme Lord of all lords is purchased.

Sree Nrisinghadeva

The Manifestations of Vishnu cannot be numbered. Each of them has distinctive Functions which should not be confounded with those of the Others. None of Them must be supposed to be inferior or superior to Another. None of Them is less than Divine. There is no applicability of the principle of disruptive divisibility either of Function or of Personality to Vishnu or in regard to His Divine constituents. Those, therefore, who choose to display any want, or discrimination in the degree, of regard towards any of the Manifestations of the Divinity, commit a grave offence and display utter ignorance of the real Nature of the Divinity by confounding Him with a narrow fiction of their depraved imaginations.

It is, however, no offence to recognize the distinctive nature of the Personality and Functions of the different Divine Manifestations. The view that there can be no distinctiveness in Godhead as regards either activity or personality ignores the absolute Nature of the Divinity who comprehends, both individually as well as collectively, every entity and, at the same time, maintains His Absolute aloofness from all of them in His Own Proper Personality and his infinite plenary and secondary Manifestations.

As a matter of fact it is only the unreserved serving aptitude of the perfectly pure soul that is eligible to function on the plane of the Absolute without being troubled by disruptive discriminations on the one hand and denial of all distinctiveness of the Divine Function on the other.

Sree Nrisinghadeva performs the Divine Function of protecting the Devotee of Godhead and punishing his persecutors. This Function is performed in a way that is wholly incomprehensible to the expectations of the persecutors themselves. In their confusion those who happen to undergo the Divine punishment are only impressed with the most terrible form of an unintelligible manifestation. The devotee is privileged to find the true and perfectly benign nature of the process and of the Personality of the Punisher. This Function as well as this distinctive Divine Personality are not a passing affair. Both of them are eternal and there is a specific realm where Sri Nrisinghadeva is eternally served by His devotees.

Sree Nrisinghadeva graciously made His Appearance in this world, that is to say to the actual view of unbelievers, at a very early stage in the evolution of the theistic consciousness of the human race. He has been described as the fourth of the Avataras of Vishnu. He appeared as the protector of the great devotee of Godhead, Sree Prahlad Maharaj from the persecutions of his demon-father Hiranyakashipu who was slain by Sree Nrisinghadeva.

The beginning of devotion is attended by the manifestation of the causeless mercy of Sree Nrisinghadeva exemplified in the conduct of Sree Prahlad Maharaj. The boy Prahlada is perfectly fearless and is distinguished by the quality of speaking the truth under all circumstances from his very childhood. He does not brag of his bravery. Such bragging would be hypocrisy for one who is perfectly aware that he is the protected of the Lord. He is only anxious to act up to his great opportunity of preaching the unalloyed truth in the most uncongenial circumstances humanly conceivable in the only manner in which it will command attention viz. by the direct method of blunt unconcern for personal consequences.

The martyr for religion is one of the trite characters, who has been unduly lauded to the skies by persons who have no idea of true devotion. It is time that the so-called martyr for religion need go out of the theistic literature of the world for good. Let there be martyrs for all other causes. But religion does not require any martyrs or any sacrifice on the part of any person. This is so for the simple reason that he is the only person who is in a position to understand that every thing in the scheme of Providence is a contrivance for his protection.

A child can be infinitely more fearless, and naturally, than the bravest warriors and heroes of this world, if he obtains the mercy of Sri Nrisinghadeva. It is not altogether inconceivable to admit the possibility of the eternal existence of a happy realm where this mercy is enjoyed by every one of its denizens. It is also perfectly admissible that such a state of things would be incompatible with one of the interests that we are so anxious to promote (?) by our futile efforts. But it is not given to our poor understanding to apprehend how such conduct would be feasible on this mundane plane. The conduct of Prahlada would seem to be opposed to all our most cherished interests and the methods intended for securing them. It is likely to be voted as chimerical and mischievous and there is every possibility of its turning out a real nuisance if the attempt to imitate the conduct of Prahlada is made by a person who has no access to the plane of Divine service.

But it would not be less foolish to pay no heed to the teachings of Sri Prahlada Maharaj on the ground that it is not applicable to a hypocrite like myself. It would be both foolish and wicked to condemn the conduct of a pure devotee of Sri Nrisinghadeva, for the deliberate failures of fettered souls. This argument will not of course help to establish the claim of any particular individual to the status of a pure devotee of Sri Nrisinghadeva. The pure devotee is a substantive reality in the only sense of that term. His existence cannot be challenged any more than the existence of a piece of stone. Nay the existence of the devotee is rightly claimed to be the substantive reality itself of which the mundane stone is only a perverted reflection. The function of the devotee is also correspondingly more real than any form of mundane activity and is, therefore, not obstructible by any so-called adverse mundane circumstance. As a matter of fact there can be no adverse circumstance on the plane of the spiritual function.

There are persons who may be disposed to assent to the principle of the above facts but who withhold their complete consent to the point of personal participation in the ritualistic worship of Sri Nrisinghadeva as laid down in the Scriptures. This objection to ritual takes one of two forms. The objection may be either to mechanicality, or to the form of concrete external symbols as representing the object or offerings of worship. Those who are disposed to confound the Holy form of the Divinity revealed to our view by the sadhus in pursuance of the Scriptures, with idols made by man, may be regarded as opposed to all worship on principle. Because the charge will be brought against all forms of worship if one is definitely disposed to be sceptical regarding the possibility of revelation. This would be also opposed to the rational principle itself and one may be pardoned if one refuses to consider further the opposition of such irrational atheists.

The objection of mechanicality deserves the most careful consideration at the hands of all persons who are not prepared to be deprived of the proper use of their rational faculty. The whole issue of genuineness of worship depends practically on the personality of the worshipper. It is our contention based on Shastric as well as rationalistic considerations that unless the worshipper has access to the transcendental plane no genuine worship of the Absolute person is possible. The sadhu is such a person. The sadhu is identical with the individual soul in the natural state of perfect freedom from the domination of the limiting power. It is the possible nay the only and paramount, duty of every person to seek to attain to the purely spiritual state. This is a duty which every individual owes to his own proper self. This state of free spiritual existence is not attainable by any method devised by the limited understanding of man, as it is at present. He, therefore, requires help from a transcendental source. The genuine sadhu is such a source. He alone can, therefore, devise any system of genuine worship for the conditioned soul. This help is also in accordance with the teachings of the Scriptures.

If we try to follow the Scriptures by our own limited and fallible understanding we are bound to be turned into either an irrational fanatic or an irrational sceptic or a malicious atheist. But neither can any of us avoid the duty of following the Scriptures under the absolute guidance of real sadhus without turning into the enemies of pure devotees like Sri

The Thirty-seventh Annual Session of Shree Shree Nabadwip Dham Pracharini Sabha.

(Held at the Natyamandir of Mahayogapeetha of Sreedham Mayapur on March 5, 1931).

On the proposal of Pandit Kaviraj Srijukta Sachindra Chandra Chakravarty Sudarsan-Vachaspati Kavya-Vyakarana-Sankhya Vedanta-Saradarshana-Tirtha, seconded by Rai Sahib Sreejukta Akshay Kumar Gupta, Paramahansa Paribrajakacharya Shree Shreemad Bhakti Sidhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj was unanimously elected president and was pleased to grace the chair. This was followed by a Kirtan-song sung by Sripad Ananta Vasudev Para-vidyabhusan, B. A. The piece selected was a composition of Thakur Bhaktivinode (কবে হবে বল সে দিন আমার...). The President then read a telegraphic message from the Secretary of the Sabha, Rajarshi Kumar Saradindu Narayan Rai Vedantabhusan, M.A., Prajna, regretting his inability to be present at the meeting of the Sabha. The President thereupon requested Sripad Sundaranand Vidyavinode to read the report of the last session of the Sabha in the unavoidable absence of the Secretary. The report was duly read and adopted. On the proposal of His Holiness Shreemad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj, seconded by Sreejukta Biraj Mohan Dey, Bhaktibhusan, proprietor of the Dacca Monomohan Press, the following gentlemen were unanimously elected additional members of the executive Committee of Sridham Pracharini Sabha, viz. :—(1) Srijukta Advaita Prasad Dey, M.A., B.L., retired Sub-Judge, (2) Srijukta Ganesh Chandra De, retired Superintendent of Industries settled at Allahbad, (3) Sripad Haripada Mandal, B. Sc. Demonostrator of Physics, A.M. College, Mymensingh, (4) Sreejukta Balkissen Khemka of Calcutta (5) Sreejukta

Jitendra Nath Mukhopadhyaya of Dacca and (6) Sreejukta Nibaran Chandra Bhar, Merchant of Calcutta. On a motion from the Chair the Sabha expressed its sense of severance from their edifying association at the departure from this world of the following friends who had been working strenuously for the fulfilment of the Heart's desire of Sree Gauranga, viz :— (1) Sresthyarya Sreela Jagabandhu Bhaktiranjan (2) Sreepad Kalibairi Vedantabhusan, (3) Brahmachari Sree Trailokya Nath, (4) Brahmachary Sree Radhakanta, (5) Dasadhikari Sree Abhayacharanarabinda, (6) Krishnakanti Babaji

The following gentlemen were formally thanked on behalf of the Sabha for their loyal services rendered during the year under report for ministering to the pleasure of Sree Gauranga :—Acharyapad Kunja Behari Vidyabhusan ; Tridandiswami Bhakti Hridaya Bon Maharaj ; Sreepad Atul Chandra Bandyopadhyaya Bhaktisaranga Goswami, Bhaktisastri ; Sreejukta Sakhi Charan Roy Bhaktibijoy ; Srijukta Birajmohan Dey Bhaktibhusan ; the two widows of Sresthyarya Jagabandhu Bhaktiranjan ; Professor Sripad Narayandas Bhktisastri Bhaktisudhakar, M. The following gentlemen were awarded the blessings of Sree Gauranga in the shape of Titles, by the President on behalf of the Sabha in recognition of their services :—

The Title of Vedanta-bhusan was awarded to Kumar Bahadur Rajarshi Rao Saheb Sreejukta Saradindu Narayan Ray, M.A., Prajna of Dinajpur; the Title of Gauranghrirenu to M.R.Ry P. N. Sankar Narayan Aiyar, B.A., B.L. Avargal of Madras; the Title of Bhaktibhusan to Sreejukta Biraj Mohan De, proprietor, Monomohan Press, Dacca; the Title of Bhaktyashrama to Sreejukta Jitendra Nath Mukhopadhya of Dacca; the Title of Kalakovida to Sreejukta Manindra Chandra Acharya.

Medals were awarded to the following persons in recognition of their skilled service :—

'Sasthi Devi Medal' and books of devotion were awarded to Sreejukta Aparna Devi of Dacca, Faridabad, for standing first in order of merit in an essay competition on the 'relative positions of the karmin and bhakta.'

Sreejukta Dayamayee Devi of Coochbihar was awarded devotional books as second prize on the result of the above examination.

Professor Sripal Yadubar Dasadhikari Bhaktisastri M.A., B.L. was declared as having won the Bhaktivinode Medal for having stood first in order of merit in the Bhaktisastri examination held in 1930.

A Talk with a Maulvi

Again the Vedic sonhood-conception of Godhead stages love on a still higher pedestal. In all the stages enumerated above love is controlled by fear of punishment and hope of reward. If you do not do what you are commanded to do then you are thrown into the hell or Dojak; and if you do what you are commanded to do, then you are raised to the heaven or behest. In the hell the unbelievers along with stones are made the fuel of the fire. (Ch. II, 24—Quran). In the heaven the belivers will have gardens abounding in beautiful rivers, and young girls for their wives. (Ch. II, 25—Quran). These mark the initial stage in the service of Godhead. The real service does not manifest at this stage. Fear of punishment and hope of reward simply keep the servant on the way. He refrains from doing wrong, and that is all. What little service he attempts to do in this stage is, therefore, as yet hardly spontaneous. And he does so more for his own ease than for the pleasure of his Lord. In Nanda's affection for Krishna there is no self-seeking and there cannot be any self-seeking. The love in this stage is spontaneous, and the element of fear that naturally arises from the idea of greatness of the object of love being entirely absent in this stage, love expresses itself unchecked and fully. Again the father having nothing to fear or hope from his son his service is spontaneous and most disinterested. He takes every care of his Lord, but expects none from Him in return. He must serve Him. It does not matter whether he is put in the hell or in the heaven. He serves Him, that is all. Such complete service is not possible unless the Lord be made to hold a position much inferior to that of His servant. It is a singular triumph for the servant, a singular triumph for love which Godhead, to please His servant, comes down to such a level to accept.

There is one Nanda but also innumerable souls who are privileged to serve Nanda. Whoever attains such a spiritual height is enlightened regarding the real nature of the love of Nanda for his son and is privileged to experience actual fatherly affection for Krishna without identifying himself with Nanda or Yashoda. There are innumerable persons sharing the love of Nanda for Godhead, as counterparts of Nanda in that spiritual plane which has been designated in our Scriptures as Brajadham. Even here on earth there may be persons who have attained to the sight of Godhead as son of Nanda. Godhead appears before their minds in the figure of the beloved son of Nanda, the beautiful pastoral Lad Krishna.

When Krishna chooses to manifest Himself on earth, He is ever born in the household of Nanda or Vasudeva. But it is a mistake to suppose that He is born in the physical sense of the term. No earthly womb can bear Him. But that He appears to be born is not also mere hallucination. We see what is really a Divine Event. Actually we do not know the ways of Godhead, as they really are and we cannot know them except by His Grace. Being born He is not born in the worldly sense and being born He dies not. In the Geeta Krishna says, 'My Birth and Actions connected therewith are all transcendental. Those who know them what they in reality are come to Me. Fools hold that I was formless but have recently assumed this Form. They do not know that I, in this Form, eternally exist. I simply manifest My Form on this earth. And this I can do.'

Godhead does not come down in the human form only to allow his servants to hold communion with Him. Those who are capable of holding communion with Godhead, will see Him in His Own Form whether He comes down on this earth or remains beyond the ken of mortals in His eternal abode of Vaikuntha. Krishna may also be moving among us in His Own Divine Form yet we may not hold any communion with Him. Not endowed with spiritual sight, we will not know that He, in that form, is fully Divine. So, seeing Him, we see Him not. This is due to Maya or the power of illusion that He exercises upon the bound souls.

M.—I say, don't you put some limitations on Him, when you give Him a form and locate Him in a particular place?

I.—On the contrary we bring Him under limitation when we deny Him a form. We can neither give Him a form nor can deny Him any. In both cases we shall be guilty of mental speculation. Godhead is what He is, and not what we want to take Him. If He has a Form we must not deny it, and if He has not, then we must not create any. In the Scriptures He has been revealed with a Form. His is certainly a transcendental Form, made of the same elements of which He is made and unlike our body which is different from our soul. He and His Form are one, an indivisible whole. Not only He but all the angels that live with Him, have such a form. In the Bible we find, Godhead has created man after His own Image. This shows that Godhead has human Form. But in this Form He is also Omnipresent.

M.—It is very difficult to believe that He appears to His devotees in a particular form. It may be hallucination as well.

I.—It may not also be so. Do you mean to say that Hazrat Muhammad was under hallucination, when He heard Gebriel talking to Him, when he saw 'Nur Elahi' (light of Godhead) and fainted? Were the twelve disciples of Christ under hallucination, when they saw Christ, felt Him, talked with Him after His resurrection? Were Moses, Aaron, Abraham and many others of the Old Testament under hallucination when they heard Godhead talking from a veil of cloud? If Muhammad could see 'Nur Elahi' Nanda and others could see Krishna in the 'Nur Elahi.' If you believe in one place you should believe in another. If ear has heard Him, eye has also seen Him. Of course He is not to be perceived by this eye or this ear. We will have to acquire other eyes and other ears. We must not adopt grapes-are-sour argument in our spiritual investigation.

Again it is not the question of our perceiving Him, but it is the question of His allowing us to perceive Him. We must remain contented with that much perception of Him as much He, out of His overwhelming mercy, allows us to have. Therefore, stop where you are, but do not say, thus far and no farther.

Now with regard to the question of Brahma and Siva sharing in godly virtues, our Scriptures do not set them up as Krishna's equals. They are agents of Him. You also believe in the existence of a host of angels as his agents. Brahma and Siva are nothing but angels possessing varying measures of the Divine Potency. They carry out His mandates, but do not, and cannot initiate a new policy in their respective spheres of activities. The supreme Lord Krishna delegates certain powers to them to enable them to discharge their duties. Those Jivas of one creation who are found spiritually fittest, are appointed as Brahma and Siva in the next creation after dissolution. Then what is the harm of believing in the existence of such a class of Jivas with exceptional abilities to do the will of their Lord ? Every one of the angels exercises in a more or less extent, godly powers. Moses, Christ, Muhammad are supposed to have exercised them.

M.—That's a torture upon faith.

I.—Aye, it is so. "We shall go by faith and not by sight." Verification of spiritual facts is impossible on the material plane of consciousness. On the spiritual plane of consciousness they are seen as they are believed. So long as we are not endowed with spiritual vision, we must accept them as they are represented to us. We would believe what is revealed to us and we would believe what is not revealed to us. Torture on faith is everywhere. If we put up with it in one place we must put up with it in another.

M.—We have a reason. Shall we not exercise it ?

I.—We have; but how far can we trust it ? Can we bring our intellect to bear upon a realm where it cannot go ? The conditioned souls must have Divine light to guide them. Muhammad is reported to have said to his writers, "Write what I tell you to write, but don't write what I say" and why ? Because human reasoning is defective, but Divine reasoning is not so.

Now with regard to respect for creatures of a lower order the Vedas are ahead of all. They want us to have respect for all of them, for they are also souls enmeshed in different physical forms. The Quran in one place tells us to practise pure diet. But it is doubtful if it excludes meat and fish. Probably Mahammad advises His followers to take them as Halal or pure food. Blood, according to Lord Chaitanya, is an impure food, and it must, on no account, under any pretext be taken as food. Such a diet by justifying malice in a palpable form, incapacitates the consumer for spiritual thinking.

M.—Thanks. I am getting late. I am very glad to have a talk with you. I have not made any comparative study of different religions. We shall meet another day. Now, one thing. Do all Hindus interpret the Vedas like you ?

I.—You can't say if all Muhammadans think like you. A true Hindu, a sincere follower of the Vedas, must think in the proper way. I thank you for the opportunity you have afforded me to serve you. I shall be always at your service. Good bye.

MIDDLE PART

38 'Krishna is father of the world, Krishna is life,
Serve with a firm purpose, my Dear, the Feet of Krishna.

39 On hearing these words of blessing the Lord felt very happy.
The Lord, lifting up His beautiful face, looked them in the face.

40 'You do tell the truth by your blessings.
Why would you give any other favour ?

41 'You alone may bestow the loving service of Krishna.
Krishna is kind to one who serves His servant.

42 'You, indeed, teach Me My duty to Vishnu.
This proves to Me that I must have performed before now the best of deeds

43 'I can have devotion to Krishna only by serving all of you.
So saying the Lord clasped the feet of some of them on the spot.

44 He wrung out with care the water from the wet clothing of some,
Took to some with His own Hands their wearihg clothes.

45 The Lord put into the hands of some the Kusa grass and the earth of the Ganges.
On other days, carrying their baskets of flowers, He accompanied some to their homes.
46 All those Vaishnavas exhorted Him to stop with their cries of anguish,
'What are all these that thou do'st ?'
Yet Biswambhar did it.
47 In this manner daily Lord Biswambhar Himself did loyally the biddings of His own servants.
48 What service of His servant is there that the Lord does not do ?
The Lord abdicates His own proper function for the sake of His servant.
49 'Krishna is the best of friends of all,'
say all the Scriptures.
Whence no one is an object of malice or indifference to Krishna.
50 Even this quality Krishna gives up for the sake of His devotee.
The annihilation of the family of Duryyodhana bears witness to this.
51 It is the nature of His devotee to serve
Krishna.
All the Doings of Krishna are for the sake of His devotees
52 The devotee can barter away Krishna by the sweet quality of devotion.
Witness Satyabhama at the time of His residence at Dwaraka.
53 The self-same Lord Gauranga-Sundara
Biswambhar,
Abode in this hidden manner within Nabadwipa.
54 No one could recognise his own Lord,
Even of those for whom the Lord manifested His appearance.
55 Who cherishes the desire of serving
Krishna
Let him even serve the embodiment of all blessing, the loved servant of Krishna.
56 Gaurchandra, Godhead Himself, taught this to all
By serving the Vaishnavas Himself.
57 He carried their flower-baskets, clothes without feeling ashamed.
The Vaishnavas with reverance caught hold of His Hands to dissuade.
58 Observing the humility of Biswambhar
the devotees
Blessed at all time in undisguised fashion.
59 'Serve Krishna with devotion, recollect
Krishna, hear the Name of Krishna,
May Krishna be the Life, Teasure,
Breath of all.'
60 'Say, Oh, do say, 'Krishna', be the servant of Krishna
May Krishna manifest His appearance in Thy heart.
61 May nothing else save Krishna manifest itself to Thee.
May the sorrows of all of us be dispelled
by Thee.
62 'All those wretched people who laugh at Kirtan
May those be made to dive in the liquid mellowness of Krishna by Thee.
63 'As Thou triumphed over all the world by knowledge of the Scriptures
Even so may Thou subdue the wicked by Thy devoted service of Krishna.
64 'May all of us by Thy Grace Sing Krishna with joy and dance with ecstasy,'
65 The devotees laying their hands on the Body of the Lord
Blessed by submitting to Him their sorrows.

66 'In this Nabadwip, my Dear, all the teachers
Are dumb in praising devotion to Krishna.
67 'Whether it be Sannyasi, ascetic, the whole body of the well-informed—
All those great personages that so abound in Nabadwip—
68 'No one of them, Dear, extols the Kirtan of Krishna,
Neither does explain ; but, on the contrary, constantly maligns,
69 'All the sinful hearers catch up those words.
No one deems us even as the equal of a straw.
70 'Intense sorrow, Dear, burns up the frames of us all
By not hearing the Kirtan of Krishna anywhere.
71 'Now at last Krishna is propitious to all,—
So He has admitted thee to this Path.
72 'From Thee will ensue the decline of the wicked,
We have felt this as certain in our minds.
73 'May Thou live for ever, take the Name of Krishna !
May the infinite Excellences of Krishna become manifest by Thee
74 The Lord received the blessing of the devotees on His Head.
By the blessing of the devotees verily devotion to Krishna is aroused.
75 Hearing the griefs of the devotees, Lord Biswambhar
Was moved in His heart to manifest Himself in a short time.
76 The Lord said, You are all beloved of Krishna.
Only that which you say must surely happen.
77 'Worthy of all praise is My Life as you say it is good,
If you commend Death cannot devour.
78 'Waste no thought on the atheists worthy of contempt.'
With an easy mind practise the chant of Krishna-chandra.'
79 The Lord can never bear the griefs of His devotee.
Krishna comes down to all places for the sake of His devotee.
80 'It is the time, Me-thinks, when ye will bring down Krishna-chandra ;
Ye will cause the joy of Vaikuntha to appear in Nabadwip.
81 'It is by you all that the world will be delivered:
Ye will bring about the Descent of Krishna.
82 'May all of you recognise Me as your servant.
I pray for this boon, 'May ye never forsake Me.'
83 Biswambhar took the dust of the feet of all.
All blessed Him in manifold ways.
84 All of them bathed in the Ganges and turned homeward ;
And the Lord also did the same, laughing internally.
85 As thus the Lord Himself heard of the griefs of His devotees
His wrath against the atheists waxed strong.
86 'I will destroy all', He thundered ;
'I am Himself ; I, indeed, am He', He said repeatedly.
87 At times He laughed, often cried and repeatedly swooned away.
At times at sight of Lakshmi He ran to beat her.

88 Thus was the Lord pervaded by the loving mood of the Vaishnava :
Sachi did not understand, thinking it to be some form of malady.

89 Sachi knew nothing except to love her Son ;
She narrated to every one the behaviour of Biswambhar.

90 'Providence took my husband, took away my sons also ;
There is only One remaining, of all of them.

91 'I cannot make out what even He has in mind ;
He laughs at times, often cries and frequently gets into a swoon.

92 'He mutters inaudibly unto Himself ;
Often exclaims crying 'Tear off the heads of the atheists'.

93 'At some moment He climbs to the topmost branch of the tree ;
Does not open His Eyes and often falls prone on the ground.

94 'He gnashes His Teeth tucks up His loincloth in the fashion of a wrestler, Rolls on she ground and can utter no word'.

95 The people had never seen nor heard of perturbations for Krishna.
Thinking it was madness they said that
He might be bound.

96 Those who came to see, on hearing from Sachi,
Departed laughing, supposing it was all due to insanity.

97 With tender concern they led off the mother ;
The people told her, 'It is the old madness that has reappeared'.
Some said, 'Lady, you are so ignorant.
Why do you want to ask about His condition any more ?

99 'The madness of His former days has again taken possession of His Body.
Keep Him within the house with both
His Feet fast bound.

100 'Let Him have the water of the green
cocoanut for drink,
Till the nervous malady that breeds madness no longer grows in strength.'

101 Some said, 'What can so weak medicine avail in this ?
It is only by application of the medicated fat of the jackal that such madness may heal.

102 'Get him to bathe by applying medicated oil which has been properly boiled,
Till the strength of the disease is found to have abated.'

103 Most generously disposed was Sachi, mother of the world.
She also spoke as she heard the people say.

104 The mother was distracted by anxiety, did not understand anything.
She threw herself on the protection of Govinda, in body, mind and speech.

105 To Sribas and the other Vaishnavas,— individually to each,— Sachi submitted everything by sending out persons to tell them about it all.

106 One day Sribas Pandit made his way thither.
On seeing him the Lord stood up and made obeisance with due care.

107 At sight of His devotee the mood of the servant grew strong in the Lord, Horripilation, shedding of tears, shivering—reciprocative of love.

108 The Lord had been circumambulating the tulasi
The Lord fainted instantly at the sight of His d

109 After a while, on regaining external consciousness, He began to weep.
He shivered violently and could never be quiet.

110 On beholding this wonderful sight
Sribas thought within himself,
'This is the highest state of devotion ;—
who calls it madness ?

111 On gaining His external consciousness
the Lord said to the Pandit,
'Pandit, what do you think of these ways
of Mine ?

112 'Some say it is stark madness and advise that I may be bound ;
Pandit, what do you think of Me at heart ?'

113 Sribas Pandit smiled as he said, Madness, indeed !
The same madness that is yours I stand in need myself.

114 'It is the highest devotional manifestation that I behold in Thy body ;
Sri Krishna's favour has been bestowed on Thee !'

115 As soon as He heard this from the mouth of Sribas
The Lord clasped Sribas to His Bosom with great happiness.

116 'All say it is madness, you alone have properly assured Me ;
I am, indeed, much obliged to you this
day.

117 'If you had told Me to-day that it seems to you to be the malady,
I would have this very day entered the waters of the Ganges.'

118 Said Sribas, 'The manifestation of devotion that I behold in Thee—
This high treasure—is coveted by Brahma,
Shiva, Sanaka and all high souls.

119 'All of us shall perform the kirtan together in the same place, Whatever all the atheist sinners may say to the contrary.'

120 Srinibas then said these words to Sachi,
'Cancel all the griefs of your heart.

Opening of Thakur Bhaktivinode Institute—April 3

Thakur Bhaktivinode Institute teaching up to the Matriculation standard of the Calcutta University with provisions for the residence of students, was declared open by Paramahansa Paribrajakacharyya Sri Srimat Bhaktisiddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj on Good Friday, the 3rd. April, 1931 before a distinguished gathering of gentlemen hailing from far and nea... The Institute is located at Sreedham thin the compound of the Maha-yogapitha (site of advent of Lord Sri Chaitanya) in the most picturesque and healthy surroundings. The substance of the speech delivered on this occasion explaining the object of the Institution, has already appeared in the Gaudiya of April 11. We have a mind to incorporate its English version in a later issue of this journal. The policy of purely secular education to which the modern Universities are steadily drifting, only makes worse the evil which it intends to cure. The real cure of sectarianism can be found in the provision of religious education under the supervision of bonafide teachers of the principles of the universal function of the soul. No one can be a bonafide teacher of the soul, who does not himself lead in all sincerity a perfectly pure and non-sectarian life. There is necessity for an Institution for teaching the Truth Absolute by really competent teachers. Such teaching does not stand in the way of any real interest of individual or society. Thakur Bhaktivinode has demonstrated in his works that it is the teaching of Sri Chaitanya that the Scriptures do not require us either to be thoughtlessly engrossed in the temporary affairs of this world or to neglect them in any way. It is possible for and incumbent on every one to perform all secular duties in conformity with the universal serving aptitude of the pure soul. Thakur Bhaktivinode Institute stands for this substantive spiritual culture as being not only practicable but necessary as providing the real remedy of all the evils of the Age. Srijut Bipin Bihari Bandyopadhyaya, B. A., B. T., Headmaster of the Ranaghat H. E. School in a nicely worded address expressed reasoned appreciation of the educational policy put before them by the Presidential speech.

Sreedham Mayapur

Excavation of Nitai Kunda :—

At the desire of Paramahansa Paribrajakacharyya Sri Srimat Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj the work of excavation of the Nitai Kunda (Nitai's Pool) measuring 200 feet square, was begun on the 6th of April. Nitai's Pool adjoins Gaur Kunda and is situated to the east of the latter.

Sri Advaita Temple and Arch :—The foundation-stone of Sri Advaita-Temple was laid by Srila Paramahansa Thakur last year. The donor Shree Saranagata Dasadhikari (Indra Narayan Chandra), Bhaktibhusan has been pushing on the construction of the Temple and Gateway and has also expressed a desire for extending the Dharmasala already built by him at Sreedham Mayapur.

Sree Rashbehari Dharmasala :—This handsome building has been completed. It stands close to the site of the residence of Sree Advaitacharyya. We congratulate the donor Srijukta Rashbihari Dasadhikari on its speedy and successful completion.

His Excellency the Governor of Bengal's sympathy for the Mission:—His Excellency Colonel the Right Hon'ble Sir Francis Stanley Jackson P. C., G. C. I. E, Governor of Bengal was pleased to grant an interview of over forty minutes at Darjeeling on the 21st, April, 1931. to Sreepad Atul Chandra Bandyopadhayya Goswami Bhaktisaranga Bhaktisastri, Secretary of the Viswa-Vaishnava-Raj-Sabha. His Excellency expressed his sympathetic interest in all the activities of the Mission and a desire to visit Sreedham Mayapur and the Gaudiya Math at Calcutta and also enquired about the newly-established Thakur Bhaktivinode Institute. Srimat Bhaktisaranga Goswami Prabhu then formally presented the following devotional publications of the Gaudiya Math to His Excellency:—Life and precepts of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu by Thakur Bhaktivinode, Sri Chaitanya Charitamrita, Jaiva Dharma in Bengali by Thakur Bhaktivinode, English translation of Sri Chaitanya Bhagabat, Part I, Erotic principle and unalloyed devotion, Vaishnavism, Chitra Nabadwip compiled by Rajarshi Kumar Srila Saradindunarayan Rai, M. A., Prajna. His Excellency expressed his pleasure in accepting the works presented to him and his intention of having the Bengali works translated into English and preserving the books in his library. His Excellency listened with attention to the account of the propaganda of the religion preached by Sri Chaitanya that is being carried on by the Biswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha narrated by Srimat Bhaktisaranga Goswami Prabhu.

Annual Mahotsab of Shree Purusotham Math, Puri, 21st April—27th July

The Annual celebration of Shree Purusottam Math Puri, will commence from the 21st, of April and will continue till the 27th of July. The annual celebrations of Shree Brahma Gaudiya Math at Alalnath will take place during the period of anabasara. The 17th Anniversary of the disappearance of Thakur Bhaktivinode will be celebrated on the 16th of June, 1931.

Restoration of the Temple of Sri Alalnath

The work of constuction has been recommenced after a short lull when the work had to be suspended for want of funds. Srijukta Paramananda Brahmachari Vidyaratna, Shree Purusottam Math, Puri, has issued an earnest appeal to the public for sending to his address their contributions to enable him to carry on the work of restoration without further stoppage. By the active exertions of Srijukta Jagannath Misra, Vice-Chairman of Puri District Board, the work of improving the road from Puri to Alalnath has been taken up in earnest and it is hoped that the road will be practicable for Motor traffic in course of a couple of years.

Celebration at Madras Gaudiya Math—May, 7

The festival in honour of the disappearance of Rai Ramananda was celebrated at the Madras Gaudiya Math on the 9th of May, 1931. Speeches were delivered in Hindi, Tamil and English respectively, preceded and followed by the performance of the congregational chant (Sankirtan). All present stayed to honour the mahaprasad.

Propaganda.

At Darjeeling

His Holiness Srimad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj delivered a most instructive and learned lecture on 'Sanatan Dharma' on Sunday the 26th of April, in the evening, at the Nripendranarayan Hindu Public Hall, lasting for over two hours. The function was presided over by the Hon'ble Lieutenant Srijukta Bijoyprasad Singha Rai, M. A., B. L., Minister of Local Self-Government, Bengal.

Paramahansa Paribrajakacharyya Srimat Bhakti-Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj attended by a party of his followers started from Calcutta on the 3rd of May (1931) on a tour of propaganda to Darjeeling arriving there at 11 o'clock next day. Paramahansa Thakur availed of the hospitality of Dr. Sisir Kumar Pal, Superintendent of Lowis Jubilee Sanitarium, who placed his beautiful residential quarters at His disposal during His stay at Darjeeling. Srila Paramahansa Thakur removed to the Augusta Villa on the 7th which was offered for His residence by H.H. Maharani Regent Saheba of Cooch Bihar The discourses delivered by Srila Paramhansa Thakur in answer to the queries of visitors, are being published in the Gaudiya. His Divine Grace returned to Calcutta on the 19th of May.

In the Madras Presidency.

Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhaktiranjan Sar Maharaj went to Tirupati on a tour of propaganda of the teachings of Shree Chaitanya.

The devotees of the Madras Gaudiya Math discoursed on the teachings of Shree Chaitanya at 'Gauranga-Samaj,' in the Kamaleswarampet quarter of Madras City, on the 8th of May, 1931, before a large and representative gathering of the public. The function was organised by Mr. Bijayaratnam Pillai.

Disappearance from this world

Brahmachari Shree Jogendraji of the Gaudiya Mission, who belonged originally to the Province of Assam, left this world on the 4th of April, after providing the bright example of a life dedicated to the exclusive service of the Supreme Lord from an early age and thereby attaining, within such a short period, the highest fulfilment of the only object of human life. Those who are accustomed to measure the worth of a life by the amount of noise that it makes in the world among those who have no idea of spiritual living by actual experience of the same, are apt to sadly under-estimate the value of the unobstrusive life of a pure soul devoting himself to the causeless service of Godhead under the unconditional direction of the genuine Spiritual Guide. Such a life may even appear to them to be one of slavish, unintellectual drudgery. But a self-realised soul always functions on the plane of perfect activity to which the pedants of this world have no access. Brhmachari Sri Jogendraji will continue to influence the world for the better for all time through every pure soul who has had the good fortune of coming in personal contact with him. The Gaudiya Math is shorn of one shining star from the galaxy of the servants of the Lord by the departure of this pure, serving, soul who is apparently so utterly unknown to fame.

The Forgetfulness of the Humanists

By Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati

The Fountain-head of all eternal and temporary manifestations is confined in Sree Krishna alone. The non-absolute phases are emanations from a particular potency whose analytical distributions are known as gunas or qualities. In the factor of time, they are branded as past, present and future and their material representations have three characteristics viz. evolution, sustenance and dissolution. The Fountain-head is Absolute and His borderland emanations are absolute infinitesimals, though they are recognised in the same qualities. Their quantitative reference is then considered as apart from the Absolute, but swayed by a quality and their special characteristic is that the infinitesimal bearing should not be confused with the Infinitude.

The resources of manifestive nature have their common origin in the absolute existence of the Fountain-head. The delegation of the power of the Absolute Infinity is traced in the spirit and the matter. The family of qualitative temporal representations possesses numerous isolated entities and so the absolute infinitesimals are grouped together in magnitudinal difference from the Fountain-head.

The present human figure or the figure of a member of the Zoo or of one of the family of phytographic species has got a restrictive and depending position and it is liable to change in the shape of growth and deterioration. The eternal nature of the absolute-infinitesimals is spirit and takes the initiative ; whereas, the difference of quality cannot show the power of taking initiative, similar to that of living entities.

The two potencies possessed by the Fountain-head are known as spiritual and material. The frame of the living should never be confused with the life itself. So there is a broad distinction of aspects between the two families of spirit and matter. The predominating phase is exercised in the material atmosphere which is liable to be controlled by animation. The animal world differs from materialistic structure, though it is endowed with a material association in its outward appearance.

We may often distinguish between a living body and a dead one. The generative advent has a smaller beginning to undergo development and growth and the elimination of the life principle from the structure itself has got different denominations.

In the Semitic thought we do not find any metensomatosistic speculation; so they are prone to consider the spirit as a composition of chanced incident, and this material combination as the starting point of the souls. So these thoughts are opposed to the theory inculcated by the conception of seelanwanderung or metempsychosis. The spiritistic view is quite different from the idea of material congregation which is wrongly considered as the composition of the eternal soul. On the other hand, the non-Semitic thoughts make a departure from the Semitic ideas of non-transmigrating accidental composition.

The explanation of the different methods of the two bearings—the tabarnacle and the inner temporal animating entity—can lead us to a differing element in the transcendental entity, beyond our sensuous conception when we bring into consideration the true eternal position of the absolute infinitesimals, by following the analogy of wrapping the entity by two kinds of garments covering the same as incorporations. The covers, though foreign, are amalgamated to create a confusion of their natural isolated position.

Portions of matter, in the factor of time, are liable to change. But the substratum—the spirit—is not obliged to undergo transformation like the foreign parts attached to the same by conventional practices. The very theory is explained in other words by the encountering attitude of a different potentia of the Fountain-head to effect the conversion by means of temporary decorations. The exercising function of the spirit is more or less impeded by the counteracting agency of a different potency of the Absolute. So the susceptibility of being attacked is an inevitable element in the spirit infinitesimal which is different from the spiritual Infinite.

Conversion in or mixing with the temporary material dust should not and cannot disable or disfigure the Spirit Infinity, as the value of spirits infinitesimals should not and could not be identical with the Fountain-head and His emanation, just like a particular pencil of ray should not be misconceived as the glowing disc from which the rays come. The Absolute Fountain-head of spirit should not to be considered to slumber like absolute infinitesimals who are subject to the other potentia of the Absolute.

The nature of the spirits of borderland potency of the Fountain-head need not be affirmed with the objective knowledge of the mixed up conception. The nature of the Absolute Infinite should not be standerdised in the same line as His infinitesimals. The spirits are observed in two different stages; whereas, the eternal Fountain-head of all spirits has no bifurcation. The Absolute Infinite cannot be expected to be accommodated in the finite reference of phenomena which have limiting merits.

The Fountain-head alone has the reservation of Ubiquity; whereas, all ubiquitous aspects are wanting in infinitesimals. So isolation and association of infinitesimals with the Infinite should not be recognised as two different entities. Pleasure and pain are of the same temporary stay and they are counted differently in their gradatory condition.

The eternal and temporal potencies have got their two realms, and on the border of the two, the border-land potentia can easily be traced. The members of the border-land potency can claim one of the two potencies at a time which are double-winged places of their habitation. The mundane phenomena have got a temporal situation; whereas, the eternal manifestations of the Transcendence are not subject to the atmosphere of inadequacy, limit and imperfection of phenomena.

The border-land potency can be traced to exhibit her neutral position which is normal and does not espouse at that time the cause of temporal or eternal manifestation of the Fountain-head. The members of this potency are apt to be forgetful of their eternal situation, when they have stronger affinity to live in this temporal region as lords and by their inherent free-will want not to submit to their eternal functions of the transcendence.

The forgetful demeanour posed by a member of the boder-land potency cannot welcome the guidance of the eternal blissful wisdom of a devotee. The misguiding and tempting objects of phenomena often dictate the necessity, in the heart of a weak, cringing forgetful spirit, of his wonted participation in the enjoyment of this material sphere.

The eternal acquisition of the members of the border-land potency cannot be dissociated from their persons. The impersonalist has got a non-differentiative impression of all spirits into one. If an erroneous argument is offered by a silly person of his having been endowed with the susceptibilities of forgetfulness of his eternal function, and therefore, because the Fountain-head is to be blamed for delegating to him inadequate power, he should not have been held responsible for the incomplete investiture on him along with complete freedom, then this polemic character of the Semitic school can easily be met by an acquaintance of prepossession of spiritual independent element inherent in the border-land potency to entangle themselves in undesirable situation. Free will of an absolute infinitesimal cannot be denied as a limited quality like the material characteristic of phenomenal nature.

The absolute infinitesimal has got his free will, and by his free will he can either pose himself as a forgetful agent or can awaken himself for his original eternal function of remembering his own eternal exploits. The Fountain-head does never wish to delude nor oblige His parts—the infinitesimal spirits by devoiding them of such free will but allows them the freedom inherent in them.

The conditioned souls, out of their own discretion, rush into moods quite apathetic for not serving the Fountain-head when He Himself sends His message of delivering them through His messengers who act as spiritual guides to the wrong-doers. Both the Semitic and non-Semitic people believe in the impersonality of the Absolute; whereas, the clear eyes of the devotees can see the personality of Godhead as the Fountain-head of many conflicting and contending energies that foster the whims of different parties. Proneness to forgetfulness is afforded by the free will of non-devotees who are found to adopt wrong processes as their guiding principles.

SPIRITUAL PROGRESS

By Prof. Nisi Kanta Sanyal

The Jiva or individual soul is an infinitesimal particle of the spiritual potency of the Absolute Who is the possessor of all powers. The individual soul can attach himself to the plenary spiritual potency in order to have a place in the plane of service of the Absolute He may, in the alternative, seek to choose his function independently of the guidance of the plenary spiritual power. He is, however, so constituted that he cannot function at all except through the plenary power. When, therefore, he seeks to choose his function independently, he does so against his own nature. In order to be enabled to function at all on his own terms, he is endowed with a second nature in keeping with the requirements of this unnatural demand. This adventitous nature can be cultivated on the mundane plane where it is possible for the rebellious Jiva to indulge his unnatural appetite for independence against the power of Godhead, within certain very narrow limits. But, as a matter of fact, the rebellious soul is compelled to obey unconditionally the deluding phase of the plenary power which produces in him the false egoism that regards itself as having mastery over physical Nature.

If the deluded soul goes on indulging his appetite for worldly domination, he gradually loses all characteristics of his spiritual nature and approximates to the condition of insentience. This state of gradually increasing unspirituality is hailed by the deluded soul as the hall-mark of progress. The close thraldom of the deluding energy appears to him as the realisation of the state of complete freedom from the galling yoke of the Absolute. All arguments are wasted on the willing victim of such self-elected folly. It, therefore, becomes one of the kind duties of the true benefactors of all deluded souls to humour the irrational complacency of this abject condition of bondage to his lower nature in their attempts to effect the cure of this malady.

If the Truth is fully divulged to the unrepentant conditioned soul, it only serves to increase his aversion to Godhead. This is so, because he allows himself to be wholly guided by the dictates of his lower nature. It is in this way that evil is born. Those who suppose that the Absolute is responsible for the miseries of the unconditioned state of the rebellious soul overlook the above considerations. The conditioned soul requires to be left in the state of delusion and thus reconciled to the conditions of penal servitude imposed upon him for his regeneration by his own reclaimed rational choice. The conditioned soul may not resent what his suppressed rational nature enables him to imagine to be the logical consequence of the abuse of his powers of initiative exercised in a fully independent manner. He feels that the mercy of Godhead provides him with a fair field and no favour for making or marring his own destiny. This tragedy cannot be interrupted by any form of mechanical intervention.

The enlightened soul understands and deplores the plight of conditioned souls without being able to render any directly real help. But the conditioned soul cannot be rescued from the clutches of the deluded energy without seeking the help of the plenary spiritual power. It is only when the repentant rebel sincerely seeks such help that it is possible for the enlightened soul to offer him the requisite help.

The progress of material civilisation is no proof of spiritual advancement. Neither is it necessarily opposed to spiritual progress. Material civilisation is brought about by the operations of the eclipsing potency of Godhead. The rebellious soul does not know this. He wrongly thinks that he is the maker of material civilisation. Nor has he direct access to the service of Godhead. The individual soul is not the possessor of power. He can make neither the material world nor the spiritual realm. He is an infinitesimal particle of the potency of God lying between the spiritual and the mundane —the border potency. The individual soul has to realise this if he wishes to function in accordance with his real nature. He can function in either realm only by the will of Godhead, which does not interfere with his freedom of choice. He is free to behave properly or improperly towards the entities of the realm in which he may be placed by the will of Godhead. Those worlds exist independently of him and are ruled independantly of him by the will of the Absolute Autocrat. He may be incorporated or rejected by either phase of the divine energy according to the will of Godhead. He would be in his natural position in either realm if he behaves properly towards his environment.

But the mind of man is averse to this divine arrangement. He longs for domination and not for service. Such longing is against his own nature. But he is free to rebel against himself and to desire for self-mutilation. In proportion as this malady tends to increase in virulence, its victim retrogresses towards insentiency or self-destruction. By a device of the deluding energy this effect is not produced in the course of one lifetime. This prevents the offender from realising the gravity of his danger.

Metempsychosis is regarded as a conception of the irrational minds of the Indian people by the savants of the West who labour under the influence of the Semitic thought which emphasises chiefly on retributive justice as the guarantee of the moral order of this wicked world. But the one-birth theory is a crude conception derived from the mundane outlook of conditioned souls. The stage set for the mundane performances of the conditioned soul is not so narrow as the Semitic school chooses to think. It is against probability.

The progress from one mundane sphere to another may, indeed, be either upward or downward. But it would be a great blunder to mistake the upward mundane journey to be identical with spiritual progress. Still less should we suppose any change in our environment in this world to indicate an upward movement into the next life. The progress of material civilisation as such has absolutely nothing to do with the spiritual progress of the race. Materialistic thought of the West needlessly stunts itself even in its conception of the mundane scope.

The activities of the mundane plane even on the enlarged scale realised by the more thorough-going materialistic thinkers of India, if they are performed without reference to the requirements of the spiritual realm, are bound to prove a positive hinderance to the progress of the soul towards the resuscitation of his normal activity. It is practicable to attain the plane of spiritual service in this life only by the conscious rejection of every form of felicity and power that it is within the competence of the deluding energy to offer in the different spheres of its godless realm.

It is very rarely, indeed, that any conditioned soul becomes really disposed towards the spiritual life. When such an inclination makes its appearance in the pure essence of the soul in the conditioned state, he is thereby rendered simultaneously conscious of his own utter unfitness and powerlessness for the attainment of his coveted function. This realisation of helplessness impels him to seek for support from every likely quarter. In the course of this search for guidance he meets with many different specimen of pseudo-religionists. If he is sincere, he survives the ordeal by the Grace of Godhead till at last the real guide manifests Himself to his soul.

The meeting with the bonafide spiritual guide is the first event on the path of the journey towards the spiritual realm. This is the starting-point of a novice. There is a long series of stages which the neophyte has to pass before reaching the goal of his journey. Each stage has its own corresponding difficulties and dangers which cannot be surmounted except by the constant mercy of the spiritual guide.

The spiritual goal does not imply any stationary condition, but on the contrary the unlimited activity of the pure cognitive essence is everlastingly realised there. It is this activity that bears the name of Prema or love for the Absolute Autocrat, realised as the centre of all the exquisite joys of the Infinite Personality. It is a transcendental condition having a strange resemblance to the state of man in this world.

The Liberation of the conditioned Soul

By Hari Pada Vidyaratna

People cherish many erroneous ideas and indulge in idle speculations about the attainment of the service of Godhead. They also have many wrong notions about His devotees. What are we and what relationship do we bear towards Him ? We have to try to understand that, before we can attempt to discover how to attain Him. A man has a soul, a mind, senses and a body. While he is conditioned, his mind reigns over all the rest with the result that he falls in the hands of delusion or Maya and is thus enmeshed in many troubles and whirled round in manifold births and deaths in various forms both animate and inanimate. But where the soul reigns supreme, the mind, the body and the senses are all engaged in the service of the Supreme Lord Krishna, and the result is abiding hermony and eternal bliss.

Our senses and the body which are always making us acquainted with material goods and the desire for tasting their qualities, are like a receiving apparatus. The body is the place where the receiving takes place and the mind is the criminal recepient—the false enjoyer. The soul of a conditioned man, the real owner, is asleep or as is more often the case, held a prisoner while the mind orders the senses to provide things for the enjoyment of itself and its colleague, the body. As the open and simple-hearted king who entrusted his all to his false minister to be managed and maintained for him, was in return imprisoned by the treacherous servant who enjoyed all his wealth and power, even so does the wily mind with the unwary soul.

The mind by its very nature cannot know Him and is thus unwilling to serve Godhead. Having, however, attained a demoniac power not only over the senses, the things of the material world and the body, but also having deluded the soul it has kept it, from birth to birth, in a series of illusory surroundings like a prisoner in a jail. It is also trying all the time, with the help of the senses and by its own positive and negative self-intrigues to completely usurp those functions of the soul, wherein there is no place for the service of the King of kings—Lord Sree Krishna. The soul thus being deprived of its liberty cannot attain its only real object, the service of the Transcendental and His true devotees through the service of Sree Gurudeva, the spiritual intercessor of the soul before the Supreme Lord. When the soul wakes up, it tries to break the bondage of the mind with great agony and travail. But it cannot free itself excepting through the infinite and unimaginable grace of Sree Gurudeva who if pleased, with his prayer and service may open a bright path of light for him to proceed towards his eternal goal—the service of the Lotus Feet of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna. Thus when the soul blossoms forth in his true vigour, the mind with its associates—the senses, the body and material phenomena—all in a body fall repentent at the feet of the soul and, being forgiven, they are also pressed into the service of the Lotus feet of Sree Gurudeva who in his turn directs all of them to the service of Godhead. The soul can attain the service of Godhead only through the mercy of Sree Gurudeva, without whom it is impossible for him to be freed from the strong fetters of the mind and the senses.

How Chand Kazi attained Grace

(Adopted from Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita)

"Obeisance again and again to Lord Sree Hari, to Lord Sree Krishna Yadava, to Lord Sree Gopal, to Lord Sree Govind, to Lord Sree Ram and to Lord Sree Madhusudan."

Thus were the people of Navadweep exhorted by the Lord to sing Sankeertan in their homes. There rose, whereupon, a great din of Sankeertan to the accompaniment mridangas and karatals,[1] and one could hear nothing else in the town but the chanting of the name. The Moslems who lived there were much incensed at this sound of Lord Sree Hari's Name, dinned into their ears by the voice of the multitude of devotees, and they approached the Kazi of the place to represent their grievance to him.

The Kazi was a very important personage in the Muhamadan Kingdoms. He was the Judge as well as the Governor of the town. Chand Kazi of Navadweep was a particularly powerful man by reason of his being the preceptor of Husain Shah, the Nawab of Gauda. Gauda at that period comprised the greater part of Bengal. Chand, on receiving the complaint of the Moslem citizens and having himself heard Sankeertan resounding through the city, summoned his guards, proceeded to the heart of the town and entering one of the houses dragged out the people, who were doing Sankeertan, along with their mridangas which he broke into pieces. Then he thus addressed them :

"No one in this town dared till now to indulge loudly in Hindu religious ceremonials, surely there is someone behind you whose support has given you the courage to do so. But be sure, nothing will avail you if you disobey my order and chant Sankeertan again in my city. If anyone is discovered chanting the Name his property will be forfeited to the State and he shall be exiled from his home."

Having thus delivered his orders with great passion the Kazi asked the people to disperse and went to his home. At this the Hindus of the place were much perturbed and in a body went to Lord Gaura-Hari to Whom they related the incident. The Lord told them not to be disheartened and commanded them to go to their homes and continue chanting Sankeertan. He added that if any non-devotees interfered with them they would surely be exterminated.

The people went to their homes and continued to perform Sankeertan every day as hitherto, but they were ill at ease ; for they were affraid of the Kazi. The Lord perceiving this sent for them one day and when they had arrived, said :

"Make gay the whole town with buntings and flowers, illuminate every house this evening. I myself shall perform Sankeertan throughout the city

1. Mridangas are ellipsoid drum and Karatalas brass cymbals.

for I have nothing to fear from the Kazi."

That evening the Lord started with three Sankeertan parties. Sree Haridas, dancing, led the foremost group and in the midst of the second danced Sree Adwait Acharya in transports of joy and then came Lord Gaura Chandra Himself dancing with Lord Sree Nityananda. This marvellous incident has been described at great length by Sree Brindaban Das in the Sree Chaitanya Bhagavat.

When the Sankeertan parties, reveling round the city, reached the house of the Kazi, the common people in the concourse entered the flower-garden round his house and uttering threatening cries did some injury to the property. The Kazi out of fear shut himself up in his house. Lord Sree Gaura said that His indulgence had sent the people mad and while He sat at the gate sent some of His followers to call the Kazi. Chand came out and bowing stood at a distance, but the Lord made a seat for him and requested him to sit down, saying :

"It is a strange courtesy you show to me I come to your house as a guest and you choose to hide yourself from me."

"You come here in anger against me" replied the Kazi, "that is why I hid myself. Now that your wrath has been appeased I have appeared before you and am thankful to my good fortune that she has sent me a guest like you. By relationship of village courtesy, which is more often stronger than blood ties, your maternal grandfather Neelamber Chakravartee is my uncle, thus you are my nephew. Uncle and nephew must not fall out but must bear with each other's faults."

Thus they continued to converse together and none knew that which lay hidden behind their words. Now the Lord said to the Kazi that he had come to ask him a question :

"You drink the cow's milk, therefore, she becomes your mother and the buli raises corn for you in the fields, therefore, he is a father to you. How is it then that you kill them who are in the relation of parents to you and devour them? What sanction do you find for such monstrous deeds."

To this the Kazi replied :

"Like your holy books the Vedas and the Puranas, the Koran constitutes our scriptures. It distinguishes between the path of Enjoyment and the path of Renunciation ; according to the latter we are forbidden to slay human beings; according to the former cattle were given to us for our food. That is the mandate of our scriptures. Moreover, even in your Vedas the sacrifice of kine is enjoined."

"The Vedas forbid the slaughter of cattle," said Lord Sree Gaura "and all Hindus, therefore, refrain from it. There is, however, a special sanction for sacrificing animals but only for those who have the power of bringing them to life again through the Vedic Mantras.[1] Thus was the decrepit made young. But as in this Kali-Yuga[2], the Brahmans no longer possess such powers, animal sacrifice is forbidden. The Shastras say that the sacrifice of animals, asceticism, offering meat to the dead, bearing children on the widows of elder brothers is not allowed in Kali-Yuga,[1] though they were enjoined in the other three Ages.

This is because lust and enjoyment are rampant in our age, and because we do not possess the power to revive the sacrificed animals. Incessant tortures in the Hell of Raurava[2] are in store for him who kills cattle. The framers of your scriptures were mistaken."

With such converse Chand Kazi was convinced of his errors and exclaimed : "O, Sage, whatever you have said is true, but I follow the religion of my nation."

"O, Uncle" said the Lord smilingly, "I put to you another question which you must answer truly without any excuses. Everyday there has been Sankeertan, all over your city, to the accompaniment of loud music and dancing. How is it then that you have not enforced your order by stopping them ?"

"Sree Gaura Hari, I address you thus" said Chand Kazi "because everybody else does so, I have somewhat to say to you and would pray that you be closeted alone with me".

"All these with me are my intimate associates ; you may speak freely before them" said the Lord.

The Kazi related : "After breaking the Mridangas and ordering that Sankeertan was never more to be performed in my city, I went home and that very night a most terrible figure of a Man with a lion's head[3] jumped upon my bed who, digging his nails in my chest, roared, 'I shall rend thy body even as thou didst rend my Mridangas. I shall destroy thee as thou did stop my Sankeertan'. Whereupon, a great fear seized upon me and I trembled in every limb, determining not to interfere again with the Sankeertan. Then the Lion-man finding me intimidated spoke to me even graciously : 'I have given thee a warning, but if thou repeatest thy conduct again, I shall surely destroy thee and the entire race of Moslems'. Look, I still bear the marks of nails upon my chest".

He showed the nail-marks upon his chest to the whole assembly and continued, "I did not relate this incident to anyone, but the other day one of my city guards reported to me that he and everyone else who went to stop the Sankeertan had his beard and face burnt up with supernatural sparks of fire. I, therefore, bade them not to interfere with the Sankeertan. Then all the Moslems of the town came to me in a body saying that the whole place was resounding with the name of Lord Sree Hari and surely if the Badshah[4] came to know of it, he would mete out dire punishment to me. One of them said that the Hindus danced, laughed, cried, sang and rolled upon the dust chanting Lord Sree Krishna, Lord Sree Krishna incessantly."

Chand Kazi told Lord Gaura-Hari that that some of the Moslems continued to repeat the Holy name in his presence and on being questioned as to

1. The predominating duties for the four ages are : austere fervour in Satya Yuga, knowledgein Treta, sacrifice in Dwapara and the chanting of the Name in Kali.

2. Raurava is one of Yama's hells so called because those who are put there are constantly crying in agony. The Hells of Milton and Dante are tame affairs compared to this place, with its wonderful appointments and contrivances for torture.

3. Narasingh is one of the Avatars of Vishnu for protecting the virtuous and destroying the evil-doers.

why they, being Moslems, constantly uttered the name of Sree Lord Krishna, they all answered that they began by mocking the Hindus who, they said, were posing to be the servants of Sree Krishna and Sree Ram and uttering their names, but were all the time thinking as to how they could steal someone else's goods; they began by mocking and ended by being unable to stop uttering the Name, and, therefore, they further charged the Hindus with magical practices.

"Nor was this all" continued the Kazi. "Your own co-religionists six or seven Hindus came to me with the complaint that you have transgressed their religion by your innovation of the Sankeertan, something quite unknown to Hinduism. That your loud Sankeertan interfered with their respectable music and dancing on the nights of the vigils that they held in honour of Sree Chandee[1] and Sree Manasa[2]. They said that Nemai Pandit was quite sane and decent before he went to Gya, but since his return from there he had behaved most strangely. He chants aloud, claps His hands, beats upon Mridangas and sounds the Karatals and along with Himself he has turned the citizens mad: they laugh, sing, dance, roll upon the ground, get up and dance and sing again. This went on all night and they could not get any rest."

The Hindus had complained to the Kazi that Nemai Pandit or Sree Gaura-Hari, as he was called, since his return from Gya, had taught even the low-caste people to recite the name of Sree Krishna. They represented to him that the Holy Name had the powers of a Mantra and its repetition or even hearing by the common people was tantamount to sacrilage, and that if the Hindu religion was thus insulted, the town would be made desolate. As Governor of the town, they appealed to him to put a stop to all this and to deport Sree Gaura-Hari. The Kazi spoke to them all in soothing words and sent them to their homes.

"It is strange" said the Lord, "that the Name of Lord Sree Krishna is constantly on thy tongue. All your sins have thereby been washed away, you are made holy. You took the three Names, Sree Hari, Sree Krishna, Sree Ram, which shows you are blessed and most favoured".

Hearing this Chand Kazi fell at the Lotus Feet of Gaura-Hari and uttered with great emotion: "My evil heart has been made whole-some by Your mercy; now I beseach You to confer upon me this Grace that my devotion may ever rest in You".

The Lord Sree Gaura-Hari and His associates together with Chand Kazi went round the city of Navadweep holding loud Sankeertan to the accompaniment of dancing and Mridangas and Karatals.

THE GAUDIYA CREED

It is probably the most hopeful trait of the Western mentality, that it has been capable even now of expecting to be enlightened by 'Men from the East'. There is a spiritual tradition behind this attitude, but the exploitation of the Scriptures of India by the well-meaning savants of the West has not so far resulted in giving any really new angle to the thought and activity of the Western world. On the contrary, it is India which has been palpably influenced not only by the material civilisation of the West but also, in no small measure, by the speculations of European scholars in the domain of Indian philosophical and religious thought.

Apparently, therefore, the welcome extended to our preachers there indicates that Europe is not satisfied with the fashionable interpretations of Indian religion. They want to learn from those who possess living faith in what they profess to teach to others. Many scientific men in Europe suppose that the transcendental claims of religion are nothing more serious than the survivals of obsolete cultures. The so-called higher criticism of the Bible accordingly seeks to understand the teaching of Christ by reference to purely mundane affairs. Despite the teaching of Christ to the contrary his present-day followers seem to possess very little practical interest for aught that implies any subordination of the concerns of this life to any higher purpose. But the Bible abounds in passages that declare attachment to the possessions of this world to be not only of no value but as positive hindrances in the quest after Truth. There are hints in the Bible that Christ did not want to establish an order of things which would tend to make men love the possessions of this world.

These are the deeper questions presented by the teachings of Christ. Mere material prosperity does not contain even the guarantee of its undesirable permanence. It is full of unwhole-some conditions that are essential for its maintenance. Nothing is clearer than this to those very nations who have progressed most in material civilisation. The evil is found to have an irrepressible tendency to increase in the face of every effort to get rid of it. It has also the quality of quickly assuming the very form of the remedy that is devised for its cure. Much of the current forms of evil are in the forms of its old remedies. This irony overtakes all attempts devised by the brain of man for securing unmixed good in this world. It is perfectly in keeping with the whole trend of our experience to hold the view that the new remedies that are being proposed, at the present moment, with so much confidence, will before long share the fate of the old remedies which they are intended to supplant.

This deluding negative back-ground of the positive reality is quite familiar to everyone. But there must be somewhere a positive plane which offers the real anchor-ground that is denied by these negative conditions. It should also be practicable for every person to attempt their attainment.

The different religions advocate apparently different methods for the achievement of this, and they are held in the greatest reverence by their respective followers. But the miseries of the world show no apparent signs of any diminution. May it not be possible that the evil has assumed the very forms of the religions which were originally intended to lift humanity to the positive plane of the higher life ?

We have been talking plainly and systematically on the plight of the religions in the hands of their pseudo-followers, in the pages of this Journal, for the last 30 years. We deprecate no religion, our remarks apply only to the principle of evil which is masquerading in the garb of religion. The pseudo-religionists have always attempted to prevent plain speaking specially on the subject of religion. They are the greatest enemies of religion. Intolerance of evil in the garb of religion must not be confounded with the intolerence of religion itself.

We must seek the concrete Reality. We are not satisfied with methods which are not concrete and definite. To chase the shadow by the shadow was fatal indeed. We have no place for impersonalism and idealism in this matter-of-fact world. The impersonalist and idealist avoid the real facts of life. We must not carry their attitude into the quest of the Absolute. For instance, we must not be startled when we are told that Krishna is the actual Name of the Absolute. But at the same time we must by no means avoid to try to understand the Personal Absolute.

To study the Absolute it is not, however, proposed to do away with the activities of this world. The activities of this world are the products of the convictions and capacities of man. The destiny of man, temporal as well as spiritual, is the result of his own Karma subject to the Divine dispensation Krishna does not interfere with the fullest freedom of choice of any person. There is always the possibility in every person of such a thing as causeless repugnance to the Truth. Such repugnance can only be deplored. This is also the only Evil. It is perversity and offence against Krishna as well as against one's own proper self. But every person is none the less entirely free to go against himself. Obviously, however, such a course will entail unpleasant consequences. The perverse person finds himself out of his element in every position, for which he himself is to blame.

Sree Krishna Chaitanya says that the things of this world are neither false nor evil in themselves. They are very real and very good to one who cares to understand their proper nature, and to deal with them accordingly. One cannot know the real nature of anything unless he cares to know about Krishna.

One cannot know even himself without seeking to know Krishna. The Truth can be konwn only on His terms. This is His Nature. It is our proper function to submit to be regulated by Him. Krishna is the Name of Godhead, and is one and the same with Him. We shall know this when we are fully disposed to seek the Absolute Truth.

The Truth is only negatively present to our present faculties in this world. It cannot be approached by the faculties in the positive way by the faculties we now possess. Therefore, it is necessary to seek for His special Grace for knowing Him as He really is. The Name Krishna is the positive Absolute. He must not be confounded with any negative entity. For example, we must not bother about the etymological or historical associations of the word Krishna. Neither should we needlessly suppose that the Name of the Absolute is any mundane entity.

There is also corresponding danger of an opposite kind. We must not admit that we know Krishna till He is actually pleased to show Himself to us. We must avoid all hypocrisy. The first thing necessary for us will be to associate with those persons who profess to be the servants of Krishna by word and deed. If we cultivate close association with such persons with a view to learn about the Truth in the spirit of unchallenging humility towards the Truth, we would surely be blessed with His sight in a very short time.

Krishna can be revealed to us only by His Name. We should, therefore, approach the Name by listening to Him from those who are fit to repeat Him. This sums up the teachings of Sree Krishna Chaitanya. This is the Gaudiya Creed.

Caste System and Varnashrama

By Prof. Nisi Kanta Sanyal

The caste-system is not liked by many educated Hindus. But what do they really propose to do about it? Total abolitionists of caste are still in a minority and include only persons who have some real experience of Western society. The masses are certainly vehement supporters of the system.

Those among the educated classes, who want to retain the institution as it is, sometimes wrongly indentify it with the Shastric Varnashrama institution. But neither Varna nor Ashrama has anything to do with caste. Varna did not mean colour; Varna is explained by the Mahabharata as individual disposition. Ashrama means the four-fold division of the life of a twice-born, prescribed by the Shastras.

Caste is the division of the Hindu society into a very large number of exclusive hereditary groups. This arrangement is wrongly believed, on the supposed authority of the Shastras, to be due to the Karma of individuals in their previous births. A person is supposed to be born in a higher or a lower caste according as his Karma in the previous births is better or worse.

Such belief is sometimes sought to be supported by misinterpretation of certain passages of the Shastras. But Karma is connected by the Shastras with Varna and not with Jati (birth, heredity). The inborn disposition of a person is the result of his deeds in his previous lives. It is changed by deeds performed during the present life. There are many texts to the effect that a Brahman is liable to lose his Varna, by unspiritual conduct, during his life-time. Re-birth in the forms of lower animal, tree or stone is declared to be the result of the deliberate practice of thoughtlessness by a person in his previous births as man. There is no mention of caste in this connection.

The Varnashrama organisation of society is part and parcel of the Vedic religion. The present Hindu society is, however, not organised into castes by reference to the stage of life and individual disposition. The caste-system is probably the historical descendant of the tribal organisation of primitive society on which was imposed, in an unwarrantable way, the decayed tradition of the Varnashrama organisation. It seems to be one of the worst crimes that have been ever committed against the well-being of a people by ecclesiastical self-seeking.

Current Hinduism has learnt to take its stand on the caste under the wrong impression that it is identical with the Varnashrama organisation. Sufficient cogent historical causes have made the caste system a necessary part of the present social order of the Hindus, and its summary abolition is, therefore, sure to lead to social anarchy and far worse confusion than what we are experiencing by its retention.

Nevertheless it is not less true that the Vedic religion can be practised in its living form only within the Varnashrama organisation. In caste-ridden India, however, it is very difficult to obtain a sympathetic hearing for the Varnashrama organisation which is altogether different in its form and spirit from the caste. The tradition of this Shastric organisation is maintained in the caste arrangement by the retention of certain designations and forms of practice. Under the cover of these names and forms there have grown up very strong vested interests within the caste, whose very life is threatened tby any proposal for the re-establishment of the Varnashrama organisation in this country.

The most stubborn opponents of any proposal for the revival of the Varnashrama organisation are sure to come from the ranks of the caste-Brahmanas. For centuries the hereditary Brahmanas have been enjoying the monopoly of power over the religious affairs of the Hindus. Much ingenuity has been exercised in changing inconvenient readings of the old texts, interpolating corrupt opinion and manufacturing Shastric literature in aid of the supremacy of the caste-Brahmanas. The appeal to the Shastras is not so much dreaded by these reactionaries, thanks to these precautions, as the appeal to common sense.

The social supremacy of the caste-Brahmanas is, however, opposed to the democratic spirit of the Age. It is also being assailed by the labours of scholars who are restoring the proper reading of the texts of the Shastras, on the deliberate perversions of which the superstitious and irrational upholders of a spurious system have been accustomed uptil now to place their chief reliance.

Buddhism : Its True Significance

Buddhism as it prevails to-day is silent on the real issue—the realisation of the Transcendental.

Buddha is supposed, by his professed followers to have arrived at a negative solution of life—getting rid of our temporal nature by an elaborate mundane process. But to try to get rid of the mundane by the rational method, does not and cannot lead to transcendence. The administration of opium deadens the sensation of pain but it does not get rid of the cause of it.

The senses are undoubtedly a great asset. They cannot be stifled without extremely harmful results. But they have to be properly used. Buddhism suggests how to use the senses so that ultimately they may cease to function. The negative result of cessation of mundane thought is also produced by the pursuit of the positive goal viz., the transcendental service of Godhead. But the two negatives are not the same inspite of their apparent resemblance. On the resuscitation of normal spritual activity the hallucinative functions naturally stop. Such stoppage is not harmful. But if the abnormal activities of the diseased person are sought to be ended by the method of drugging, such deadening need not be proclaimed as the cure of the disease.

If Buddha really chose to be silent about the permanence of the soul and about the Transcendental, it is not wise for his followers to set up as physicians on such purely negative training. The teachings of the Buddha show that even moral life is bound to be barren of permanently positive results Buddha's teachings are really emphatic condemnation of the practice of "Godless" morality and it has appeard to his admirers to be palpably better than the ridiculous performances of cruel sacrifices and penances for attaining elevation to the status of the gods. Buddha condemned the reckless pursuit of sensuous pleasure represented by the elevationist. In order to do this he had recourse to the rationalistic method, and, if he is read between the lines, he also, thereby, exposed the futility of the goal sought to be attained by the empiric rationalistic process.

Did Buddha really hold that moral life is identical with the spiritual and did he accordingly discourage the quest of the Transcendental? He certainly set his face against all empiric speculations about transcendence, but he never declared that transcendence was non-existent, unnecessary or impossible of realisation. The negative teaching of Buddha was intended for discouraging the futile rationalistic speculations about the Reality. Only this negative part of his teachings has come down to us in the extant books of the Buddhists.

We claim Buddha as one of the Avatars (Descent) of Vishnu (Godhead).

There were evidently two interpretations of his teachings, but the Vishnavite or theistic interpretation has not come down to us intact, the negative part alone has survived.

The revolt against the so-called moral life of this world represented by Buddhism is a revolt against the gnostic interpretation of the Veda. Why should we cease to exist? We are bound to cease to be if we follow either elevationism or salvationism—the paths of work and knowledge—as is clearly declared in our Scriptures. In our present condition we have a natural and apparently unconquerable affinity for these forbidden alternatives. The analysis of Buddha brings out the fatuity of following them. Rationalistic thought, indeed, kills the aptitude for work but ends by killing itself. At the conclusion of the process only a void is left. Buddha offers this severe analysis of the complete cycle of the worldly course. But does he, therefore, recommend its adoption? That could never be his purpose. It is difficult to believe that Buddha had nothing permanent to offer.

Buddha has really exploded once for all the speculative or philosophical method prevailing at his time by demonstrating its innate inability to help in the quest of the Absolute Reality. He thereby helped the gnostics to realise the hollowness of their sophistries. He did not intend to lead his followers to annihilation. The personality of the Buddha stands expressed in all his beauty and mercy in his recorded words. Rightly understood they will remain an eternal and priceless heritage of man.

The Buddhism of Buddha requires to be clearly distinguished, from the cult professed by his avowed atheistical followers. The same is true of Sankara and for similar reasons. It is necessary to understand the real significance of the records available. Both of them only follow the method of the Veda in employing the paroksha process for the exposition of their transcendental propositions. The positive transcendental method is seldom acceptable or intelligible to the people of this world. It thus becomes necessary to adopt the indirect method of exploding empiric conceptions about religion by the only acceptable method of explaining existing practices and thoughts in an apparently rationalistic way leaving the conclusion to be drawn by each individual according to his temperament or requirement.

Vidura : Royal Counsellor and Devotee

(II)

The conversation of Vidur addressed to king Dhritarashtra just before the departure of the later from this world are given in the Bhagabatam in a detailed form. The substance of them will be found in the article on Vidura in the previous issue of this journal (Pp. 9-13). Vidura was naturally grieved on finding his aged brother unable to turn his mind to Godhead and to extricate himself from hankering for the enjoyments of life even after the extirpation of his family by his evil counsel. Vidura knew that it would never be possible for king Dhritarashtra to listen to good counsel unless he threw himself personally and unconditionally on the protection of Godhead. By a variety of arguments Vidura succeeded in creating in the mind of Dhritarashtra extreme repugnance against his abject mode of living. King Dhritarashtra and his virtuous queen Gandhari were induced to leave the protection of the Pandavas, steal out of their palace and betake themselves to the solitudes of the Himalayas for the undisturbed opportunity of fixing their minds on the mercy of Godhead. Vidura accompanied them to the Saptasrota and helped them with his advice up to the last moment of their earthly lives.

But Vidura himself had renounced the world before the great war of Kurukshetra. He had, therefore, had a very much longer period of life of renunciation for learning the tidings of the supreme good from the lips of transcendental devotees. He had met, during his wanderings to the various places of pilgrimage, both Uddhava and afterwards Maitreya. Both of them had informed him of the teaching of Sree Krishna contained in four slokas of the Bhagabatam which Sree Krishna had spoken to Brahma.

Vidura had been loved by Krishna. Maitreya was aware that Vidura was an eternal servitor of Sree Krishna. The episode of Sree Krishna preferring the humble meal offered to Him by Vidura to the costly dishes prepared for Him by Duryodhan, the enemy of the Pandavas, shows that Krishna always chooses to abide with the righteous poor by avoiding the homes of unrighteous kings.

But Vidura did not feel that it was proper for him to lead the life of a house-holder in his advanced age. Was he unfit to serve Sree Krishna without renouncing the world ? The words of Maitreya, already referred to, do not support such a view. Sree Krishna Himself had accepted the services of house-holder Vidura on terms of loving intimacy. But Vidura also knew that he was not entitled to remain at home by neglecting a duty that he owed to Sree Krishna Himself. That duty was to make known to the world the Teaching of Sree Krishna.

But no one can be a preacher of the Word of Godhead without also outwardly renouncing the world. In order, therefore, to make himself fit for rendering to Krishna the best form of service, Vidura accepted the life of a Sanyasi.

But Vidura did not think that the mere acceptance of a life of renunciation entitles a person to be a preacher of the Word. The Sanyasi is in a position to learn about the Truth. It is the duty of a Sanyasi to seek for spiritual enlightenment from the devotees of the Supreme Lord. Vidura did not neglect to go out in search of the true devotee. It is enjoined by the Scriptures that the Sanyasi must not stay for long at any one place lest he may contract again attachment for the things of this world. The Sanyasi is enjoined to wander to the holy places associated with the activities of the Divinity. This is, however, a preliminary affair. It is of the nature of the means to the end. If the Sanyasi keeps before him, as the end of these holy journeys, the prospect of finding the pure devotee of the Lord he is assured the successful termination of such travel.

Vidura was successful in the quest of the Absolute. He learnt from Uddhava about the Transcendental Career of Sree Krishna. He was also referred by Uddhava to Maitreya for being enlightened about the Teaching of Sree Krishna that was given to Brahma and which forms the subject-matter of the Bhagabatam.

But the Teaching of Krishna is not anything outside the Personality of Krishna. Maitreya told Vidura that he was not ignorant about Krishna. Maitreya also said that he had been commanded by Krishna to describe to Vidura the mystery of creation and the Descent of the Divinity to the mundane plane for the redemption of conditioned souls.

The instructions of Maitreya form the subject-matter of the third and fourth Skandhas of the Bhagabatam. Vidura submitted to be instructed in these matters by Maitreya. This was the process by which the world was made acquainted with that first principle which every seeker of the Truth has to learn from the Guru on his first meeting with the devotee of the Lord. The Geeta was told to Arjuna by Sree Krishna. The Bhagabatam opens with the instructions of Maitreya to Vidura. This teaching can be understood in its transcendental sense only by the disciple who, after renunciation of the world, makes his complete submission to the feet of the pure devotee of the Supreme Lord.

It was only after Vidura had been enlightened by the mercy of Maitreya that he was eligible to preach the Word of God to the people of this world. Such preaching is consciously controlled by the Will of Sree Krishna. The preacher of the Word is the spiritual agent of Sree Krishna for conveying His Mercy to the conditioned soul King Dhritarashtra had not lost his regard for Vidura. After the terrible disillusionment of the great war he was in a position to give his undivided attention to the words of Vidura. His real enemies, his sons and kingdom, had been mercifully taken away from him by Krishna. This could produce the vacuum in the place of the objects of his wrong attachment, which demanded to be filled up. This was the psychological moment that was chosen by Vidura, under the direction of Krishna, for effecting the deliverance of king Dhritarashtra. There cannot be conceived a clearer exhibition of the supreme excellence and perfect working of the Mercy of Krishna than is supplied by the career of Vidura and the deliverance of king Dhritarashtra by his agency.

Chaitanyadev and Image Worship

By Prof. Nisi Kanta Sanyal

Mr. Melville T. Kennedy M.A., in his 'Chaitanya Movement' (P. 247), in enumerating the defects of the Bhakti cult of Chaitanya, mentions the use of images 'which play so prominent a part'. He goes on to observe that the common defence of image-worship, that it is a necessary aid for ignorant and spiritually undeveloped folk, manifestly cannot be applied to Chaitanya, one of Bengal's greatest sons'. The writer has given his clear opinion on P. 114 where he states that 'Chaitanya fully shared the view-point of His time, and believed in the reality and blessedness of the God's presence in the 'image before him'.

Mr. Kennedy is rightly opposed to the worship of images of wood and stone. But Sree Chaitanya never taught the worship of such images. Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita puts the point of view of Sree Chaitanya in a very clear manner. 'There is no greater blasphemy against Vishnu than to suppose that His Body is mundane'. (Ch. Ch. Adi. VII 115). Sree Chaitanya commanded His followers on their arrival at Puri not to see the Image of Jagannath in the Temple but to seek, from the sea-shore the sight of the chakra or disc at the top of His Temple. (Ch. Ch. Madhya XI. 183). Those who are liable to see only the image of wood, according to Sree Chaitanya, have no business to enter the Temple of Jagannath. Neither did Sree Chaitanya see His God in the image of wood. As a matter of fact He did not see the wood at all. Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita has described the nature of the vision of the devotees of the highest order. 'The pure devotee sees inanimate entities and also entities that possess animation ; but he does not see their material forms (images). Instead of matter he finds everywhere the manifestation of the Godhead of His cherished worship'. (Ch. Ch. Madhya VIII, 274).

Sree Chaitanya did not believe that His God was present in any image of wood or stone. The Ganges was to His perfect vision the waters of spiritual pedic lavation of Krishna and not any material substance. When He emphasises the worship of Ganges-water and wood-Brahma He does so to contradict allegorical or poetic misinterpretations of the reality of transcendental manifestations testified to by the narratives of the Scriptures.

The philosophical back-ground is provided by the doctrine of Divine descent (Avataravad). Krishna is the Transcendental Supreme Person. His Realm is also Transcendental. Krishna has power to descend with His Realm to the plane of mortal vision. Thus alone is the worship of Godhead by mortals made possible and they are enabled to avoid the worship of idols.

Another philosophical help is supplied by the Doctrine of the existence of the mundane world as a perverted reflection. This mundane world is the perverted reflection of the Absolute Realm. Every detail of entititive existence of this world is a reflection of the wealth of the spiritual entititive existence, the region of the Absolute. Therefore, the 'Archa' or 'the Visible Form of Godhead' and Ganges-water need not be conceived of as either wood or water, nor their transcendence as concoctions of the human brain. The Bhagavat informs us that the supremacy of the Divinity consists in this that He is able to retain His Supremacy over every entity intact even when He manifests His Appearance in the likeness of a mundane object and seems to be subject to the laws of physical Nature.

We are, however, also cautioned against committing the futher blunder of supposing that it is open to mortals to have a sight of the Divine Form of Sree Jagannath merely by entering the Temple at Puri. Jagannath is certainly visible at Puri to all persons, and yet He is also always liable to be seen only as common wood by those who do not possess the spiritual vision. But the worshippers of Sree Jagannath are not, therefore, idolaters. This is so because they alone worship God's Real Manifest Form. If any among such worshippers fail to find His Transcendental Form they can also get rid of their misfortune only by following the method of worship of Sree Jagannath laid down in the Scriptures, under the guidance of persons who really possess the true spiritual vision and judgment.

Sree Chaitanya was consistently opposed to the doctrine of non-differential monism—the error that is bound to overtake all persons who seek to find the Absolute Truth on the unhelped resources of their individual reason. The monists deny the existence of specifications in the Absolute. They also deny the reality of transcendental activities of the pure devotees of Godhead. The monists are the only consistent opponents of the worship of the Transcendental Form of Godhead who manifests His Descent to the view of conditioned souls to enable them to be redeemed through real worship of Godhead by means of their spiritualised equipments. This is the only true form of worship that is possible in this world. All other forms of worship are idolatries and their professors can be justly charged with the perpetration of the worst form of blasphemy.

WORLD TURMOIL

No one believes that war can be avoided. It is only a question of time. Not that there is any "war spirit" in any country in the world—barring Germany and perhaps one other—only they all feel themselves drawn, helpless victims into a horrible vortex of war. It was prophesied about the last great war that it would be the last war, the war to end all wars, that it would give birth to a new world. They said that life had become too frivolous, that the desire for pleasure, passion for money, contempt of virtue had overleaped all restraints. It was admitted that the war was a costly remedy but they said that the hoped for result was worth it. It was to sweep for ever into oblivion the seekers after sense-excitement, the sceptics and the destroyers of high endeavour. Even the preachers in the pulpit foreshadowed the emergence of a transformed humanity from that terrible ordeal.

"Bitter derision" writes a contributor to the Paris Christianisme an XXme Siecle, "On the very morrow of the day when the civilised world, shocked by the horrors of the world butchery, was making an heroic effort to liberate itself from the curse of war, and while the nations were gathered in solemn conference with the object of organising a lasting peace, new massacres were taking place on the other side of the planet. And today we are everywhere and everyday facing the infernal and insidious menace of war." The maladies of the nations are daily growing worse. The daily press of all the lands is full of forbodings. The earth is full of violence. Strikes are common, civil wars are threatened, organised dacoity is being committed by criminal bands in every country, justice is perverted, equity sneered at, and truth has fallen in the streets. The political strain between the nations has almost reached the breaking point, and while academic discussions on disarmament continue, from cushioned ease in luxurious chambers, the people of the East and of the West, both Far and Near, are out in the streets raising barricades for offence and defence. Listen to the nations' voices.

"The GERMAN nation needs room if it is not to suffocate. Germans too need air and sun," said General Goering the other day. How should be interpreted this? Is it their colonies only that they want to get back, or is it that they are also yearning after the pure air and sun of the Austrian Alps? Anyway their yearning is fraught with grave danger. "Every family in ITALY should dedicate at least one son to aviation," said General Guiseppe Valle, Under-Secretary for air, when announcing that Mussolini's eldest son had completed his pilot's course, and concluded, "I predict now an increase of the number of Italian pilots from 5,000 to 50,000. Signor Mussolini announced after the days he and Herr Hitler spent together that they had been in "intimate spiritual communion." It was guessed that the future of AUSTRIA was agreed upon and the "Eastern Locarno" disapproved. Later events, however, proved that the "Times" punning comment was justified. "Communion of spirits" would have been more appropriate. While Hitler and Mussolini are said to have disapproved of the "Eastern Locarno," RUSSIA is getting together with the Balkan and Baltic states. Mr. Stanley Baldwin recently warned the people of GREAT BRITAIN: "If you have this country divided into two private armies (Fascist and Communists) each desiring to go their own way by suppression, by force if necessary, you have then all the material for what we have not had for 300 years, and that is civil war." The gravity of the situation becomes apparent when we are told that the member of the Fascists in Britain is one million and that of the Communists something similar. The conference of British Admirals at Singapore is reported to have come to the decision of an immediate increase in the the AUSTRALIAN navy. "Britain felt compelled to abandon the sincere stand she took on behalf of disarmament" was the tenor of Mr. Baldwin's speach in the British House of Commons only a few weeks ago.

Walter Lippman writing in the AMERICAN Press on the situation in Europe says : "Europe's tragic moment has arrived. It would be vain to deny it. It is a situation in which force and not formula, power and not diplomacy, self-help and not place-pacts are the measures of what will and will not be done. It is a mad and sad world." Asia is not far behind Europe. TURKEY and PERSIA have put their heads together and Pan-Islamism is again in the air. Unhappy CHINA—diseased, suffering and groaning from internal anarchy—is a ready-made stage for Russian, Japanese and American ambitions and fears. "The entire nation (JAPAN) must be mobilised. There will be no discrimination between combatants and the non-combatants. The present civilisation is fast leading to this dreadful war," wrote Yosuka Matsoka in Osaka Nichi Nichi less than a year ago. The whole world is a chaos. NOT is INDIA out of the picture.

God, Spirit and Matter—their Inter-relation

[Substance of the speech delivered by His Holiness Tridandi Swami B. P. Tirtha Maharaj of Gaudiya Math on Sunday the 30th September, at 6-30 p. m. in the Math premises.]

Man is by nature religious. Whether he admits or not his indwelling monitor tells him that there is an existence of One unseen Power who is Omnipotent, Omniscient and Omnipresent and who rules this universe and guides the destinies of man. It is his natural aptitude and outward environments that exercise some influence on his nature and make him theist or atheist. His education is also a no small factor in the building of his character. The society in which he is born and brought up is mainly responsible for his future career. "Tell me the company you keep and I shall tell your character."

Those who believe in the existence of God, maintain that God is Great and He has none to vie or excel Him. Some opine that He is Impersonal and call Him Brahman (the Supreme Being) while others hold that He is a Personal God and designate Him Paramatma or Parameswara (the Supreme Personality). But whether He is Sakara (Personal) or Nirakara (Impersonal) it depends upon one's true knowledge of the real conception of the Godhead and this true knowledge is to be attained from a living source who has already realised Godhead and can make others realise Him, because human knowledge is limited and confined within the four walls of time and space and Godhead is purely transcendental. He is the Truth Absolute. So He is not comprehensible by limited human knowledge. Our limited knowledge can comprehend things of three dimensions and cannot conceive of anything or things beyond scope or jurisdiction of Time and Space. The Absolute Truth, therefore, reserves the absolute prerogative of not to be exposed to the present human sense-experience. Then how are we to realise Him ? He reveals Himself to him who surrenders himself to Him unconditionally and unreservedly and renders his loving service to Him whole-heartedly. If anyone, therefore, is willing to have a true conception of God, he must submit to such Absolute-realised soul and learn from him the transcendental knowledge regarding the true Nature, Form, Qualities, Deeds of the Supreme Lord and His Kingdom. An Absolute-realised soul is one who is in touch with the Supreme Lord, lives in Him, moves in Him and has his being in Him. He does not budge an inch from Him. He always communes with the Central Figure Who is All-Love, All-Beauty and All-Harmony. When the centre is fixed there is the circle and all radii (activities) drawn from the centre to the circumference are all equal. So an Absolute-realised soul is an inspired soul, living and moving in the central Head. Whatever he speaks, he speaks from within and not from without. Whatever he does, he does inspired by the Fountain Head and for His satisfaction. So his words and activities, ideas and thoughts are purely selfless and hence free from all defects such as error, inadvertence, inadequacy of sense-perception and deception. The words he utters are transcendental and hence identical with Godhead. But the words in the mundane plane are not identical with the things denoted by them. So those transcendental words entering into the ears of a willing listener eliminate all doubts, prejudices and accumulated heaps of limited experiences from his mind born of nescience or Avidya which has so long deprived him of acquiring true knowledge of Supreme Lord the Reality Absolute. And this is known as the process of descension or submission to the Divine Master in order of preceptorial succession as distinguished from the process of ascension or induction which consists in the complete reliance upon one's own individual experience acquired by sense-perception. Just as the sun is visible without the assistance of any external artificial light when his rays fall upon our unobstructed retina, so the Supreme Lord reveals Himself with all His Entourage out of His infinite mercy to him who really wants Him and consecrates all his activities, his life and properties and whatever he claims to be his own to the absolute service of the Divine Master. Just as the sun is reflected on transparent objects and not on opaque ones, so a transparent mind free from all mundane relativities is competent enough to receive the true light of Godhead and His kingdom. But a mind that is fidgety by nature and changeable in character cannot form any conception of God or His transcendental Kingdom which lies beyond the scope of mental speculation. Mind that meddles with matter is opaque and cannot, therefore, comprehend God who is Sat, (All Being). Chit (All Intelligence) and Ananda (All Bliss) or in other words He possesses a transcendental Being who is the Receptacle of all beauty, sweetness, truth and harmony. He is all attractive as He is all Love and the Fountain-head of all bliss. He is the beginningless as well as the cause of all causes. He is the Preserver in His Sattwa quality, Creator in His Raja quality and Destroyer in His Tama quality or attribute. He is the Supreme Enjoyer of all His potencies. He is the Absolute Proprietor of all His properties -the sentient and insentient worlds. Just as the rays of the sun emanate from the sun, exist in the sun and the sun exists in them and they are inseparably connected with the sun but are not identical with him, so the jeevas and the manifested phenomena eternally exist in the Supreme Being and He in them and they are inseparably connected with Him but are not identical with Him. This doctrine of simultaneous existence of distinction and non-distinction is known as Achintya Vedavel Tattwa as promulgated by the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya of Nadia, Bengal, some 450 years ago. It is Achintya because it is inconceivable to limited human reasoning. It is the key-note of the Vedanta philosophy as expounded in the Srimad Bhagabatam,—the Divine Book of authority of the true devotees of the Supreme Lord Sree Bhagawan.

Thakur Bhaktivinode as an Author

It is very difficult to understand the nature of Thakur Bhaktivinode's contribution to the world's literature of the Absolute Truth. The path of devotion is liable to be confounded with a surrender to the guidance of the emotional side of one's mundane nature. There are also the familiar arguments in support of persons who choose to follow the guidance of their emotions.

This unwarrantable view is responsible for that undue under-valuation of the two other sides of human nature which has produced disastrous moral con-equences in the ranks of the votaries of such emotionalism.

The writings of Thakur Bhaktivinode offer a perfectly clear exposition of the spiritual principle of bhakti. From the stand-point of art His writings are distinguished by the qualities of simplicity of style and precision, richness, and naturalness of vocabulary. He is a wonderfully well-informed writer. Almost every sentence that He has penned is reminiscent of some well-known text of the vast Shastric literature. Those who are acquainted with the philosophical and theological portions of the Sanskrit literature, would appreciate this classic quality of His writings. But Thakur Bhaktivinode is no less fully acquainted with the modern thought of the world. This combination of the old and new produces a never-failing impression of freshness and a keen expectation of real enlightenment. No person with any taste for the truth can refuse to be attracted by His illuminating pages. He is always almost severely condensed both in His thought and expression. But it never produces any sense of fatigue or loss of interest in the reader. It is possible to read His Jaiva Dharma almost with as much ease and interest as a high class modern novel. This is no mean praise for the charm and lightness of His style if we remember that the subject treated in that work is the whole field of religious enquiry by the comparative method.

But unequalled as the style of Jiava Dharma must certainly appear to all lovers of art, its thought is nothing short of a revelation. The Shastras are literally made to live and talk to us on a footing of unreserved familiarity. I can do no better than let the author speak for Himself by offering a few passages from His wonderful 'manual of the religion of all souls'. I take the passages from different parts of the book quite at random.

Brajanath—By the tern 'Vaishnava' am I to understand a Vaishnava who has renounced the world ?

Babaji—Every pure devotee of Krishna is a Vaishnava, whether he is a Grihastha or Griha-tyagi, a Brahmana or a Chandala, whether he is a rich and honoured person or neglected and poor. One is a Vaishnava to the extent that he possesses pure devotion to the Feet of Krishna.

Brajanath—You have said that jeevas in the grip of Maya are of five kinds. You have included sadhana-bhaktas and bhava-bhaktas also among fettered souls. At what stage of their spiritual progress are devotees counted among unfettered souls ?

Babaji—The jeeva is declared to be unfettered (Maya-mukta) as soon as his life of devotion begins. But the unfettered state that is identical with one's spiritual entity is realised only when one's spiritual novitiate is completed. Before spiritual maturity the unfettered state that is realised by the devotee consists only in the attainment of the function of one's proper self. It is only after the gross and subtle material bodies of the jeeva are completely detached from his entity that he attains the unfettered state that is identical with his spiritual ego. Bhava-bhakti manifests itself in due course through practice of sadhana-bhakti. The jeeva being firmly established in bhava-bhakti attains his spiritual body after giving up his subtle material and gross physical bodies. Therefore, the material or fettered state persists during the stages of sadhana-bhakti. The fettered state does not also fully disappear at the commencement of bhava-bhakti. These considerations explain why sadhan-bhaktas and bhava-bhaktas have been classed among the five kinds of fettered souls. Persons who are addicted to worldly life and those who desire for liberation are certainly among the five kinds of fettered souls. The emancipation, from the power of Maya, of unfettered souls is effected only by the service of Hari. The jeeva is put in fetters by Maya for the commission of offence. The fundamental offence of the jeeva is committed when he chooses to forget the fact that he is the servant of Krishna. He cannot be absolved from this offence without the mercy of Krishna. Therefore, there is no possibility of the attainment of the unfettered state without the Mercy of Krishna. The school of the Jnanins cherishes the belief that liberation is effected by the purification of one's cognitive essence. But such belief is unfounded. There can never be emancipation from the power of Maya except by the mercy of Krishna. This is supported by the two following slokas of Srimad Bhagabatam which give the conclusions of the Devatas (Bhagabat 10/2/33-34).

"Madhava, Thy devotees are firmly encompassed by the bonds of Thy affection. Therefore, there is no fear of their losing their foot-hold on the path of bhakti and falling from their high state, the danger to which persons, who are votaries of liberation, are unavoidably exposed. Lord, Thy devotees, being fully protected by Thyself, walk fearlessly in the path of Thy service by making the destroyers of worldly dangers their foot-stools".

Brajanath—Which kinds of devotees of Krishna are eligible for realising the service of Rasa ?

Goswami—To begin with they may be divided into the two orders of the sadhakas and siddhas.

Brajanath—Who are the sadhakas ?

Goswami—The sadhakas are those in whom the disposition to serve Krishna has manifested itself but yet in whom all adverse tendencies have not yet been fully neutralised. Devotees exhibiting these characteristics are also eligible for obtaining the sight of Krishna. They are, therefore, eligible to serve Him as sadhakas. Devotees in the intermediate position (madhyama bhaktas), referred to in the sloka of the Bhagabata (Bhag. 11/2/46), are such sadhakas.

Brajanath – Master, may not those devotees who are referred to in the sloka of Bhagabata (11/2/47) be eligible for the service of Rasa ?

Goswami—They are not eligible to be sadhakas of rasa till they become pure devotees by the mercy of suddha bhaktas. Persons like Bilvamangala alone can really be sadhakas of rasa.

Brajanath—You have said that Brahma has taught the Word through the succession of his disciples. Is it supported by the evidence of the Veda ?

Babaji—Yes, it is. We find it in the Mundaka (Mundaka. 1/1/1) that "Brahma was the first of the devas to appear (from the Navel Lotus of Vishnu) as creator and protector of the world. He declared the Brahmavidya, which is the basis of all vidyas, to Atharva, his eldest-born". Also in Mundaka 1-13, "He instructed him in the principle of the Brahmavidya by means of which one can know the Eternal, Immutable Person".

Brajanath—The Rishis have explained in the Smriti shastra the real meaning of the statements of the Veda. Is there any evidence in support of this view ?

Babaji—We find the following in Srimad Bhagabata (11/14-3), the crest-jewel of all the Shastras : (Sree Bhagawan said) "O Uddhaba, that by which attachment to Me is produced, which contains instruction in this natural function of the soul, which I declared to Brahma at the beginning of Brahma Kalpa, the self-same Word, in the form of the Veda, has been hidden by time on the occasion of the Cataclysm. It is this which was told by yourself to your first-born son, Manu".

Brajanath—Why was the sampradaya system instituted ?

Babaji—In this world most persons walk in the path of evil through the offence of professing the cult of illusionism (mayavada). If there is no sampradaya (organised society) of those devotees who are free from the offence of mayavada it is hardly possible for a person to find the society of really good people. It is for this reason that it is recorded in the Padma Purana that "no mantras become efficacious unless they are imparted by the order of the Acharyas who are recognised by the spiritual sampradayas: Sree (Ramanuja), Brahma (Madhva), Rudra (Vishnuswami), Chatuhsana (Nimbarka) are the originators of the four spiritual sampradayas. Vaishnavas, belonging to these sampradayas, are the saviours of the world".

Among these sampradayas the Brahma Sampradaya is the oldest. From Brahma the sampradaya has continued intact to this day. There is no possibility of interpolation in the spiritual shastra such as the Veda, Vedanga, Vedanta, etc., that have been handed down by the order of the Gurus within the sampradaya. Therefore, there can be no doubt in regard to the mantras of the Veda that are found in the books recognised by the sampradaya. The sampradaya arrangement is absolutely necessary. It is for this reason that from the beginning of time organised spiritual association has been continuing intact among the sadhus.

Brajanath—Has the sampradaya-succession been fully preserved ?

Babaji—The names of the principal Acharyas who have appeared from time to time have been preserved in the order of the succession of the teachers of the sampradaya.

Kalidas Lahiri—Devi, you have read a good deal and have received high education. But that is not enough. You should now seek the real good of your soul.

Devi Vidyaratna – Dear father, it is with great hopes that I have come here with the object of inducing you to return home with me from Sree Godruma. All of us would be very glad if you could kindly visit home for a time. It is particularly the wish of my mother to greet your feet.

Lahiri—I have thrown myself on the protection of the feet of the Vaishnavas. I have resolved not to go back to the home that is opposed to the practice of bhakti. Is it not proper that you should turn Vaishnava before you expect to take me home ?

Devi—Dear father, how may you command in this manner ? There is regular worship of God in our home. We do not disesteem the Name of Hari. We always serve chance guests and Vaishnavas if they avail our hospitality. How then are we not Vaishnavas ?

Lahiri—Although there is similarity between your activities and those of the Vaishnavas, yet you are not Vaishnavas.

Devi—Dear father, how can we then become Vaishnavas ?

Lahiri– You may become Vaishnavas if you accept the eternal function of the soul by giving up all conditional activity.

Devi—I have a doubt. Be pleased to solve it. The functions of listening, chanting, recollecting, tending the Feet, worshipping Sree Murti, prostrating oneself, performing manual service, practising friendship and self-surrender, in short, those functions that are performed by the Vaishnavas also contain much activity that is mixed up with mundane elements. Why are not such functions also conditional ? I detect a certain degree of partiality in making such distinction in favour of the Vaishnavas. The worship of Sree Murti, fasting, worship by means of material things, are material activities. How can they be eternal ?

Lahiri—My dear, it took also me a long time to understand this thing. Try to understand fully what I am going to tell you. There are two classes of men viz., those that do not look beyond this world and those who seek for the highest good. The former devote all their efforts in search of worldly happiness, worldly honour and worldly prosperity. The latter consist of three distinct groups viz., those who obey God, those who seek for knowledge and those who seek for the fulfilment of their desires. The last group are addicted to the enjoyment of the fruits of their good works. This class expect to secure super-natural results by their good works. The means for attainment of this end are sacrifice and yoga. According to this view even if Iswara (God as Master) is admitted to exist, he is conceived as subject to good works. All scientific persons belong to this class. Those who are given to abstract speculations employ the process for the purpose of attaining the nature of the Brahman. These people do not trouble about the existence of any Iswara. Yet they also postulate an Iswara as a means. They expect to obtain the fruit of knowledge by practising devotion to such Iswara. On the attainment of knowledge there is no further necessity for continuing to worship Iswara. Worship of Iswara in this system is also a means and is practised before the attainment of knowledge. Devotion to Iswara is transformed into knowledge at the time of fruition. According to this view Iswara and devotion to Iswara are not eternal. Those persons who obey God form the third class of seekers of the highest good. As a matter of fact this group alone really seek for the highest good. According to these there is one beginningless, endless Iswara. He has created individual souls and matter by His own energy. All individual souls are His eternal servants. The activity of rendering Him eternal obedience is also the eternal function of all individual souls. But the individual soul can do nothing by his own power. Good works do not yield eternal result to the soul. By the practice of abstract speculations the conception of the eternal objective of the soul undergoes perversion. All natural requirements of the soul are realised by the Mercy of Iswara only if one serves Iswara by the method of unconditional obedience. The other two groups are designated karmakandins and jnanakandins. The third group are exclusive devotees of Iswara. The karmakandins and the jnanakandins vainly think that they are seekers of highest good. As a matter of fact their vision is limited to this world. They are, therefore, seekers of temporary results. All the different modes of religious endeavour which they practise are also for the purpose of gaining temporary objects of desire.

Now-a-days the Saivas, Shaktas, Ganapatyas and Shauras follow jnana-kanda. The listening to and chanting of keertana are performed by them for obtaining merely liberation and finally identification with the Brahman. Those who do not seek for enjoyment or liberation by the practice of listening to and chanting of keertana really worship Vishnu in those different images. The Form of God is eternally of the essence of chit (absolute cognition) and possessed of all powers. If the Object of worship is not the possessor of all excellence, such worship is rendered to temporal entities. My dear, the image of Bhagawan that is worshipped by you is also not the Bhagawan Who is worshipped by seekers of the highest good. It is so because you do not admit the Eternal Form of Bhagawan. And, therefore, you do not obey Iswara. You have now probably been able to grasp the difference between the eternal and temporary worship.

Devi—Yes, if the Image of Bhagawan is not admitted to be eternal and if nevertheless an image is worshipped such worship cannot be the worship of any eternal entity. Is not some other form of eternal entity sought to be realised by temporary worship?

Lahiri—Even supposing that to be possible, your mode of worship cannot be regarded as eternal function. The worship of the Eternal Image in the Vaishnava religion is, however, the eternal function.

Spiritual Enlightenment

How to have it?

By Madhusudan Chatterjee

As soon as the word spiritual enlightenment is uttered two things appear before our mind's eye viz:—the idea of a spiritual guide and that of a disciple. In the material world we find that there are different branches of knowledge such as Literature, History, Economics, Chemistry, Physics, Music, fine arts, etc., and if one is desirous of mastering any of these subjects he has to find out a specialist and submit himself to his directions. It is then and then only that he has a chance of acquiring a thorough knowledge of such a subject.

Now the Upanishad tells us that द्वे विद्ये वेदितव्ये परा अपरा च i, e, there are two kinds of knowledge viz., mundane and spiritual. Mundane knowledge means knowledge of the things of this material world acquired by experiment and observation through the gateways of our five senses of sight, hearing, smell, taste and touch. Spiritual knowledge is knowledge of the Absolute Truth who is God. Just as mastery over a particular branch of the material science is possible only by association with one who is an adept in his subject, so spiritual knowledge also can be had only by coming in contact with a person who is actually in possession of the Absolute Truth. So we read in the Mundaka Upanishad (1/2/12)—तद्विज्ञानार्थं स गुरुमेवाभिगच्छेत् 'for knowing God, the disciple should go to the Guru or Specialist who is to be well-versed in the scriptures and must not have any other occupation than wholetime service of Godhead.

Such a true spiritual Guide will teach the really sincere disciple, approaching Him with humility and submission with an ardent desire to know the Absolute, Who God is, what he, the disciple in reality is, what his relationship with Godhead is, what the material world and the things in it are, what his duty towards God is and what the summum-bonum or the highest good of life is. Imparting this knowledge of God is what is called spiritual enlightenment or Diksha. It has been thus defined in the Vishnujamal :—

दिव्यं ज्ञानं यतो दद्यात् कुर्य्यात् पापस्य संक्षयम् ।
तस्माद्दीक्षेति सा प्रोक्ता देशिकैस्तत्त्वकोविदैः ॥

'The specialist call that process Diksha by which one attains spiritual knowledge and by which all his sins are totally destroyed'. So the following two conditions require to be fully satisfied before there can be anything like real Diksha or spiritual enlightenment viz :—(1) The Guru must be a true one possessing a real knowledge of the Divinity. (2) The disciple must be a real and sincere seeker of the Absolute Truth, and for this purpose he must submit himself entirely and unconditionally to the directions of the spiritual Guide.

Unless these two conditions are fulfilled there cannot be the attainment of the result viz: the acquisition of spiritual knowledge on the part of the disciple. If even after approaching a Guru one finds that he is not having divine knowledge he should put to himself the question, 'Have I failed to be sincere in dealings with our Guru ?' If he is satisfied that there has been no insincerity on his part and that he has tried his level best to follow the directions of his Guru in all respects the only conclusion to which he should be driven is that he has not been fortunate enough to be favoured with the sight of a real Sat-Guru. He should shun the company of such Guru and prey to God to help him in finding out a real Sat Guru.

God, who is all-merciful, seeing his sincerity will be pleased to send the true Sat-Guru to him in proper time. The only thing necessary is to have faith in God and to prey sincerely for His mercy. There is absolutely no fear for a really sincere person. Thus a statement like, "So and so was a really good person but by falling into the clutches of a bad Guru he has been ruined", although it is so very popular and so often heard in this world, is really one of the greatest 'common errors' of religion. For in the Geeta (4/8) the Supreme Lord Himself has said :—

परित्राणाय साधूनां विनाशाय च दुष्कृताम्।
धर्म्मसंस्थापनार्थाय सम्भवामि युगे युगे ॥

'I appear in this world from time to time to save the really good and to destroy the wicked'. So if we can have any faith in this Divine assurance we will no longer be found to utter such inconsistent words as that a good man is ruined. If any one is found to have met with his ruin we should know that it is all the result of his own misdeeds and that no other person is in any way responsible for it.

First Opposition to door-to-door Preaching

[The conversion of Jagai and Madhai]

(Adopted from Sree Chaitanya Bhagabat)

I humbly prostrate myself to Lord Sree Goura Sundara and Lord Sree Nityananda. I make my obeisance to the two Lords who are embodiments of Divine mercy descended to this mundane plane ; who are supreme benefactors of the world and the first promulgators of Samkeertana.

In this manner Lord Vishvambhara, who upholds everything, played his charming pastimes in holy Nabadwip. But those blissful activities had not yet been made visible to all the people. So the people continued to look upon Nimai Pandit as formerly. They could find nothing new or extraordinary about His conduct. But the Lord threw up all reserve when He was in the company of His devotees in the privacy of the courtyard of Sribas Pandit. There He showed Himself in His proper form. But even so one can see only that much of Him as one is destined by one's good fortune. But the Lord hid Himself completely when He came among the people.

One day the Lord suddenly changed His method. He called unto Him Nityananda and Haridas,

The Lord said, "Mark my words, Nityananda and Haridas. I command you both to divulge my purpose to everybody. Go to every household and make this entreaty,—"Say Krishna, serve Krishna, learn Krishna". Say exactly those very words. Come back to me in the evening after the day's work and tell me what you do during each day. If any person refuses to say 'Krishna', being entreated by you, then I will cut down all those persons with my Sudarshana Chakra (literally discus of good vision)".

The Vaishnavas could not restrain their laughter when they learnt the Lord's command. But nobody dared refuse to comply with the entreaties of Nityananda.

So Nityananda and Haridas went from door-to-door of Nadia in their merry mood. Both were sanyasins. They entreated every person 'to say Krishna, to sing Krishna, to serve Krishna' as Krishna is life, treasure and object of love and, therefore, worthy of being chanted with whole-hearted devotion.

As soon as they presented themselves at the door of a householder the latter, by reason of his reverence for the holy garb of sanyasins, invited them to accept the alms of food. But Nityananda and Haridas said that the only alms for which they begged was that they should "Say Krishna, serve Krishna, learn Krishna". After making this request the two sanyasins would move away to the next household.

The effect was extraordinary and by no means favourable in every case. Every one confessed that no one had ever seen such beggars in Nadia. Those who were pleased with their exhortations gladly assented to their request. Some people took a less favourable view. What they said was this, "These two persons have turned mad by evil association. They are now out to make others mad. Many good and decent persons have lost their wits in the same way. Nimai Pandit is the root of all this mischief". Some persons threatened to beat the sanyasins as soon as they presented themselves at their doors. They were those who had not been allowed to enter the court-yard of Sribas for witnessing the dance of Chaitanya. There were not wanting people who were even more suspicious. These people thought that the sanyasins were thieves in disguise. 'No good men', they said, 'would have advertised themselves in that shameless fashion. They should be hauled up before the Kazi as bad characters'.

These different opinions were not unknown to the two begging sanyasins. But they were not discouraged, because they had been doing what they had been commanded by Chaitanya. They continued to go about the streets begging from door-to-door all through the day, and at sun-down would report the day's happenings to Lord Vishvambhara.

One day they fell in with two notorious robbers in the public street. The ruffians were under the influence of drink and were abusing and beating those on whom they could lay their hands. Nityananda and Haridas saw them from a distance. They found out from the people what they were.

Nityananda then said to Haridas, "I beseech you to have pity on these ruffians. If you are minded to be merciful the Lord cannot be otherwise. The whole world should then be able to see that the Lord has power to save the worst of sinners".

Haridas, who knew the power of Nityananda, replied, "The Lord's wish is ever same as yours. You are always deceiving me, as a person deceives foolish animals. But you do so to teach me what I always forget".

Nityananda laughed as he embraced Haridas. He then said softly, "We go about only as bearers of the command of the Lord. Let us deliver the same to these drunkards. The Lord commands everybody to serve Krishna and particularly wishes that His command might be conveyed to the very worst sinners. We have only to say what He commands. If they do not accept His command the responsibility is on the Lord".

Nityananda and Haridas went forward to those two ruffians for communicating to them the command of the the Lord. Good men tried to dissuade them. They said, "Donot go near them lest you lose your lives as they will certainly kill you if they get hold of you. It is for fear of our lives that we always keep at a distance from them. Donot be foolhardy. Donot go near them, as they have no respect for sanyasins. They have killed Brahmanas and cows without number".

But the two preachers did not stop. On the contrary they were encouraged by such opposition in their desire to meet those two ruffians. When they arrived within hearing distance, they accosted Jagai and Madhai and told them the command of the Lord. They said, "Say Krishna, serve Krishna, take the Name of Krishna. Krishna is our mother, father, treasure and life. Krishna has appeard in this world for our sake. We beseech you to serve Krishna by giving up evil ways".

Those two ruffians heard the words addressed to them by the preachers. At that time they were lying on the street. As soon as the voice of the preacher reached their ears both of them raised their heads. They saw at a short distance the figures of the two sanyasins. The sight of the preachers was enough to provoke their anger. They jumped to their feet and with blood-shot eyes rushed towards the sanyasins with the purpose to kill them.

Nityananda and Haridas in apparent consternation now ran for their lives. The robbers chased them, threatening to kill them if they did not stop. The preachers did not heed their request and ran as first as they could.

Their danger drew upon the preachers the remarks of the people. Some said, "We forbade them to go near those ruffians. It is a bad day for the two sanyasins". All the pashandis were glad in their hearts thinking that Narayana had meted out the proper punishment to those hypocrites. The good Brahmanas prayed to Krishna to save the sanyasins. But all persons hurriedly left the place for fear of Jagai and Madhai.

Nityananda and Haridas continued to run till they reached the home of the Lord. The two robbers also ran after them, but they were under the influence of drink. They halted when they lost sight of the sanyasins when the latter sought refuge in the house of the Lord. They quickly forgot all about the sanyasins and began to fight for fun with one another. They were in that state of intoxication in which they could not retain any recollection of place or person.

Nityananda and Haridas, after a short interval, came out of the house and looked in the street for the robbers. But they were gone.

The preachers reported their exciting experience to Lord Vishvambhara. Gangadhar and Srinivas, who were present, said that they were the sons of a good Brahmana and were born-ruffians. Their names were Jagai and Madhai.

The Lord said, "I know them very well. I will end their pranks if I find them here". Nityananda said, "I am afraid to go out so long as those two are at large. If You can deliver those two I shall admit it to be a greater feat than even my own deliverance". Lord Vishvambhara smiled as he said, "They were delivered the moment they were blessed with your sight. As you are so particular for their good there can be no doubt that Krishna will be merciful to them in no time".

Those two drunkards continued to prowl about the streets. They came to the bathing-ghat of the Ganges where the Lord used to have his daily bath. They hang about the place for some time. No bather now ventured to come there after dusk. The fellows continued to stay on in the neighbourhood of the Lord's house during the nights. They kept awake the whole night listening to the keertan. They danced to the tune of the music of the sankeertan, and drank and made merry. Once when they saw the Lord they said to Him, "Your songs, Nimai Pandit, are most excellent. Please do not give it up till you have finished singing all the songs of Mangalchandi. Tell us when you want anything. We shall get everything for you". But the Lord did not care to meet those wicked persons any more. The people fled by different paths as soon as they caught sight of Jagai and Madhai.

But one day as Nityananda was returning at nightfall, after his day's preaching, to the house of the Lord, Jagai and Madhai stopped him saying, "Why do you come this way ?" Nityananda said, "I am going to the house of the Lord". "What is your name ?" they angrily demanded. Nityananda replied, "My name is Abadhuta (super-ascetic)". Madhai forthwith struck at the head of Nityananda with his fist. The violence of the blow caused an wound which bled profusely. This made Lord Nityananda recollect the Name of Krishna. But the sight of blood moved Jagai to pity. He restrained Madhai when the latter attempted to strike again, and expostulated, "You are very cruel. Why did you do this ? What is the good of killing a stranger ? Let the Abadhuta go. Don't strike him again. You will surely come to grief if you kill a sanyasi".

The people ran to the Lord in great fear and informed him of the danger of Nityananda. Lord Vishvambhara then came out with all His associates and found Nityananda covered with blood and smiling, as he stood between those two fellows.

The sight of blood angered the Lord and He summoned repeatedly the Chakra, the dread weapon of Vishnu, which nothing can withstand. In obedience to the command of the Lord the Sudarshana Chakra appeared at once on the scene, and Jagai and Madhai actually saw the beautiful discus of the Lord. Vaishnavas realised the imminence of danger. But Nityananda anxiously interposed.

Nityananda said, "Lord, Jagai protected me when Madhai was about to strike. It is by an accident that blood has been shed. I have not suffered any pain. I beg, O Lord, for the bodies of these two fellows. I am not at all pained. May Thou be pleased to forego Thy wrath".

When the Lord heard that Jagai had protected Nityananda He was very much pleased, and embraced Jagai. He said to Jagai, "May Krishna be merciful to you. You have made me thy own by defending Nityananda. Whatever boon you ask is yours. May you from this day have loving devotion to the Feet of Krishna".

No sooner did the Lord pronounce these words than a most strange thing happened. Jagai at once fell into a deep swoon overwhelmed with the joy of love for the Lord which he experienced for the first time. He wept aloud, clasping the Feet of the Lord.

No sooner did Jagai receive the Mercy of the Lord the mind of Madhai also experienced a chastening influence; and Madhai hastily quitted his hold of the apparel of Nityananda and fell prostrate at the Feet of the Lord. "We two have sinned in company, O Lord", said Madhai with a strange emotion, "Why then dost Thou, O Lord, make a difference in awarding Thy mercy? Have pity on me that I may also take Thy Name. There is no one else who can deliver me".

The Lord said, "You have committed a great offence. Seek forgiveness at the feet of Nityananda".

On being commanded by the Lord Madhai clasped the feet of Nityananda, that have the quality of saving the worst of sinners.

Lord Vishvambhara pleaded the cause of Madhai, "May it please Lord Nityananda to have mercy on Madhai who seeks forgiveness at his feet. He struck you and shed your blood. May you be pleased to forgive him as he entreats your mercy".

Nityananda felt embarrassed. He said, "I give to Madhai any merit that I may have had by my good deeds in any birth. I absolve him from every offence towards me. But I beseech Thee, O Lord, to have mercy on Madhai and not to confound him. He is really Thine".

Lord Vishvambhara was pleased and said, "If, indeed, you really forgive him I pray that you may be pleased to embrace him for his deliverance".

By the Lord's command Nityananda held Madhai to his bosom in a close embrace, and, lo, instantly all the worldly bonds of Madhai were unloosened.

The Lord said to Jagai and Madhai, "You must not commit any more sins". Jagai and Madhai now felt the greatest repugnance towards their former evil course of life and replied, with a sincere resolve, "We confess to Thee, O Lord, that we have no mind to offend and we will never do it again".

A Lesson from the Episode of Chand Kazi

(II)

Critic—It is absurd !

Apologist—What is absurd ?

Critic—To try to make a religion stand on miracles.

Apologist—Is that the sole ground of your objection ?

Critic—The arguments !

Apologist—That about the bull ?

Critic—Is not that silly ?

Apologist—No, considering the party to whom it was spoken.

Critic—But what do you think of 'Sankeertan' itself ?

Apologist—Excellent, for propaganda purposes.

Critic—I suppose the Kazi also danced.

Apologist—Do you believe in spiritual life and conversion ?

Critic—I know only the life that I lead. I do not think it could be mended further by any form of conversion or by any external agency. It is in my own power to make or mar my life. Why was the Kazi converted ? Was it through fear ?

Apologist—The Kazi might have felt the force of the personality of Lord Gaur Hari.

Critic—But why did he admit His mercy ?

Apologist—Could he not believe that Lord Gaur Hari was God Himself.

Critic—But what was the basis of his faith ?

Apologist—The personality of Lord Gaur Hari was itself the basis.

Critic—There is no evidence of personality, in the spiritual sense, in these activities.

Apologist—But if the personality of God is really incomprehensible how can you expect it to be similar to that of the great men of this world ? Should it not be always a hidden affair ?

Critic—What is the necessity of a religion that does not point to any thing that is really intelligible and valuable ?

Apologist—Is religion a means or is it the end ?

Critic—Then these events were superfluous ?

Apologist—I hate to interpret.

Critic—Because you really can't.

Apologist—Let me try if only to put you to shame once for all.

Critic—Try by answering my questions. Really, why do the Hindus think so highly of such a story ?

Apologist—They have a different conception of spiritual proprieties from yours. I think they are right and you are wrong.

Critic—Were these miracles ?

Apologist—Yes and no.

Critic—How can you say they are not miracles ?

Apologist—The Kazi alone could see what is described. It is for this reason that he alone was converted and not the other Moslems.

Critic—What did the Kazi see ?

Apologist—Let us trace it from the beginning of the story.

Critic—Why did he break the Mridanga ?

Apologist—He thought of the Sankeertan as an ignorant but honest Moslem should think of it.

Critic—It is extravagant and vulgar.

Apologist—The Kazi thought it was a nuisance. But he also thought that it was dangerous.

Critic—What danger could he possibly find in it.

Apologist—He found the danger in the attitude of the citizens. The masses were learning to adore Lord Gaur Hari. This was a menace to his own authority.

Critic—Are the miracles a disguised way of expressing the power of the masses which really compelled the Kazi to pretend to be friendly and even to join in the Sankeertan ?

CHAPTER 1

The eternal and causal functions of a Jiva

1. Asia is pre-eminently the greatest continent in the whole world and India stands foremost in Asia, and the finest in India is the land of Gaud, and the most beautiful tract of land in Gaud is the nine-island-region called Navadwip, in one part of which stands eternally the lovely hamlet of Sree Godroom on the east bank of the Ganges. In the days of yore many an adept in worshipful service used to live here and there in the groves of Sree Godroom. Not very far from the arbour where Sree Surabhi, the Divine Cow of yore worshipped the Supreme Lord Sree Gaur-Sundar, was a holy cot of devotion named the grove of Pradyumna, after the name of Pradyumna Brahmacharin, a personal attendant of Sree Gaur-Sundar. There his disciple Paramahamsa Sree Premdas Babaji Maharaj used to spend his days in ceaseless confidential service of the Supreme Lord in his cottage densely covered with creepers.

2. Being versed in all the Scriptures, Sree Premdas Babaji resorted to, with singleness of mind, the grove of Sree Godroom, one and the same with Sree Nandagrama in the district of Mathura. Chanting the Holy Name two lakhs a day, numberless prostrated obeisances to all the Vaishnavas and strictness in the begging of alms for bare living, were the daily routine of his life. His spare moments were spent not in idle gossips but in reading Prembiharta, the famous Divine Lyric, written by Pandit Sree Jagadananda, one of the most favourite associates of Sree Gaur Sundar. When he read that holy book, tears of love rolled down his cheeks and the neighbouring devotees of his stamp used to come and listen to him with devotional aptitude. And why not? The book was so full of themes of Rasa (liquid mellowness), and, to crown all, his mode of reading was so sweet and attractive that it dissipated the fiery venoms of abject worldliness from the minds of his devotional listeners.

3. One afternoon, after finishing the full counts of his beads, when Paramahamsa Babaji was reading 'Prembibarta' in his shady bower covered with madhabi climbing plants, deeply absorbed in the ocean of ecstasy, a sanyasin of the fourth stage came to him and fell down at his feet. At this, he soon came to his consciousness and, finding the sanyasin in that plight, prostrated himself before him and began to sob with abject lowliness of heart, saying, "O my Lord Chaitanya ! O my Lord Nityananda ! have mercy on this vile wretch ;" and then turning to the ascetic, thus accosted him, "What makes you, Lord, to shame me, lowly and wretched as I am ?" Taking the dust of his feet the ascetic took his seat on a cushion made of banana barks. Paramahamsa Babaji also sat by him and asked him, "What service can I render thee, O lord ?" Leaving aside his staff and bowl, the ascetic thus replied.

4. "My Lord ! I am the most unfortunate fellow in the whole world who, having spent the greater portion of his life in vastly studying the systems of Sankhya, Patanjali, Logic, Vaishesik of Kanada, Purbamimansa of Jaimini and Uttaramimansa or the Vedanta of Vyasa, as well as the Upanishadas, in various shrines, such as Benares, and in wrangling logomachy with the Pandits, renounced the world and assumed sanyasa and its staff from His Holiness Sreela Satchidananda Saraswati of Benares twelve years ago ; and, during my travel all over India, I visited all the shrines and associated with all the Shankara sanyasins of India. Passing over the three stages of 'Kutichaka', 'Vahudaka', 'Hamsa', I thought I reached the fourth stage of 'Paramahamsa', and resorted to, in pious velleities, the words of Shankara, "I am Brahman", "Pure intelligence is Brahman", "Thou art that" etc, at Benares. One day a Vaishnava saint was seen passing by me chanting the Holy Name and Deeds of Sree Hari, bathed in tears of ecstasy, his whole body thrilling with joy, his voice choked as he uttered the Holy Name of Sree Krishna-Chaitanya Prabhu Nityananda, and his feet tottered as he danced in ecstasy. The holy personage as well as the song did send in me such a thrill of ineffable delight that it simply beggars description ; but the pity was that I could not talk with him lest my dignity of a Paramahamsa should be at stake. Alas ! fie to me ! fie to my rank ! since that day, I do not know why my heart is forcibly drawn to the Lotus Feet of Sree Krishna-Chaitanya. With great avidity the Vaishnava saint was searched, but unfortunately was found nowhere ; I could distinctly understand that the unstinted delight at what I saw and heard was never experienced before. I never knew beforehand that such an unspeakable joy can ever exist in human life. I, therefore, thought it expedient to resort to the feet of a Vaishnava. I left Benares and went to Sreedham Brindaban and saw many sincere devotees there lamenting over the holy names of Sree Rupa, Sree Sanatana and Sree Jiva Goswami, meditating on the Divine Pastimes of Sree Sree Radha-Krishna and rolling on the dust out of love for Navadwip for which a yearning naturally arose in my mind. Gyrating 84 crosh (168 miles) of Sreedham Mathura-Brindaban I reached Sreedham Mayapur some days ago, where I have had the fortune of hearing the Divine Glory of Thy Holy Feet and taking shelter in them to-day. Pray, bless me with Thy causeless mercy as one of Thy unworthy humble servants".

5. Considering himself humbler than a blade of grass and with tears in his eyes, Paramahamsa Babaji said, "O Sanyasi Thakur ! I am the vilest of all creatures ; my life was spent in vain in eating, sleeping and gossiping ; and now I deemed it prudent to spend the remainder of my life in taking shelter in the sportive realms of Sree Krishna-Chaitanya. But, to my utter misfortune, I could not realise what Krishna-Prema (love for Krishna) really is. I thank you as much as you have tasted it even for a moment gazing at a Vaishnava. You really deserve the Grace of Sree Krishna-Chaitanya. I shall be thankful if you kindly remember me, this poor wretch, when you taste the sweetness of Krishna-Prema'. With this he clasped the Sanyasi Thakur in his warm embrace and bathed him in tears of affection and love. The touch from a Vaishnava sent a thrill of unprecedented joy in the heart of the Sanyasi Thakur who began to dance and sing thus,—

'All glory to Sree Krishna-Chaitanya and Sree Prabhu Nityananda,
All glory to the Divine Master Premdas,
all glory to him,
the Delight Incarnate of worshipful service'.

6. The chanting and dancing went on for a while, after which both of them took rest and had a long talk with each other. Premdas Babaji then said with all humility,—"O great soul ! I would you live here for a few days and sanctify me with your presence". "I consecrate myself to Thy Lotus Feet", replied the Sanyasi Thakur. "Not to speak of a few days, may I serve Thee till my last breath ?"

7. The Sanyasi Thakur is well versed in all Scriptures. He knew well the beneficial effect of spiritual training during spiritual pupilage under a spiritual master. So he was glad to stay there for a few days. Some time after, Paramahamsa Babaji said to him, "O great soul ! I received my initiation from His Divine Grace Paramahamsa Sree Pradyumna Brahmachari Thakur who is now lost in the worship of Sree Sree Nrisimhadeva in the village of Sree Devapalli lying at the south-east corner of Sree Navadwip circle. Let us go and see His Lotus Feet t -day after finishing our begging. "As thou pleasest", was the reply from the Sanyasi Thakur. "I'll do as I am bid".

8. They reached the village of Devapalli at two in the afternoon, crossing the river Alakananda and Suryateela, and saw the Lord's associate Sree Pradyumna Brahmacharin in the temple of Sree Nrisimhadeva. From a reasonable distance Paramahamsa Babaji made his prostrated obeisances to his Divine Master who came out of the temple and, being too full of the milk of divine kindness and affection to his disciple, held and hugged him (Babaji Maharaj) in his loving embrace and asked him how he fared in his worship. After a long good discourse, the Sanyasi Thakur was introduced by Paramahamsa Babaji to his Divine Master who expressed his delight for his (Sanyasi Thakur's) receiving such a genuine master, and asked him to learn 'Prembibarta' from him (Babaji Maharaj) saying, 'He who is well versed in the Transcendental Knowledge of Krishna is a Guru, be he a Brahmin or a Sanyasi or a Shudra' (Ch. Ch. 11. 8. 127).

9. The Sanyasi Thakur also offered his most humble greetings to the Lotus Feet of his Grand Master and said, "O Lord ! Thou art the associate of the Supreme Lord Sree Chaitanya. A kind glance from Thee can sanctify hundreds of arrogant Sanyasins like myself. Have mercy on me". The Sanyasi Thakur was quite ignorant of the reciprocal dealings accorded by a devotional circle of friends. He saw the good rule of life that exists between a Guru and a Parama-Guru, and later acted accordingly. After seeing the evening wave-offering to the Deity Nrisimhadeva they came back to Godroom.

10. Things went on for some time in this way after which the Sanyasi Thakur was desirous of knowing the truth. He looked like a Vaishnava in all respects but one, and that was his dress. He had already acquired perfect steadiness in Brahman by controlling his inner and other senses. Over and above, he was now imbued with the firm conviction of the spiritual pastimes of the Supreme Lord and 'a corresponding lowliness of heart which automatically graced his dignified character.

11. One early morning when the crimson rays of the sun were tinging the eastern horizon with their purple hue, Paramahamsa Babaji sat down in his Madhabi-grove with his rosary, keeping counts of his beads, his eyes overflowed with profuse tears of love arising from the recollection of the Transcendental Pastimes of the Divine Couple in the morning when they were about to be separated from each other, and he began to lose his consciousness deeply absorbed in his the-then-confidential service with his perfect body. The Sanyasi Thakur, who was close by, was deeply impressed with those Sattwik sentiments of Paramahamsa Babaji who said to him, "Friend! benumb the monkey or her chanting will disturb the cosy sleep of the Divine Youthful Couple, to the great displeasure of my friend Lalita who, I am afraid, will take me to task for such dereliction. Look here, my friend Ananga-manjari is also beckoning to this effect. You are Raman-manjari. This is thy service meted out to you. Look sharp." Saying this Paramahamsa Babaji lost his consciousness. Thus acquainted with the service in his perfect body the Sanyasi Thakur was all attention to his respective service since then. The day dawned and the morning twilight spread its brilliant lustre in the east. The whole atmosphere was surcharged with the melodious songs of birds. The gentle breeze was blowing all around. The picturesque beauty of the Madhabi-grove of the Pradyumna Kunja was simply indescribable when the first ray of crimson light made its appearance at the gate.

12. Paramahamsa Babaji was seated on a cushion of banana bark, and, regaining his consciousness, began to chant the Holy Name.: The Sanyasi Thakur, in the mean time, made his prostrated obeisance to the feet of his Gurudeva, and, sitting close by, thus spoke with folded hands,—"O Lord! may Thy humble servant venture to ask a question hoping to be cooled down with the answer from Thy gracious self? Be thou graciously pleased to infuse the nectarine liquid mellowness of Braja into this agonising heart scorched by the fire of the principle of attributeless Brahman?" "You do deserve to be blessed; and suitable reply you shall have of your questions," replied Babaji Maharaj.

13. The Sanyasi Thakur said,—"O Lord! hearing the celebrity of religion above all, I have asked many an adept in religious love about the principle of religion, but sorry to say, the answers I received were at variance with one another.

Q. 1. Wouldst thou mind to tell me what religion or the real nature of a Jiva is? Why the teachers of different religions differ from one another in their views? And if religion be one why the learned teachers do not care to seek after that religion which is without a second?"

14. Contemplating on the Lotus Feet of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna-Chaitanya, Paramahamsa Babaji said, "O lucky one! listen to the principle of true religion I am telling you to the best of my knowledge.

Ans. "The eternal nature of a thing is its eternal religion. Nature springs up from the very constituent or the making of a thing. When Krishna wills to form a thing, a concomitant nature goes hand in hand with the formation of the thing, and that nature is its eternal characteristic. When that thing is contaminated due to unforeseen event, or is perverted by coming in contact with another thing, then its nature is also perverted or changed. This changed or perverted habit, as it becomes inured with the roll of time, accompanies the thing and bears a semblance with the original eternal nature of the thing. But semblance is not identity or reality. This changed or perverted nature is not inborn or innate in the thing, but causal or accidental, which passes or gives currency to the real nature of the thing. As for example, water is a thing. Liquidity is its property. When it happens to be ice, solidity or rigidity becomes its causal or accidental property and is current with the real nature. In fact, causation or accidence is not eternal but temporary cause, and vanishes with the disappearance of its cause. But nature that springs up with the formation of a thing is eternal and remains latent though it is perverted or changed. That in course of time or due to favourable circumstances, the real nature of a thing assumes its original character, admits of no doubt.

15. The eternal nature of a thing is its eternal function. Its accidence is its causation He who is well-acquainted with the knowledge of a thing, knows well the distinction between the real nature and the causal nature of the thing. Those who are deprived of such knowledge, consider causal to be the real nature of the thing and temporary religion to be the eternal religion". The Sanyasi said,—"What is meant by the words 'Vastu' (thing) and its 'nature' ?" Paramahamsa Babaji said,—

16. The derivative meaning of the word 'Vastu' (thing) is this that which exists and conveys a meaning is 'Vastu', which again is two-fold, real and unreal. A thing real is transcendental. Unreal things with their names, forms and attributes are mundane. Real things have eternal existence. Unreal things have semblance of existence which is somewhere real, somewhere feigning. As in Sreemad Bhagabat (1.1.2)—"The thing knowable here is real and is the spring of all well being"—which means that the real thing is transcendental. The Supreme Lord is the only real thing. His discrete part is known as Jiva, and His External Potency is known as Maya. Hence 'Vastu' i. e., the real thing denotes three things viz., the Supreme Lord, Jiva and Maya To know their mutual relationship is pure knowledge. There are innumerable semblances of these three things and they are regarded as unsubstantial things. The matter and qualities of the Vaisheshik school are merely speculations on unreal things. The special quality that characterises the real thing is its nature. Jiva is a real thing and the eternal quality which characterises it is its real and eternal nature." The Sanyasi Thakur said,—"O Lord ! I would I could thoroughly understand the subject."

17. Babaji Maharaj said,—"Sreela Krishnadas Kaviraj Goswami, a disciple of Sree Nityananda Prabhu, showed me a manuscript of Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita in which Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu has given us His Teachings on the subject thus :—

18. The eternal nature of a Jiva is the eternal servanthood of Krishna. A Jiva is the Tatastha (border line) potency of Krishna and exists simultaneously as a distinct and non-distinct entity. When he forgets Krishna he is averse to serve Krishna and his aversion has no beginning as it dates before his incarnation within the four walls of time and space. For this act of averseness towards God he is found guilty by Maya, the Deluding Potency of the Supreme Lord, and is, therefore, hurled into the vortex of worldly relativities of happiness, misery etc., as condign punishment.

19. Krishna is Transcendental Absolute. He is the Self-effulgent Spiritual Sun of the spiritual Realm. The Jivas are so many emanating rays of the Sun Krishna. They are His atomic parts. Unlike pieces of stone of a mountain, Krishna is Infinite Transcendental and loses not a bit when infinitesimal Jivas emanate from Him. They are compared to innumerable sparks of a blazing fire in the Vedas. But no comparison whether sparks of fire, rays of the sun or gold of the alchemist stone is well appropriate in imparting a clear conception of the true nature of a Jiva in our unbiased mind unless and until the mundanity of these comparisons are totally eliminated. Krishna is Transcendental Whole, Jivas are the atomic parts of the Whole. Both are similar in respect of the quality of consciousness or animation, but dissimilar and eternally distinct in respect of the quantitative aspect. One is the whole, others are its parts. One is the Infinite, others are the infinitesimals. Krishna is the Eternal Lord of the Jivas who are His eternal servants by their essential nature. Krishna is the Eternal attractor, the Jivas are the attracted ; Krishna is the Supreme Ruler of the universe, the Jivas are the ruled ; Krishna is the Lord Observer, the Jivas are the observed ; Krishna is the Entire Whole, the Jivas are the poor and lowly ; Krishna is the All Powerful Supreme Being, the Jivas are powerless unless otherwise empowered. Hence eternal servitude of and obedience to Krishna is the eternal nature or religion of a Jiva.

20. The Omnipoteney of Krishna is fully manifest in the revelation of the Spiritual Kingdom. So in the demonstration of the Jiva world his Tatastha power is in display. A special potency exercises some influence in bringing forth imperfect worlds. This potency is known as Tatastha or marginal potency—the function of which is to create such an entity between animate and inanimate things that can keep in touch with both the spiritual and non-spiritual kingdoms. A purely spiritual animate thing is in opposite relation with the inanimate thing and so is in no way connected with it. A Jiva is no doubt a spiritual atomic part impelled by some Divine power to be in touch with the inanimate world and that Divine power is known as Tatastha potency. A Tata is an imaginary line of demarcation between land and water. It is neither in land nor in water but is in both. That Divine power lying midway, i. e., in betwcen land and water, upholds an entity having both the terraqueous properties. Jivas are no doubt spiritual entities, but in formation they are so infinitesimal that they are liable to be engrossed by the mundane principle of Maya. So they are not absolutely spiritual like the transcendental entities of the spiritual kingdom, nor are they absolutely mundane like the phenomena due to their spiritual tendency or aptitude. Hence the principle of Jiva is quite distinct from the principles of Spirit and Matter. This is why there is an eternal distinction between the Supreme Being and a Jiva. The Supreme Being is the Lord of Maya who is entirely dependent on Him, but a Jiva is liable to be enthralled by Maya under some circumstances. Hence the Supreme Lord Bhagawan, Jiva and Maya are the three eternal and spiritual principles of which the Supreme Lord is the ever Transcendental Primordial Truth. According to the Vedic hymn—'He is the Eternal of all eternals, the Fountain Sentient of all sentients'.

21. A Jiva is, by his essential nature, the eternal servant of Krishna and is a display of His Tatastha Potency. From this it can safely be concluded that a Jiva is simultaneously distinct and non-distinct from Bhagawan and hence His distinct and non-distinct manifestation. A Jiva is subject to Maya under special circumstances but Godhead, being the Supreme Ruler of Maya and all his potencies, is never subject to Maya. Hence God and Jiva are eternally distinct. A Jiva is, in essence, a spiritual entity like Godhead of whom Jiva is a potency ; and in this respect they are eternally non-distinct.

22. If eternal distinction and non-distinction are simultaneous then eternal distinction stands foremost. Service of Krishna is the eternal nature of a Jiva. When he forgets this relationship he is overwhelmed by the influence of Maya—the deluding potency lying at the back-ground of the Lord. Thence forward a Jiva shows his backwardness in the service of the Supreme Lord Krishna. Since the backward condition of a Jiva springs up along with his coming into this mayaik world, the history of his downfall within the bounds of time and space is out of the question. Hence the significance of the expression 'eternally backward'. His eternal function with the service of Krishna has been perverted since his entrance into the plane of three dimensions due to his forgetfulness. When he comes in contact with Maya his perverted nature prevails giving room for his causal or accidental functions. The eternal nature is one, eternal and pure while the accidental religion assumes different forms under different circumstances and is described in different ways by different men of divergent principles.

23. Paramahansa Babaji Maharaj stopped and began to chant the Holy Name of Hari. The Sanyasi Thakur gladly hearing all these transcendental truths offered his humble greetings to the Lotus Feet of his Divine Master and said, "O Lord! let me ponder over these truths this day and I shall lay before Your Feet tomorrow in case any doubts arsie in my mind".

SREE NAMASTAKAM

(By Sree Rupa Goswami)

O Hari Nama! the Tips of Thy Lotus Feet have eternally been adored by the glowing radiance diffused from the gemmed chaplets of the Upanishads, the crest jewels of the Vedas. Thou art eternally worshipped by the liberated souls. O Hari Nama! clearing myself of all offences, I entirely take shelter in Thee.

O Holy Name! all glory to Thee who art eternally chanted by the saints. To confer eternal bliss upon the people Thou hast appeared before them as the Transcendental Word. Thou killest all sorts of terrible sufferings of him who happens to chant even Thy dimly reflected Name known as Namabhasa.

O Sun of Blessed Name! even the slightest reflection of Thy Radiant Self is sufficient to dispel the gloom of ignorance from the minds of those who are steeped in the foul sink of worldliness, and confer spiritual vision of pure devotion on those who are blind of the inner sight. Who is there so expert in the world that can sing the glories of Thy Name to finish?

O Holy Name! the seed of deeds, which necessitates rebirth for their fruition, is not totally destroyed despite veritable at-one-ment with Brahman by dint of constant meditation. But O Name ! no sooner dost Thou gain a free scope on the tongue of Thy chanter than all the seeds of deeds of his pre-natal existence are destroyed. Such the Vedas loudly declare.

O Killer of the demon Agha ! O Son of Yashoda ! O Son of Nanda ! O Lotus-Eyed ! O Moon of the Gopees ! O Lord of Brindaban ! O Merciful to the bowed ! O Krishna ! Thou hast manifested Thy-self in such various Forms out of Thy infinite mercy. Let my ardour of love go on increasing, in a great measure, for Thee.

O Holy Name ! Thou hast a double Form, viz., Vâchya (Signified) i.e., the Transcendental Personality, and Vachaka (Significant) i. e., the Transcendental Word or Name—such as Krishna, Govinda, etc.,—identical with the Vachya. To us the latter Vachaka is more compassionate than the former Vachya against whom we fallen souls have sinned. Because as soon as we chant the Vachaka, i.e., Thy Holy Name, keeping clear of offences against the Name, we are at once immersed in the blissful ocean of Divine Love.

O Holy Name ! O Krishna ! Thou killest the offences of Thy devotees who have taken shelter in Thy Lotus Feet. Thou art veritable Living Entity of the most Beautiful self-conscious concentrated Bliss. Thou art, O Name ! the Entity of the great Rejoicings of Gokula. O Krishna ! I offer my humble greetings, time and again, to Thee—the Divine Form of all Exquisiteness in the fullest degree.

O Holy Name of Krishna ! Thou art the very life of Narada's guitar and the Elixir of the ambrosial ripples of the ocean surcharged with Divine mellowness. I beseech Thee, O Holy Name ! do Thou ever find a full scope in my tongue with all the ardour of Divine Love.

The Transcendental Lineman

(By Upadeshak Y. Jagannatham B.A., Bhaktitilaka)

The vortex motion of the cyclonic wind does not spare anything. It uproots ancient and far-spreading trees; demolishes imposing and colossal sky-scrapers, rends asunder with absolute ease the wire installations of graphs and phones, and, joining hands with the incidental downpours, washes away roads, metalled and tarred, and causes breaches even in the vast systems of railways so well laid out everywhere.

It was a veritable storm—and was it not at least for me? Everything now slips between my fingers. My lifemate, the paragon and non-pareil of beauty and the sole centre of my love, is snatched away from my side without notice, the fairy-like forms of my most beloved offspring do no more move about me, servitors and friends have either turned rebels or left me for good, and even my cash chests are found burgled and emptied to my dismay and wonderment. The shifting, therefore, of the centre of my love and affection from consort in turn to mammon did me no good, and when it finally rested on my double-cased tabernacle, in no time has that also become imbecile and decrepit and ready to mock at and dupe me. Desolate I am and stand among the wreckage and havoc of the storm. How dare my erstwhile companions leave me? Should they not serve me?

No—an emphatic no! They should not and did not. They served each other and my tabernacle to boot for, was it not one among them, the unfortunate flotsam? They ministered to needs, whims and idiosyncracies of my drag-on, the body. My body a drag-on? So it looks now as it served none but enjoyed service from others, and in its present disjointed state it can neither attempt to serve nor afford to enjoy. It is a drag-on and an alien also. I kept company with an alien and all its compeers in their own domain. I remain, in a foreign land and on alien soil, broken hearted and wailing over an alien stuff! Which alien is ever heard to reciprocate the love bestowed on him? I hung my head in shame, smiled over my past griefs and, as I paused a little, the still small voice within me said, "Back to Homeland, ye fortunate!" I cried but, "O my Homeland! the land of my love! Where art thou?"

No time is to be lost. The journey must be undertaken. The sack of provisions and culinary implements is very soon on my back and the idea presented itself of an immediate journey by road, though it fares none the better for the storm. But the tardiness of the journey and the inevitable cooking and belly-filling at every halting place appeared to be sickening in the extreme, and a speedier route is now contemplated. The express steamed in braving all the perils of transhipment and coursing on the unsafe rails on restored breach-mounds. I threw myself into it flinging away the burden on my back, preferring starvation if I can reach Home. On and on flies the train and my thoughts of Home fly quicker and run ahead of it, but Lo! an abrupt halt! station stoplogic! I rushed out and was informed to my utter consternation that Home cannot be reached as there is an unbridged and unbridgeable gulf dividing the same from the railway terminus. The sheeny surface of the intervening gulf-waters dimmed my vision and denied for me even a glimpse of my sweet Home beyond. I tore my hair in despair and cursing myself agreed to be shunted back to my starting point.

O the storm! and the cursed roads and railways! and the alien soil! My heart was pining after Home and not a word of It is heard. Now a bright idea struck me. The 'phone!' the 'phone!' Why not resort to it? I ran into the nearest station and called "Father!" over the 'phone.' I said "Father!" and I do not know why. I repeated that Holy Word a myriad times and was ringing and ringing without rest or intermission. No response! But I was undaunted. My Father fails not to respond and teach me a way to reach Him. The All-Love is Omnipresent and Omniscient. He knows that I am now on the line and knows as well when and where I broke it of my own free will. He needs not disturb Himself. The Merciful and Ever-Ready Lineman is always with Him, the Master, Transmitter of Sounds. He is His Own. He is at once commissioned with the onerous and gratuitous duty of proceeding along the line to detect the place where it snapped. The Transcendental Lineman starts at once and walks lightly on the 'phone-way' with eyes on the Holy Wire, is not blind-folded with the vision of the dazzling water sheet of the intervening and intractable gulf which is really nothing to Him, finds at last the either end of the broken Wire and ascending up the 'phone-pillar' far ahead of the stoplogic station, unites them inextricably with His Holy and Dexterous Fingers.

All on a sudden, the Father rings back and responds! I am thrown into an ecstacy. I hear my Father and my Father hears me! The Transcendental Lineman has, with causeless mercy, restored my broken line and my knowledge of relationship with the Absolute, Sambandha Jnana, is re-established. I am now deeply humiliated and ashamed of my journey by road, the way of action and enjoyment, and the journey by rail, the way of empirical knowledge and abneg tion. I no more feel my environment as alien. I find now nothing hateable and rejectable. The very inception of aversion for the Absolute is the real storm that spelt disaster for the Jiva who by his own constitution and disposition is meant for serving the Divine Will. Even so it was in my case. But now everything appears to serve Him and runs towards Him, being attracted by Him, the Divine Magnet, Krishna. Service, Bhakti, therefore, appears to be my natural function, nay, of every Jiva as said already, and I hasten to employ at once my soul and his two fold enclosure which are upto now inured to lord it over by mutual super-imposition.

May the Transcendental Lineman, my Most Beloved Master and the perennial Spring of Mercy, who has extricated me from the quagmire of sensualism and restored once again my connexion with the Absolute, be merciful enough to accept my humble and squirrel-like service, if it so please Him, and convert me, by His magic touch, into an instrument worthy to be employed in His service.

Narada

[Adopted from Srimad Bhagabata]

O great Rishi, in the former Kalpa I was born, in one of my previous births, from the womb of a slave girl in attendance upon Brahmanas versed in the Veda. Once, during the rainy season, a number of yogis were living together in the neighbourhood for observing the four-monthly vow. I was then a mere child. But I was employed to serve those yogis.

While thus engaged I abstained from all kinds of play and other restless activities that are natural to a boy at that early age. I controlled my senses.

I was restrained in my speech. I gave up my childish arrogance. In this spirit I employed myself in serving those yogis by keeping their company and doing their bidding. Those rishis had equal good will towards all entities. But they were pleased to have special mercy on me, although I was an ignorant child.

In obedience to the direction of those Brahmanas I ate, for only once, the remains of the tasted food that was left in their begging bowls. In consequence of taking their tasted food my sins left me. When my mind was purified it became inclined to the worship of God.

O Vyasa, at that place those rishis used to sing daily the goodness of the activities of Hari which made one's mind go mad with joy. By their kindness I was permitted to have the opportunity of listening to those songs. In this manner as I continued, with firm faith, to listen to every word of those songs, love for Sree Hari, who is the Supreme Subject of all excellent discourses, was aroused in my mind.

O Vyasa, possessed of excellent judgment, after the taste for serving Bhagawan, who is praised by all the slokas of the Shastras, was thus aroused, my judgment made me firmly resolved to devote myself to His service. By dint of this pure judgment I could at once see that my proper self is absolutely pure and is a transcendental entity, and that the gross and subtle bodies were formed as the result of my indulgence in ignorant activities.

In this manner throughout the seasons of Sarata and Varsha, extending over four months, I continued to listen with great care to the praise of the holy activities of Sree Hari which were sung during morning, noon and evening every day, by those high-souled Rishis. By this practice the disposition of service, which dispels the qualities of raja and tama, manifested itself in my mind.

In this manner I continued to serve those munis by perfect obedience, with a sincere heart, with humility, with a pure mind, with firm faith and with a mind properly subdued. I was then a little child. But those munis were naturally merciful towards all who are miserable. When they prepared to depart from that place they were pleased, in their mercy, to instruct me in the knowledge of the principle of the hidden function of the spiritual novice, the more hidden secret of the knowledge of the Brahman or the soul, which is identical with the cessation of all mundane activity, and the highest of all mysteries viz., the knowledge of Bhagawan, which was divulged by God Himself to Brahma, Uddhaba and Arjuna, identical with the exclusive spiritual service of Godhead, the dharma of the Bhagabatas or pure devotees.

It is by means of that knowledge of Bhagawan which is the supreme mystry, that I have been able to know about the activities of the spiritual power of Bhagawan Vasudeva. Individual souls may attain to the plane of the service of Vishnu only by means of such knowledge.

O Vyasa, firmly devoted to the service of Bhagawan, if one persists in taking those articles of food, by the consumption of which the corresponding diseases of living beings are produced, by such obstinacy those diseases are never cured. But if those very articles of food are taken being mixed, by means of proper ingredients, with other articles of food or medicines, those diseases are cured thereby.

In the same manner all these temporary coveted activities of men are the cause of their bondage to this world, or worldly sojourn from womb to womb. But if these very activities are offered to Iswara they are capable of destroying the mundane egotism that is averse to Bhagawan.

The knowledge of Bhagawan is characterised by its association with the service of Bhagawan in the form of hearing and chanting the keertana, etc. That knowledge is verily the immutable fruit of works performed for pleasing Bhagawan.

When men are prepared to perform all work in accordance with the teaching of Bhagawan, who commands all to dedicate their activities to Him, they are activly inclined to chant repeatedly the Qualities and Names of Krishna, and to meditate on Them.

O Krishna! Thou art the same as the Pranava or the Sound 'Om'. I make obeisance and meditate on Thee who art Vasudeva, Sankarsana, Pradyumna and Aniruddha who are Thy own four-fold self.

That person, who worships the Lord of the Yajna, whose spiritual Form is declared by the mantra but who has no mundane form, in the above-manner by the mantra containing the Names of the four Holy Forms of Vasudeva, etc., attains the perfection of vision on beholding Sree Bhagawan in all entities.

O Brahman, I fully practised this instruction of the Lord. Keshava took cognisance of this. He, thereupon, gave me the knowledge of His Divinity, the treasure of communion with Him by the method of devotion, and also love for Himself.

O great Rishi, you are versed in all the Veda Shastras. Employ yourself in chanting, in the best approved manner, the Glory of all-pervading Vishnu. Those enlightened persons, who know this, realise in it the goal of all their enquiries. The munis declare that there is no other way for the cure of the misery of this worldly sojourn of mankind who are afflicted with an endless succession of the triple mundane sufferings.

Sree Suta said, "O Brahman, Bhagawan Vedavaysa, son of Satyabati, after devoutly listening to this narrative of the birth and doings of devarshi Narada once again questioned Sree Narada." Sree Vyasa asked, "When those vikshus who had instructed you in the knowledge of the reality, left the place what did you, a child of tender years, then do ?

"O son of Brahman, how also did you pass your after years; in what manner did you give up the body, born in the womb of the slave serving-maid, in your old age on the approach of death ?

"O best of munis, why also did time, whose duration extends to the end of a Kalpa, fail to destory your memory of the previous births, as all things are destroyed by the power of time ?

(To be continued)

Vaishnava Practice

(Culled from Satkriya-sara-dipika)

The Smriti work bearing the name of Satkriya-sara-dipika is from the pen of Srimad Gopal Bhatta Goswami, one of the six famous Goswamins of Brindaban. It is one of the original standard works laying down the details of the social and domestic practice of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas.

The author begins his work with the remark that he is not anxious to admit that the book has been written by him. He is aware of the warning of the Geeta that it is only persons, who are deluded by mundane egotism, suppose themselves to be the authors of the books written by them. But it is nevertheless necessary and proper for him to attach his name to the book in obedience to the command of sadhus of his own sampradaya (communion).

He then proceeds to declare that he has set forth in the work the details of practice of the devotees of Krishna belonging both to varnashrama society and born in antyajavarna. For this purpose he has collected the relevant texts from the Vedas, the Puranas and and the Dharmashastras on the subject. He had relied on those texts as the only evidence.

But he has omitted to treat of the worship of pitris (Manes) and Devas for avoiding offence. The worship of pitris and Devas is an offence against the worship of Vishnu and against the the Name. It is incumbent on all persons who are desirous of worshipping Krishna to avoid this offence, by the testimony of the Shastras.

Srimad Gopal Bhatta Goswami did not merely compile matter which exists in a scattered form in different ancient works. He was anxious to lay before his readers in an unambiguous form the spiritual purpose behind the practices that he describes, and which alone imparts any value to such practice.

The first point that he is careful to establish is that Narayana is the only object of worship in as much as Narayana is the only reality. Every other entity has its existence in Narayana. This is supported by the evidence of Sree Narayana Upanishad of the Atharva Veda. In the passage quoted by him from the said Upanishad it is declared that Narayna is the only eternal entity and that all other entities have been born from Narayana. That the only thing needful is to realise this Truth and to act in accordance with this fundamental fact. That the mind is, however, always anxious to act otherwise. But a wise man should control his mind and try to walk in the path of the Truth.

Narayana is the source of all entities. Krishna has an infinity of functions. In his relationship with created entities Krishna has the eternal form of Narayna. It is not possible for any person who is not fully free from the fetters of the limiting potency of Krishna to have the eligibility of worshipping Krishna, which has to be done by the method of loving devotion characterised by the most exquisite mellowness of the principle of rasa. Krishna is worshipped by the highest order of His devotees by the exclusive method of Keertana. This is not, however, the practice of all Vaishnavas.

The Satkriya-sara-dipika treats of the duties of persons who, whether Brahmanas or not belonging to any caste, or being the offspring of improper union of the varnas, lead the domestic life, if such persons are duly initiated in the mantra of Krishna by the mercy of the Sat Guru. Such persons are designated in the Satkriya-sara-dipika as forming the community of the fully self-surrendered Vaishnavas (ananyasharana). The subject treated is the practice of such persons as enjoined by the Shastras. Marriage and other domestic and social duties of such persons are also described in this compilation.

It is necessary to have the working knowledge of the purpose and process of the mundane creation in order to be able to understand the nature of our duties in life. The following account, which is culled from different parts of the Shastras, is furnished by the author of Satkriya-sara-dipika.

In the Narayana Upanishad Sree Narayana has been declared the object of worship of all entities. There is no other object of worship. The reason for this is that Narayana is the source of all created entities. Being also without a second, Narayana is said to be eternal (nitya) existing before creation and also through the great cataclysm (mahapralaya) The Pranaba or the rhythm "Om", is identical with Narayana Himself. He is the source of all naras, who are called 'nara' being born from Nara. At the end of the period of every great cataclysm Narayana wills to create the entities of this world, who are to obey Him.

As soon as Narayana conceives the willed to create, Brahma was born from Narayana. Brahma in his turn created the other beings. Some of these beings were born from the mind and others from the body of Brahma.

In the same manner Indra with all his followings were born from Narayana, and also the twelve Adityas with their families. From Narayana were born the eleven Rudras with their respective followers and consorts. Ganesha and the thirty-three crores of the devatas also gradually had their birth from Narayana, and also all the rishis, devarshis, maharshis and rajarshis. All animated beings and entities both moving and motionless had their birth from Narayana.

They all merge in Sree Narayana at the end of each Kalpa. After creation, during the period of their existence in this world, all entities are nourished by Narayana. At the occurrence of the great cataclysm Sree Brahma and all other jivas, who are immortal, remain merged in Sree Narayana till they reappear at the end of the cataclysm. This is supported by the Mahabharata.

It follows that Brahma is no other than Narayana. This also applies to Ganesha, etc. But none of them are Iswara by their own right, independently of Sree Narayana. Similiarly Siva also is Narayana. The other categories may be fully enumerated as follows. To all of them the above observations apply.

The categories are : Indra with his family ; the eleven Rudras with their followers and consorts ; the eight Vasus ; the two Aswini Kumaras ; their followers ; the rishis of all grades ; also the munis, tapaswis, balakhilyas, siddhas, sadhyas, charanas, gandharvas, daityas, jatudhanas, kinnaras, etc., Time, who is also Kalapurusa ; also the fourteen Yamas with Chitragupta, etc. ; the eight directions, the Dikpalas with their followers ; the lower regions which are seven in number with all their inhabitants and their ruling entities, viz., the Divine forms of Srimat Ananta, Kurma, etc., also Varuna, Naga-purusa, Nagakanya, etc., the upper regions which are also seven in number with their rulers, viz., Brahma, Indra, etc., with their followers ; all entities that have forms and also those that are without forms, under these those having forms are included the Shalagrama Shila appearing in the bed of the river Gandaki, the eight kinds of images, also those forms of the Devatas with the Upadevatas,—under entities that are without forms are included all functions performed in this world in honour of the departed ancestors, kavya and bali ; also the antah (inner world) and bahih (the exterior world),—antah including the seven patalas with their Devatas and other entities, bahih including the dark regions outside the Brahmanda e.g., the principles of mahat, ahankara, the seed, space which is of the nature of cause, vayu, teja, bari, bhumi, etc., also the twenty-four elements and the five bhuta-mantras i.e., rupa, rasa, gandha, sabda, sparsha, etc.

Apologist—The Kazi was not afraid of the people but of the person behind the movement. It is said that the Kazi is the same as King Kamsa, the maternal uncle of Sree Krishna who had been slain by his nephew in his previous birth. He was seized with panic because he could recollect who he was and also the irresistible power of Lord Gaur-Hari whom he could also recognise to be identical with Sree Krishna. This is hinted in the conversation between them.

Critic—But what about the silly argument against cow-killing ?

Apologist—Slaughtering of a most useful domestic animal like the cow or the bull is really heinous. Lord Gaur-Hari did not use strong language when he compared it to slaughtering one's parents. I don't understand why you think the argument silly.

Critic—You probably also believe in the Vedic mantra for rejuvenating worn-out aged cattle after sacrificing them?

Apologist—In any case such slaughtering alone would be justifiable. If one cannot rejuvenate one should not kill even an aged bull. Life is held to be sacred by all the religions. Why should the life of animals be of no account? No animal should be killed for food or unnecessarily. Can a person love God if he does not love God's creatures?

Critic—What about the Man-Lion?

Apologist—God conceived as archetype of the principle of animation represented by the noblest of animals. It is a far more advanced realisation than the conception of God as a zero, as material energy, as light or heat. God as the Protector of His devotees and the Slayer of the enemies of His devotees has this compound form of man and lion. Why may it not be really true?

Critic—Why did the Hindus object to the Samkeertan?

Apologist—Because the Brahmanas thought that it was too simple a creed to suit their particular interests. They were in favour of keeping the mantra a secret as they supposed themselves to be the born custodians of the same.

Critic—But is it not queer to dance and sing the Name of God in the streets?

Apologist—One may not dance on purpose. We are told that all persons cannot really take the Name of God in the proper manner. One who takes the Name of God as he should, is compelled to dance and sing the Name by the power of the Name as was the case with the Moslem city-guards who were sent by the Kazi to put down the Samkeertan.

Critic—But all this is your own invention.

Apologist—It is the realisation of all the devotees. The activities of Lord Gaur-Hari are to be seen to this day with the eye of faith. The Kazi's eyes were opened by the mercy of Lord Gaur-Hari and he could see what it really was. The demon Kamsa was thus enabled to obtain the Grace of Lord Gaur-Hari.

Critic—Why was Lord Gaur-Hari specially merciful to the Kazi?

Apologist—It is not every person who is privileged to be slain by Sree Krishna in a previous birth.

Critic—So there is no hope for me?

Apologist—There is hope for everybody on one condition, that is, if one is prepared to follow the account of the doings of Lord Gaur-Hari with a really open mind.

Critic—But I challenge every proposition and never accept what I am not fully convinced, as the truth.

Apologist—But have you been able to accept anything on your terms?

Critic—Candidly speaking I confess to be utterly ignorant by my test.

Apologist—Who is responsible for your real ignorance ?

Critic—I do not know.

Apologist—It is yourself. You are wrong in supposing that it is not your business to seek to be enlightened instead of posing to be omniscient. It is a silly method. You can never obtain grace by such method.

Critic—But did not the Kazi obtain Grace by this identical method ?

Apologist—Yes, but after he had given it up for good.

Critic—Through fear ?

Apologist—No, through mercy.

Critic—Did the Kazi seek for mercy ?

Apologist—Yes, through fear.

Critic—That was cowardly.

Apologist—The sight of the Man-Lion Form of God made him fear God by purifying his heart.

Critic—Why did not Lord Gaur-Hari do it, instead of the Man-Lion ?

Apologist—Because Chand Kazi had oppressed the devotees of Lord Gaur-Hari

Critic—Would every person be blessed on condition that he opposes the Samkeertan ?

Apologist—It is only Chand Kazi who was so blessed. It was so because in his previous birth he had the good fortune of having been slain by Sree Krishna Himself.

Scraps

His Holiness Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj with Srimad Bon Maharaj left for shores of India on the 10th of April, last year and had been preaching in England since then. He has just returned to India after 18 months of strenuous missionary activity in the land of the English. His Holiness reached Bombay on the 21st of September, came on to Muttra on the 22nd October and is preaching the religion of loving devotion to the Lotus Feet of Radha-Krishna during the holy month of Kartika, in the Brajamandala.

* * * *

Srimad Tirtha Maharaj is the disciple of Sreela Thakur Bhaktivinode. He accepted the triple staff and garb of a Tridandi sanyasi from the Editor in 1920. He is the seniormost sanyasi preacher of the Gaudiya Mission. The successful preaching of Srimad Tirtha Maharaj before he left India had already borne real fruit in attracting a number of pure souls to the service of Sree Gaur-Sundar.

* * * *

In England His Holiness had an opportunity of conversing with quite a large number of Englishmen and Englishwomen on the subject of Sanatana Dharma.

* * * *

His Holiness is of opinion that it is necessary to carry on the propaganda in Europe on a scale that would enable the people of those countries to go through a regular course of instructions and practical training in spiritual living under bona fide teachers of Sanatana Dharma. The European mentality appears to take it for granted that religion should confine itself to purposes that are useful in the same limited and delusive way as other so-called good endeavours of this world They wish to know whether Sanatana Dharma serves our actual present requirements better than any other religion.

* * * *

The concentration on the struggle to live is responsible for the almost universal absence of a living curiosity among the busy peoples of the West, for knowledge about things transcendental. The value of the varnashrama regulations does not consist in their usefulness in the worldly senses. They are not confined to the mundane outlook. They have been ordained for giving a turn to human affairs towards the life eternal of which we at present possess no knowledge whatsoever. Modern secular thought apparently hopes for the perpetuation of the present type of life by making it fit.

* * * *

The Indian conceptions of 'papa' and 'punya' correspond to those of 'sin' and 'virtue' or 'righteousness' of the Europeans. They are complementary principles. They represent the lower and higher sides of this worldly life. Neither of them is capable of being regarded as transcendental. Neither of them has any connection with the soul.

* * * *

Religious opinion in the West stands in need of being educated in the transcendental conception of spiritual living that is envisaged in our varnashrama regulations. The Aryans in India had once submitted to the varnashrama regulations. They did not esteem the non-believers who rejected the varnashrama system. The varnik Indo-Aryans have since consistently followed the spiritual regulations that require abstention from undue social mixing with anti-spiritual people.

* * * *

No one is fit to be a preacher of the Sanatana Dharma unless he leads the life of the varnashrama system. The Sanatana Dharma possesses an abiding value for one and all. It is worthy of being preached to mankind by the method followed by the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna-Chaitanya.

* * * *

That method is described in the second verse of His Sikshastakam. It runs as follows,—"The only function of the soul is to chant at all time 'Hari', by practising humility greater than that of a blade of grass, fortitude greater than that of a tree, by desiring no honour for oneself and by honouring all entities."

* * * *

The bonafide preachers of Sanatana Dharma have always followed this teaching of the Supreme Lord and have accordingly possessed the capacity of turning the thoughts of men, in grateful appreciation, towards the transcendental heritage of the varnashrama organisation of society, open to all pure souls by the right of the causeless service of Sree Hari.

Round the Gaudiya Maths

Muttra :—The Editor is residing at Muttra. The Urjabrata is being solemnly observed by all under the direction of the Editor. Many honest seekers of truth are assembling at the residence of the Editor to hear the Divine Messages and Muthura is now resounding with the tidings of Gaur Krishna Bhajan Rahasya. Srimad Bhagabat, Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita and other scriptures are being read and recited at all hours.

Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj of the Calcutta Gaudiya Math, who had returned from London on September 27, and had been residing in Bombay, reached Muttra on October 22. The news of his arrival was hailed by the citizens of Muttra who proposed to give a public address of welcome to the Swamiji. A public meeting was held for this function on October 28, at 6 p. m. It was presided over by Mr. Basanta Lal M. A., LL. B., the renowned Advocate of the local Bar. Many leading citizens joined the meeting. The text of the address presented to the Swamiji will appear in the columns of next issue. In response to the address the Swamiji touched on the activities of the Mission in England. The President spoke highly of the Mission and its method of work in India and abroad.

Brindaban :—The Editor had been to the house of Dr. Balahari Das in Brindaban, on October 20. During His short stay there He related the messages of Gaudiya Math to Sj. Satya Charan Guha, a retired Advocate of the Calcutta High Coutr, who listened to the discourses with much attention. He remarked that the Gaudiya Math and its preachers are doing immense good to the general public and very earnestly requested Editor for carrying on active propaganda works in Brajamandal, for the restoration of its pristine glory. Several other respectable persons who were present also added that the Gaudiya Math is making the wish of Sriman Mahaprabhu that His Name will be sung in all the villages and cities of the Universe into a reality.

London Gaudiya Math :—Tridandi Swami B. H. Bon of Sree Gaudiya Math, Calcutta Preacher-in-Charge for propaganda works in the West, accompanied by Herr Earnest Schulze, a German disciple of Editor is on preaching tour in the continent. Responding to the invitation of the leading Universities of Germany, Austria and France, Swamiji arrived in Berlin on October 21. He was received, at the railway station by Mr. W. Hassenstein, Counsellor of the Government, Miss Von Petersdorf, Office of the Ministry for Economics and several other leading citizens. Dr. Martin Weigert Ph. D., LL. D., Ministry of Labour of the last Government, received Swamiji at his residence in Berlin-Cladow. He had discourses with Swamiji on the activities and messages of the Mission.

Regierungsrat Hassenstein called at the residence of Swamiji and had religious discourses with him for some time. On the 23rd Swamiji met Prof. Tara Chand Roy of Lahore, Professor of Indian languages at the Berlin University and Dr. Th. Wilhelm of Deantscher Akademischer Austansdienest in the scholoss (Castle). Dr. Wilhelm tried to bring Swamiji in touch with several schools in Berlin and arranged for interview with the Minister of the Kultur Board, Dr. Rosenberg, one of the leading Nazi-leaders. He is taking much interest for the propagation of the messages of Gaudiya Math in Germany.

Swami Bon was taken to the Grunewald Gymnasium, one of the biggest schools in Berlin for boys of the rich class only. The Director of the school took him round the premises and he delivered a nice little speech in German. The authorities paid much attention.

Afterwards Swamiji met many leading citizens among whom were Prof. Witte, Professor of Comparative religions at the University and Prof. Luders who is a great Sanskrit scholar.

Propaganda Works :

Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Sarbaswa Giri Maharaj and Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Vilas Gavasti Nemi Maharaj with a party consisting of Upadeshak Sripad Benode Behari Brahmachari, Kritiratna and others will leave shortly for propaganda works in Burma. They will proceed to Burma via Chittagong where they will stay for a few days for preaching. The activities of the party will be duly reported in these columns.

Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Vaibhab Sagar Maharaj is propagating the Cult of Gaur-Sundar and messages of the Gaudiya Math in the suburbs of Calcutta and in the 24 Parganas.

CHAPTER II

The natural function of the soul is spiritual and eternal.

1. Next day during the morning the good ascetic found no opportunity of asking any questions for the solutions of his doubts. Paramahansa Babaji was then fully immersed in his exclusive mood of loving service on the transcendental plane of Braja (Realm of Krishna). After accepting their food of midday, obtained in small quantities by the daily round of begging in the village, both of them were seated in the natural awning of Madhabi creeper. Paramahansa Babaji out of his mercy now began to speak. "O great devotee", said he, "what definite conclusion has been reached by you on hearing my answer to your enquiry about 'dharma' (man's natural function)?"

(Q. 2 and 3.) The ascetic now preferred with the greatest joy his further questions. "Lord, if the soul be a very small thing, how can his natural function be full and unmixed? If the natural function of the soul be formed at the same time when his entity is constituted, how can such function be also eternal?"

2. (Ans.) On hearing these two questions Paramahansa Babaji meditated for a short time on the Lotus Feet of Sree Sachinandana before he proceeded to answer them. He then said, "Respected sir, even although the soul is a little thing, his function is nevertheless full, unmixed and eternal. His littleness has reference only to his substance. The Ultimate Great Principle (Para-Brahman) Krishnachandra is the only absolutely Great Substance. The souls of jivas are the endless particles of the One Great Absolute. In the way analogous to that in which sparks of fire are generated by the undivided substance of fire, the souls of jivas emanate from the Entity of undivided cognitive Substance who is Krishna. In the way that each individual spark of fire possesses the full power of fire, each individual soul can also be a basis for the manifestation of the full function of the cognitive Substance. A single spark of fire by coming in contact with combustible substances can, by gradually manifesting the nature of the great fire, burn the whole world. In a similar way even a single soul can bring about a great inundation of love by serving Krishnachandra, the real Object of Love. So long as he does not come in touch with the real Object of the function of his soul, his entity of infinitesimal cognitive substance, i.e., the soul of the jiva, manifests himself in the position of ineligibility for displaying the natural activity of the full spiritual function. As a matter of fact the proper function of the soul manifests itself only in relationship to the Object of Love. It is very necessary to search with due care for the true answer to the question as to what constitutes the spiritual function of the jiva. We should then be in a position to realise that love is his eternal spiritual function. The jiva is not insentient matter. The spiritual entity transcends to the material principle. Unmixed cognition is the stuff of his constitution. Love is his function. Pure love is identical with the service of Krishna. In other words love, in the form of the servitorship of Krishna, is the natural function of the real entity of the jiva.

3. The jiva may possess one of two states. He may be either in the conditioned or in the pure spiritual state. In his unconditioned state the jiva is unclipsed cognitive substance. In that state the jiva has no relationship with non-sentience. Even in his unalloyed spiritual state the jiva is infinitesimal substance. By reason of his infinitesimality he is liable to undergo change of condition. The Entity of Krishna is plenary Cognition. He is naturally free from the possibility of any change of His Condition. He is substantively Great, Perfect, Pure and Eternal. The jiva is substantively infinitesimal, part of the Whole, liable to contamination and not ultimate. But in respect of his spiritual function the jiva is great, undivided whole, pure and eternal. As long as the jiva retains his pure spiritual condition he exhibits his spiritual function in his unclipsed form. When the jiva is contaminated by relationship with the eclipsing potency (Maya) only then, by reason of the perversion of his proper function, he is not fully pure and feels helpless and afflicted with mundane pleasure and pain. The worldly course makes its appearance simultaneously with the jiva's loss of all recollection of the servitorship of Krishna.

4. So long as the jiva continues pure, he cherishes his spiritual function as his own. His egoism then identifies itself with his servitorship of Krishna. His pure egoism, however, suffers contraction and assumes various forms when he is defiled by relationship with Maya. In relationship with Maya the pure entity of the jiva is overlaid with a subtle and a gross material form. This gives rise to a different egoism of the subtle body. This in its turn gives rise to a third form of egoism in association with the egoism of the gross body. In his pure spiritual body the jiva is the exclusive servant of Krishna. In his subtle material body the jiva entertains the egoism of being the enjoyer of the fruits of his own activities. In this position his spiritual ego, which identifies his entity with servitorship of Krishna, is covered up by the egotism of the subtle body. The gross form of mudane egotism, which arises when the subtle body is further enveloped in the gross physical body, leads the jiva to identify himself with the gross physical body. At this stage the jiva introduces himself to the world, in terms of gross material relationships as a Brahmana, a king, as poor, miserable, afflicted with disease, as wife or husband of another person, etc., etc. The spiritual function of the jiva is perverted in association with these false egotisms. Unalloyed love is the only proper function of the jiva in his pure state. Spiritual love manifests itself pervertedly in the subtle material body in the forms of pleasure and pain, likes and dislikes. This perverted love, thereafter, appears in the physical body in more concentrated material forms as pleasures of eating, drinking, sensuality. So you should now be in a position to see that the eternal natural function of the jiva manifests itself only in his pure state. The function that makes its appearance in his conditioned state is adventitious. His eternal function is naturally full, purely spiritual and ever present. I shall explain the nature of the adventitious function more fully at another time.

6. The 'dharma' of a pure Vaishnava, recorded in Srimad Bhagavatam, is the eternal spiritual function. All the different conceptions of 'dharma' or the natural function of the jiva, that have been promulgated in the world, are divisible into three classes, viz., as referring to his eternal, adventitious or temporary function. Those systems of the Norm, that have no reference to Isvara (Supreme Personal Ruler of the Universe) and eternal existence of the soul, treat only of the temporary function. Those systems, that admit Isvara and eternity of the soul but seek to gain the favour of Isvara by temporary means, confine themselves to the consideration of the adventitious function. Those that seek to gain the servitorship of Krishna by unalloyed love should alone be regarded as directed to the investigation of the eternal function. The eternal religion may have different designations due to differences of country, race and language ; but they are really one and are also perfectly wholesome. Nevertheless the Vaishnava 'dharma' that is current in India, is the standard of the eternal religion. And the religion that has been taught to the world by Lord Sachinandana, the most beloved Lord of our love, is admitted and accepted by all great souls, who delight in the loving service of the Absolute, as representing the unalloyed state of the Vaishnava religion.

7. At this point Sanyasi Thakur spoke with folded hands. "Lord", said he, "I am constantly realising the superior excellence of the pure Vaishnava religion that was revealed by Sree Sachinandana. I am also feeling the unwholesomeness of non-distinct monistic thuoght promulgated by Shankaracharya. But one thought is constantly running in my head which I do not wish to entertain without submitting at Your Feet. Am I to understand that the exalted state of concentrated love that has been manifested by Lord Sree Krishna-Chaitanya, is different from that of realised at-one-ment with non-distinct Brahman ?"

8. At this mention of the name of Sree Shankaracharya Paramahausa Babaji with great reverence made his prostrated obeisance to the Acharya. He then said, "Respected sir, we should always remember that Shankara was Mahadeva himself. Shankara is the Master (Guru) of all Vaishnavas. For this reason the Supreme Lord has referred to him as Acharya. Personally Shankara is a perfect Vaishnava. In the period when he made his appearance in India there was a great need for Shankara, the incarnation of the destructive quality of the Divinity. In India the culture of the Veda and the performances of the varnashrama 'dharma' which grades the people into classes according to spiritual disposition and also regulates individual life, were rendered almost nugatory by the prevalence of philosophical nihilism of the Buddhists. The negative cult of Buddhism has no reference to Isvara. It is an extreme advocacy of the temporary function, although it admits, in a measure, the principle of the spiritual nature of the jiva. At that time most of the Brahmanas, in pursuance of the teaching of your heart completely submissive to Sree Krishna-Chaitanya. You will then be in a position to conduct yourself in external matters in accordance with the dictates of your purified heart. Keep these words of the Supreme Lord constantly before your mind : "Do not practise hypocritical asceticism like the monkey, to be seen by the people. Enjoy the things of the world that it is proper to enjoy without being attached to them. Clutivate constant purity of the heart. In external conduct comply with the ordinary conventions of civilised society. Krishna will then deliver you very soon" (Ch. Ch. Madhya 16/238-239).

The Ten Basic Principles

[Translated from the Bengali text of Thakur Bhaktivinode]

The Vedas declare that :—

(i) Hari is the Absolute Person and is One without a second.

(ii) He is endowed with all the potencies in the fullest degree.

(iii) He is the Ocean of all Rasas (transcendent mellow liquid).

(iv) The jivas are His discrete parts.

(v) Some of them are enthralled by His Maya or Cosmic potency.

(vi) Some are unfettered by the influence of His Internal Exhilarating Energy.

(vii) Both jivas and the phenomenal world are His Manifestations simultaneously distinct and non-distinct from Him.

(viii) Pure devotion is the means of attaining the Highest End of spiritual existence.

(ix) Krishna-Prema or the Divine Love for Krishna is the summum-bonum of human existence.

(x) The Vedas are the revealed truths.

The Supreme Lord Sree Gaursundar has taught these ten principles to all the people of the world.

I. The Vedas are self-revealed truths. They come down to us through the lips of the genuine devotees, such as Brahma, from the Supreme Lord in preceptorial succession. They are recognized as the criteria of true knowledge. They decide the nine principal doctrines as conclusive proofs with the help of auxiliary sources of knowledge viz., perception, inference, etc. Reasoning or argument being powerless, due to its limitation within the scope of time and space, has no access to transcendental truths.

II. Hari is the One Universal Truth Absolute worshipped by Brahma, Shiva, Indra and other minor gods. The attributeless Brahman is the effulgent aspect of His Spiritual Form. The Immanent Paramatma—the Primal Cause of this universe—is the partial aspect of the Supreme Lord Sri Hari who is the most beloved consort of Radha, and whose complexion is like that of a fresh nimbus cloud.

III. May the Supreme Lord Sri Hari who is identical with His internal self-conscious Energy yet independent of His energies be glorified. The marginal jiva potency and the external Mayik potency, though co-existent, are not identical with Him who lords it over all His potencies. He is the Sole Proprietor and Enjoyer of all His powers Cosmic and Extra-Cosmic. He is unchangeable in His manifestations and is the Supreme Lord not subject to any manifestations and transformations.

IV. May Sri Krishna, the Spiritual Eros of amorous games in Braja, be triumphant, who exhilarates Himself as well as His devotees through the loving service of His Ahladini Shakti (Exhilarating Energy). He disports Himself as the chief Centre of all Divine sentiments of Love through His pure self-conscious Sambit Energy. Through the agency of His Sandhini Energy (Energy of existence), He manifests Himself as well as all spiritual entities for His Pastimes in His Spiritual Abode. He is ever immersed in the ocean of Rasa and is the chief disporter of all love games in Braja.

V. The jiva souls are the atomic parts of the Oversoul like the sparks of a blazing fire. Like the rays of the sun, they are inseparably connected but are not one and the same with the Oversoul who is the Lord of Maya, His deluding Potency. A jiva soul, even in his unfettered state, is liable to be infatuated by the triple qualities of Maya.

VI. Those, who have forgotten their real nature hankering after selfish enjoyment of mundane phenomena and turn their back upon Krishna, are punished by the three-fold noose of His deluding Potency enshrouded by the double envelopes of gross and subtle bodies, and are hurled down to the great labyrinth of Karma sometimes enjoying heavenly pleasure for a while, sometimes suffering terrible miseries the next moment.

VII. In course of such erratic sojourn, when a conditioned soul comes in contact with a vaishnava (a true devotee) saturated with the intense love of Krishna, and finds relish to follow him in the track of pure devotion, he is released from his Mayik imprisonment by the constant hearing and chanting of the Holy Name of Krishna emanating from his lips. He then realises his own real nature and that of Godhead and enjoys the blissful state of pure love.in the company of saints (Absolute-realised souls).

VIII. Hari is the Supreme Lord of all His Potencies. The jiva, the cosmic and the extra cosmic worlds are the transformations of His Potencies. The theory of illusion as propounded by the Pantheists is untenable and false as it is opposed to the Srutis (self-revealed truths). It is the dirty filth of Kali. The doctrine of simultaneaus existence of distinction and non-distinction, as propounded by Lord Sri Chaitanya, is a pure theistic principle approved by the Srutis. In matters purely spiritual Divine Love ensures spiritual perfection and is ever triumphant.

IX. When a devotee performs faithfully the ninefold devotional practices of hearing, chanting, meditating, service of His Holy Feet, worship, greetings, doing all that pleases Him, friendship and self-surrendering, in obedience to the ritualistic devotion, he attains nascent love at the Lotus Feet of Sri Krishna.

X. When a devotee attains maturity in his spiritual practices, he realises his eternal nature which enkindles him to render loving services to the Divine Young Couple in Braja under the guidance of his Divine Master who is also an exhilarating potency eternally engaged in their services. The acme of his life in this world is attained when he is blessed with the confidential service in the love games of the Divine Pair which brings upon him the non-pareil wealth of felicity endowed in the highest ecstatic principle.

XI. A devotee who possesses a natural aptitude for the eternal services of Hari, must be well acquainted with the intricacies of scriptures. He must discriminate following inner truths viz.,—who is Krishna ? Who am I ? What is the nature of spiritual as well as mundane realm ? What is the relationship between Krishna and all these ? He must shun by all means the theory of illusion, all acts of piety and impiety and all sorts of offences against Vishnu and Vaishnava. If he does so, he is entitled, as an humble servant of Sri Hari, to drink the ambrosial bliss accruing from chanting the Holy Name in the society of true devotees. Having recourse to this tenfold Divine elixir a jiva can shake off his malady of nescience and regain his eternal natural state of love and bliss in the company of saints.

The Descent of the Revelation

The impressions of the world and the matter round us are registered upon our senses of perception, which thus become the recipients, in their different ways, of the consciousness of their nature and presence. Sound in the form of spoken language received by our sense of hearing is capable of conveying in a symbolical form these impressions experienced by the different senses and the mind.

But spoken word in this material world is again unlike the articulated sound beyond its three dimensions. That Sound is not enjoyed by our sense of hearing nor does He depend on the experience of the different senses and the mind for conveying His meaning. On the other hand that Sound is fully equipped with the organs and senses with which He can enjoy us, our senses, the material world and in fact everything where He chooses to resound. That Transcendental Word is eternally hearing us, but we cannot hear Him. That Sound is identical with God. He manifests His appearance in this world as the Name of God who again is identical with His Figure, Quality, Activity and Entourage.

Hence it is that the transmission of the Transcendental Sound or Word or Name can be only by the Sound Himself. The Divinity chooses to reveal Himself in the Form of Sound to the sense of hearing of the conditioned souls of the world. The Sound originally revealed Himself to Brahma and through him to Narada and the unbroken succession of the Masters through whom the Name has been transmitting Himself to this day. The Master is the medium of the Living Revelation of God.

Therefore, it is that the revealed Scriptures, which are the records of the Descent of the Revelation through the Masters, rightly and justly insist that the Master or the Guru alone can reveal to us the Sound, the Name, the Deity.

The line of the Masters is not a succession of isolated individuals appearing in the stream of passing time. Nor is one Master different from another Master in the same way as one individual of this world is different from another. As a matter of fact there is no isolation in the individual personality of the Masters. All the Masters are eternal and share a common personality. It is, therefore, only possible to approach the Guru as the line of the Divine Masters.

It is thus a matter of necessity for every person, who is sincerely desirous of approaching the Divine Sound, to seek for the mercy of the unbroken line of the Divine Masters. The reality and actual guidance of the Divine Masters are the basis and sanction of the spiritual association of their loyal followe. The four Vaishnava sampradayas have their unbroken lines of the Divine Masters. The line from Brahma has transmitted the Name in tact in the Madhva-Gaudiya or Brahma sampradaya. The succession of the Divine Masters of the Brahma sampradaya, super-excellent by being favoured by the Supreme Lord, is as follows :—

1. SREE KRISHNA
2. Brahma
3. Narada
4. Vyasa
5. Madhva or Purnaprajna
6. Padmanabha, Madhaba, Nrihari
7. Akshobhya
8. Jayatirtha
9. Jnanasindhu
10. Dayanidhi
11. Vidyanidhi
12. Rajendra
13. Jayadharma
14. Purushottma
15. Vyasatirtha
16. Brahmanyatirtha
17. Lakshmipati
18. Madhabendra Puri
19. Iswara Puri, Advaita, Nityananda
20. SREE CHAITANYA (1)
21. Sree Damodara-Swarupa, Sree Sanatana (2)
22. Sree Rup
23. Sree Raghunath and Sree Jeeva (3)

24. Sree Krishnadas Kaviraja (4)
25. Sree Narottama Thakur (5)
26. Sree Viswanath Chakravarti Thakur (6)
(Sree Hariballabh Das)
27. Sree Jagannath Das (7)
28. Sree Bhaktivinode Thakur (8)

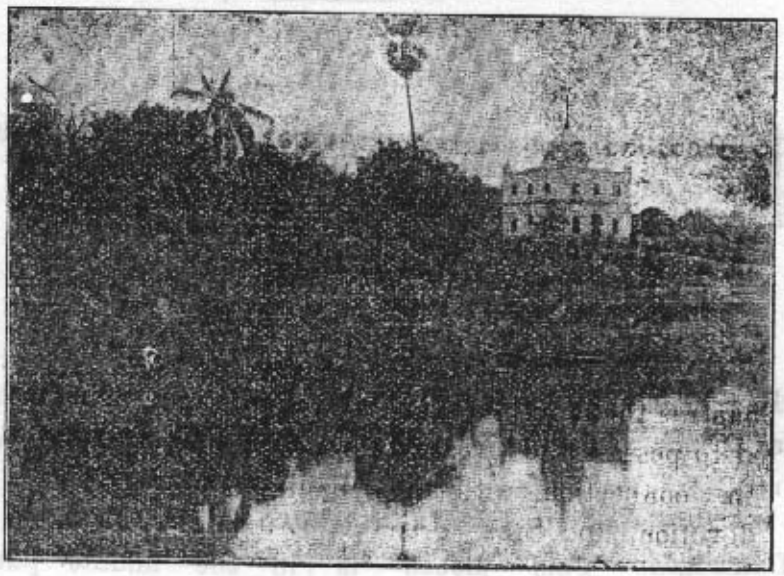
Mathura

In the Shastras the month of Kartika is declared to possess the greatest significance in connection with the practice of devotion to Sree Sree Radha-Damodara. This month is sacred to Damodara and should be spent in whole-time service in the holy city of Mathura.

Sree Krishna was born at Mathura. The modern city occupies practically the site of ancient Mathura, on the river Jamuna. About six miles to the north of Mathura is Brindaban and about seven miles to the south-east is Gokula. All the three places are located on the banks of the Jamuna, Mathura and Brindaban being on the western and Gokula on the eastern bank of the river.



After His birth, which took place in the middle part of a dark and tempestuous night, Sree Krishna was immediately taken to Gokula by His father Vasudeva who crossed the Jamuna, which was then in flood, wading on foot. Vasudeva and his wife Devaki had been confined in a strongly guarded prison by King Kamsa. Vasudeva easily got out of the prison unobserved and performed his journey to Gokula and back, leaving the new-born baby at Gokula in the home of Nanda and bringing back with him the newly born daughter of Jasoda, before the close of the night.

When He was twelve years of age Boy Krishna came to Mathura from Brindaban, where He was then living with Nanda and Jasoda, being ordered by King Kamsa to attend a sacrifice at his capital. Sree Krishna accordingly came to Mathura with Baladeva. He killed Kamsa, released His par from captivity and lived at Mathura with them for some years.

The city of Mathura was then beleagured by King Jarasandha. It was finally given up by Sree Krishna who then made Dwaraka His capital.

These events are described in detail in the Sreemad Bhagabatam and other Puranas.

Birth Site of Sree Krishna at Mathura

Damodara is the name of Krishna. While an Infant Krishna had submitted to be bound by Jasoda to a wooden husking-stand by means of a cord tied round His belly. 'Damodara' means literally 'one with the cord encircling his belly'.

Strict asceticism is enjoined upon those who observe the Urja Brata during the month of Kartika at the holy city of Mathura. They have to spend the whole day and night in discourses and chanting of the Name of Krishna in the company of devotees. Such strict observance of the Kartika-Brata with faith in the company of pure devotees produces real inclination to the service of Sree Krishna.

But the rules enjoined by the Shastras may be outwardly followed during the month of Kartika in the holy city of Mathura without a person being blessed with the rare inclination to the service of Sree Krishna. Such mishap does not prove the Shastras to be wrong.

Association with the pure devotee is possible and effective only by the causeless grace of the latter. Residence in Mathura is effected by the mercy of the pure devotee. Mathura is superior to Vaikuntha. Vaikuntha does not descend to this world. But Mathura has greater power of magnanimity and displays a higher manifestation of the activities of the Absolute than Vaikuntha. But we must not suppose that it is possible for any person to be eligible for living at Mathura in the same way as one lives on this mundane plane.

In order to attain the eligibility for residence at Mathura it is necessary to practise association with the sadhus, chanting of the Holy Name, listening to the Bhagabatam and the worship of the Lotus Feet of the Holy Image with spiritual faith. Those who are helpers in such a function in any way also perform the function of sadhus.

Residence at Mathura is no doubt the adored object of our spiritual endeavours But we also know that Kamsa was a resident of Mathura. Did Kamsa thereby obtain the fulfilment of worshipful service ? Kamsa desired his own pleasure instead of the Pleasure of Krishna. He wanted to misappropriate the pleasures that belong properly only to Krishna. Kamsa attained the state of inactive self-pleasure as the reward of being killed by Hari. He did not attain the plane of intimate service of Sree Krishna in the realm of Mathura, although he had been to all appearance a resident of Mathura.

One finds himself in the real Mathura through one's pure serving disposition. Kamsa tried not to serve but to enjoy Mathura. But Mathura is the plane of unalloyed spiritual existence in which Krishna manifests Himself in His Own Form to the serving consciousness of his pure devotees. Mathura is possessed of the quality of perfect spiritual initiative. Mathura is not any mundane country which possesses no consciousness. We can practise our enjoying mood towards inanimate mundane countries. But if we try to live at Mathura in that manner we miss the experience of residence at Mathura who is an object of worship. Those who serve Mathura are enabled by virtue of of their discipleship of Mathura to serve in the Mathura of their pure hearts the manifestation of the Birth of Krishna.

On the plane of Mathura the cognitive manifestation is not the mere relative mundane function. The cognitive function that displays itself at Mathura has no relation to any form of mundane activity or inactivity. The pure cognition is absolutely self-contained in its manifestation. This cognition is indivisible. Our former Master Sreela Madhabendra Puri has sung the the glory of Mathura in his famous couplet: "There is Mathura in the ear, Mathura in the mouth, Mathura in the eye, Mathura in the heart, Mathura now and here, Mathura hereafter, Mathura, only Mathura, exceedingly sweet, yea most sweet."

The repetition of the Name of Mathura in the verse of Sreela Puripad points to the identity of Mathura with the heart of the pure devotee and also to the fact that Mathura is a spiritual entity and the object of our worship. The heart that is identical with Mathura is not subject to the processes of birth, death or worldly existence. Mathura is the Guru and object of our worship, the Eternal Realm of Krishna. Mathura is the summum bonum.

The denizens of Mathura are the servitors of Krishna. Here at Mathura everything is engaged in the service of Krishna and there can be no entity who does not serve Krishna and no experience except the realisation of His service. Every tiny creeper, every little blade of grass of Mathura occupi a position of superiority to myself. Every one of them is my Guru, the servant of my Krishna. If one's judgment reaches this point, only then it is possible for him to be a resident of Mathura. Residence at Mathura means the attainment of eligibility to serve all those entities who are eternally engaged in the service of the Nativity of Krishna.

Sree Mayapur is identical with Mathura. At Mathura the Lord of Vaikuntha, who is not subject to mundane birth, manifests His eternal transcendental nativity.

People of this world perform the worship of Maya at the close of the rainy season. Maya means that power by which one is enabled to measure or comprehend an entity of this mundane world by one's defective faculties. This function is performed towards the shadow of the Reality. This measuring propensity is the root-cause of all our miseries. Our unserving disposition is responsible for our inclination to engage in such activities. Maya dresses us up as imaginery lords of this phenomenal world. But Yoga-Maya makes us spiritual servitors of the Divine Pair, Sree Sree Radha-Damodara.

Sakshee Gopal

(Adopted from Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita)

That Brahmanyadev who although an Idol reached a land which he did travelling on foot for one hundred days for the good of a Brahmin, I prostrate unto that Sakshee-Gopal who did this unprecedented act for the sake of a Brahman.

Glory to Sree Chaitanya ; Glory to Nityananda ; Glory to Adwaita and Glory to the devotees of Gaur.

After the acceptance of Sanyas, the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanyadev on His way to Puri reached the village of Jajpur, where He bowed to the Image of Varaha. He danced, sang and prayed long in love and passed the night in the village. To see Sakshee-Gopal He came to Katak and was enraptured with the beauty of Gopal. Being in a trance He sang, danced and prayed to the Gopal. During His stay there that night He heard the story of Gopal with great pleasure. While Nityananda was on pilgrimage He had come to Katak and seen Sakhees-Gopal. He now narrated the whole story to the Lord.

Once upon a time two Brahmanas of Vidyanagar set out on a pilgrimage. After visiting Gaya, Benares, Allahabad and other places they reached Muttra in jocund mood. After visiting Ban during the circumambulation they beheld Govardhan, Dwadash Ban, and at last came to Brindaban. Here Gopal was worshipped with great pomp in the great Temple. They bathed at Keshighat, Kaliya lake and in other places and took rest in the temple of Gopal whose exquisite beauty ravished their hearts. Happily they spent a few days there. Of the two Brahmanas one being old was carefully attended by the younger one. The old man was highly pleased with his attendance and said, "You served me long in diverse ways and helped me in performing my pilgrimage. Even a son does not serve his father so earnestly and lovingly. I am saved from every difficulty and trouble through your kindness. It will be sheer ingratitude if I do not honour you. So I shall give you my daughter in marriage." At this the junior Brahman replied, "Listen, sir ; why talk of that which cannot come to pass ; you are high in lineage, great in learning and wealth,

1. Dwadash Ban—viz., Bhadra, Vilwa, Loha, Bhandir, Mahaban on the east of Jamuna ; Madhu, Tal Kumud, Vahula, Kamya, Khadir, Brindabana on the west of Jamuna.

while I am non-kulin lacking in scholarship and riches. I am no worthy match for your daughter. Through love of Krishna I do serve you, as He is pleased if Brahmans are served. His pleasure increases the store of Bhakti." To this the old man answered, "Cherish no doubt. What wonder is there in it that I should give you my daughter." The junior Brahman rejoined, "You have a large circle of wife, sons, friends and relatives, without whose consent you cannot wed your daughter. The case of Bhishmak, father of Rukmini, stands testimony to this. Bhishmak had strong desire to wed his daughter to Krishna but was greatly opposed by his sons. The oldman replied, "My daughter is my own property, who can oppose me in giving away what is mine? I shall give you my daughter in the face of all opposition. Please doubt not, but concent to it." The junior Brahman said, "If you are really decided to give me your daughter, please take a vow before Gopal." At this the old man said before Gopal, "Know Ye Gopal that I give my daughter to this young man." To this the junior Brahman added, "Lord, you are my witness. I shall summon you to bear testimony, if he breaks his promise."

After this discourse the two traced their steps homewards. The junior Brahman served the other in various ways like an elder and reached their respective homes in course of time. After some time the old man thought within himself, "I promised and gave my word to the Brahman in a holy land, but how can I keep it? Surely my wife, sons, friends and relatives will know it." So, one day he gathered his kindred and related the whole story before them. Hearing this, they began to wail and cried, "Never utter such words again; you will lose your lineage if you marry your daughter to a low-born man and all will laugh at you." "The Brahman urged, "How can I retract a promise made in a holy place? Come what may, I will wed my daughter to him". His kinsmen threatened to boycott him, and wife and sons to take poison. The Brahman pleaded, "He will make a case of it by summoning witness. He will take the daughter winning the case, the result ant being the loss of my faith." The son quickly replied, "Witness is an idol and that too in a distant land, who will give testimony against you. Be not perturbed. You need not tell the lie that you had never promised. But simply you will pretend forgetfulness. If you act up to this I shall carry the day in court." At this the poor man in great consternation prayed within, "Gopal, to Thee I make obeisance; save my faith, save my kindred, pray save both the sides."

At this juncture, one day the younger Brahman came and paying his respect to the old Brahman said with folded hands, "You promised me your daughter, but now you are silent on the point ; what is the matter ?" The old man remianed silent but his sons ran up to beat the visitor with stick crying, "You base, you want to marry my sister. Being a dwarf, you intend to catch the moon." The youth fled ; but on another occasion he gathered all the villagers together, who summoned the old man. Then the junior Brahman began to speak, addressing the assembly, "This old man promised me his daughter. Please ask him why he does not give her up now." Being questioned by the people, the old Brahman replied, "Listen, sirs, my supplication, I do not exactly remember what I said so long ago. At this his sons seizing the opportunity came forward and impudently asserted, "My father had much money during his pilgrimage. This wretch, the only companion, coveted the money, intoxicated father, making him take dhutura[1] robbed him and said that thieves had stolen away the money, and spread the tale that he had promised his daghter to him. You all may judge whether he is a suitable match for my sister." The people assembled were filled with suspicion and thought, it might be, avarice makes men commit sin. At this stage the junior Brahman said, "Pray listen, sirs, he is telling lies to win the case. His father, being pleased with my services, promised me his daughter voluntarily ; and when I declined saying, 'I am not a worthy match for your daughter,' and showed our disparity in lineage, wealth and learning, yet he repeatedly pressed me to accept her. I told him further, 'that your kindred, wife and sons will not consent and will stand in the way and will prove you to be faithless.' Again the old man earnestly promised and said, 'it is true I shall give you my own daughter ; who can hold me to give away what is mine ?' Then I resolved and strengthened my heart and suggested to call Gopal to witness his promise, which he did. I also added and prayed to the Lord to be my witness whose word is held true in the three worlds." The oldman breathed a sigh of relief and said, "This is good. If Gopal appear here and bear testimony I shall surely give you my daughter." His sons also agreed to it. The old man thought within, "Krishna is All-merciful. He will surely bear testimony to my word." His son thought that image would not come to act as a witness. So thinking they consented.

To

His Holiness

Tridandi Swami Sreemad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj of Sree Gaudiya Math.

Your Holiness,

We, the citizens of Muttra or Mathura, the Holy city of the Nativity of Lord Sree Krishna, are glad to have the opportunity of extending to your Holiness our hearty welcome on this most auspicious occasion of your Holiness's arrival here on return from England.

Swami B. P. Tirtha.

The Sanatan Dharma is generally misunderstood and misrepresented in Kali Yuga owing to neglect of the worship of Sree Krishna, the Supreme Lord and the highest form of the Personality of Godhead whose auspicious Advent in the highest knowledge in pure form sanctified this city and whose transcendental activities are eternally associated with every thing of the whole of Braja Mandal. Although for some time the sacred places and associations thereof were forgotten by the public, just 450 years ago the Lord Krishna Himself in the role of Sree Krishna Chaitanya Mahaprabhu came here and rediscovered to the public all the sacred associations of Barja Mandal which were given great publicity to by His eminent apostles, the six Goswamis headed by Sree Rupa and Sanatan who lived here long and gave to the world an elaborate literature of a wonderful nature on the theology and practice of Sanatan Dharma in its complete and living form for the highest benefit of mankind.

We are aware that your Holiness is the disciple of Srila Thakur Bhakti Vinode, the great saint of the last century who brought out about 100 books on the teachings of Sree Chaitanya (the religion of Sree Krishna) was the pioneer in propagating this religion to the educated public of the present generation. And we are also aware that this movement has since been taken up and conducted in a world-wide scale by his Divine Grace Paramahansa Sree Sreemad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj who initiated your Holiness with Tridanda Sanyas in 1920 for carrying on the propaganda by methods approved by the Shastras and followed by Sree Chaitanya.

We are also aware that since 1920 your Holiness has been actively engaged in the preaching of Vaishnavism under the distinguished guidance of the Divine Master, the Paramahansa Saraswati Goswami Maharaj to the great admiration and benefit of the educated public throughout India, but mostly confining your activities in Bridaban and Naimisaranya in the Sitapur District for the propagation and popularising of the Bhagabata.

The brilliant career of your missionary activities in India richly qualified your Holiness in being selected by the Gaudiya Math for extending the propaganda to the west and for the first time in great Britain and Germany. We appreciate the great difficulties against which your Holiness had to work in an alien country in every way different from Indian outlook. But we are highly satisfied to learn of the admiration extorted from every quarter by an ideal life in purely Indian methods both in diet and in habits and by thoroughly practising what is preached.

We are filled with great joy and pride to learn that inspite of various odds your Holiness was successful in the course of a short period of eighteen months in effecting an appreciable change in the British public in their outlook on India specially her religion and in creating a great impression among the highest dignitaries, an interest among the public and in supplying food for thought and consideration among the educated by means of private discussions, social gatherings and public lectures at the different Universities, in many learned societies and in public platform as a result of which a centre has been established and a strong committee under the name of Gaudiya Mission has been formed with most influential personalities of England for furthering the propaganda in the west culminating in a speedy spiritul regenaration of the world through the diffusion of the knowledge and significance of the worship of Sree Radha-Krishna by dint of the efforts of your Holiness and other Sanyasi preachers of the Gaudiya Mission.

We hail this opportunity of offering our deep gratitude to your Holiness's glorious and successful preaching of the glory of Mathura, Braja Mandal and of Radha-Krishna, your love for whom is evinced by your arrival to this place on return from the west and encouraged by the august visit, in our midst, of the illustrious Divine Master of your Holiness, His Divine Grace Paramahansa Sree Sreemad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj. We wish most ardently for the restoration of the worship of Sree Radha-Krishna in pristine purity and we hope for the actual realisatson of the loving service of Radha-Krishna through the enlightenment of the able preachings of your mission, where we will be in a position to see the real perspective of Mathura in our spiritual vision.

We are, yours respectfully,
THE CITIZENS OF MUTTRA.

Round the Gaudiya Maths

Sree Chaitanya Math :

Sree Chaitanya Math at Sreedham Mayapur is the principal Parent Math of Sree Viswa Vaishnav Raj Sabha, established for the purpose of infusing the whole Universe with Nam Samkirtana as promulgated by Sree Krishna Chaitanya Mahaprabhu. During the month of Kartic, the devotees of the Math observed Urjabrata strictly following the direction of the Editor Sree Chaitanya Mangal by Srila Thakur Lochandas is being read in the morning everyday. Srimad Bhagabat is expounded very lucidly in the evening by Pandit Radha Govinda Brahmachari Kavyatirtha.

Sree Yogapeetha :

A superb and magnificient temple is being erected at Yogapeetha, the Birth Site of Sriman Mahaprabhu in Sreedham Mayapur. Sj. Sakhi Charan Roy Bhaktivijoy, a wealthy merchant of Calcutta is the illustrious donor of the temple. He is always earnest and sincere in engaging himself to the service of Sree Hari-Guru-Vaishnavas. He is really making the proper use of his wealth and riches in properly employing them in the service of Madhab. The members of his family also take a keen interest in this matter,

Sreebas Angan :—

Sreebas Angan in Sridham Mayapur is identical with Rasasthal of Sree Radha-Krishna. It is always resounding with the chanting of Kirtan. Pure and self-realised souls can realise it. The construction work of the Verandah of the temple with Natya Mandir is gradually progressing. Fortunate persons spend also their earthly wealth in the service of the Supreme Lord and thus receive Divine Grace.

Sree Madhwa Gaudiya Math:—

The Annual celebration of Sree Madhwa Gaudiya Math, Dacca, commenced on the 17th October last. In this connection Tridandiswamis Sreemd Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj, Srimad. Bhakti Prakash Aranya Maharaj, Saeepad Siddhaswarup Brahmachari and other Brahmacharis of the Mission having formed into several preaching parties are actively engaged in propagating the messages of the Gaudiya Math in Dacca and in the neighbouring towns and villages. The daily programme includes Kirtan, Puja, Bhograg, expounding of Srimad Bhagabat and religious discourses. Besides, on special festive occasions, holding of lectures and other ceremonies have been arranged. The economic crisis has been forgot by the citizens and they are automatically rallying at the call of the servants of the Supreme Lord to enable the spiritual propaganda to be carried on with greater splendour and success than in previous years. Through the earnest efforts of Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj a plot of land measuring 2 bighas has been secured at Narinda in the important part of the city, for the erection of a temple on premises of its own. Annakut Mahotsab or the celebration of the peak of food was duly observed with great enthusiasm. The celebrations will last till November 21.

Sree Annakut Mahotsab :

Sree Gobardhan Puja and Annakut Mahotsab came off on November 8. It was celebrated with great pomp and grandeur at Sree Gaudiya Math, Calcutta. One thousand and fifty-six varieties of food, prepared by innumerable experts, were offered to the Deity. The extent, variety and arrangements of the Annakut celebration of the Math are well known to one and all as unique in India, and arrangements for this year also displayed the utmost grandeur. The whole-day programme included puja, Aratrika, Kirtana, Bhograg, Darsan and distribution of Sree Annakut Mahaprasad. The function was well observed in different branch Maths.

Muttra :

Editor with a number of Tridandiswamis, Brahmacharis and other devotees is residing at Muttra. The preachers of the mission have undertaken active and vigorous propaganda in the said locality and outside. A large number of people from different parts of the country have assembled there to listen to the transcendental tidings of the Lord. Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj and Srimad Bhakti Sudhir Yachak Maharaj accompanied by Mahamahopadeshak Aprakrita Bhaktisaranga Goswami and a party of Brahmacharis left on November 9, for Bharatpur to preach the doctrine of Sree Chaitanya Dev there. The party was given a cordial reception and all facilities were given to them for propagada work. Rao Raghubir Sinha Bahadur, late Dewan of Bharatpur Raj State came to Editor and listened to Harikatha from him.

Propaganda Works :

In Germany :

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Hridaya Bon Maharaj, Preacher-in-charge of Sree Gaudiya Math in the west, delivered a most erudite and interesting lecture on Mahaprabhu's Philosophy in German at the Berlin University in the presence of a large gathering of scholars and distinguished persons. It was appreciated by audience. Swamiji is receiving sympathies and honest enquiries from all quarters. British ambassador in Berlin is much impressed and has arranged for interview of Swamiji with high officials on his return from lecture tour on December 20. Swamiji started for Leipzig on November 12, for lecturing at the Leipzig University.

In Burdwan :

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Vilas Gavasti Nemi Mahharaj, with a party of Brahmacharis is on preaching tour in Burdwan. Sj. Baidya Nath Ray, a leading member of the local Bar, received Swamiji with respectful adoration and accommodated the party in a most hospitable manner. Srimad Bhagabat was read and explained at the residence of Sj. Naresh Chandra Mittra on October 31. His natural elloquence, sweet voice, and impressive mode of explanation attracted the intelligent section of the public. On November 1, an interesting lecture was delivered at the local Harisabha with display of lantern slides, touching on the Leela of Sriman Mahaprabhu. The people are eagerly responding to the spiritual call of the devotees of the Mission.

In Patna :

Sripad Sivananda Brahmachari, preacher of the Patna Gaudiya Math, is preaching the doctrine of Sriman Mahaprabhu and Messages of the Gaudiya Math in the town of Patna and the neighbouring places. The people of the locality are helping the activities of the Mission in manifold ways.

In Chittagong :

A party of preachers consisting of eight persons under the guidance of Tridandiswami Bhakti Vilas Gavasti Nemi Maharaj started from Gaudiya Math on November 11, for propaganda in Burma via Chittagong. Our readers have been duly informed about this project. Tridandiswami Bhakti Sarbaswa Giri Maharaj, who is busily engaged in conducting the Annual Celebrations at Dacca, has been requested to join the party at Chittagong after the celebration is over. The party of Nemi Maharaj on arrival at Chittagang was received at the Railway station by the devotees and some of the leading persons of the place. Sj. Ambika Charan Das, Editor of the daily Panchajanya with his staff, was among those present for according his hearty welcome to the party. The educated people of the city are taking much interest. The Swamiji is expounding Srimad Bhagabat in different parts of the city and many educated men are daily assembling. The Editor of Panchajanya is kindly giving wide publicity to the activities of Swamiji. Swamiji delivered a most learned lecture on Sanatandharma at Jatra Mohan Sen Hall on November 14.

Orissa :

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Swarup Parbat Maharaj, Sripad Krishnananda Brahmachari Bhaktisastri and other Brahmacharis are on a propaganda tour to different places in Orissa. The party have visited Talcher where the Rajasahib gave them a warm welcome. On November 5, Swamiji expounded Srimad Bhagabat in the palace, the subject being the history of Ajamil. Rajasahib Kishore Chandra Bahadur, the prince, Private Secretary, Dewan Bahadur and other members of the Raj family attentively listened to the exposition. Melodious kirtan preceded and followed the discourse. From Talcher the party went to Hindol State at a distance of 40 miles from Talcher, by motor conveyance. Rajasahib was very much pleased on learning about the purpose of the preachers and arranged for a series of discourses. A public lecture on "Varnashram and present situation" was delivered at the local M. E. School by Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Swarup Parb at Maharaj on November 8.

Sraddha Ceremony :

The pious daughter of late Babu Rajendra Chandra Pal Choudhuri of Lohajong performed the Sraddh ceremony of her departed father on November 7, at the Calcutta Gaudiya Math in accordance with Vaishnava procedure as laid down in Sri Haribhaktivilas.

An Appreciation

(A letter to Editor)

Revered Friend,

I am delighted to receive the first number of your beautiful fortnightly journal "The Harmonist" in its new form.

I am sure the journal will be highly appreciated and if conducted according to the ideals and improvements mentioned in the "Editorial notes," I have little doubt it will de received with great enthusiasm and love by the devotees of Lord Sree Krishna.

Please accept my congratulation.

The days are dark but keep it up. Buddha has travelled to the west, but Krishna is not known there. Some, there, perhaps know but Krishna's name, but alas ! with what wrong conceptions about Him ? His Message of Holy love the one hope of humanity has yet not travelled there, the fault is ours. How happy I was to learn that Swami Bon is there !

Jaiva Dharma

23. In the assembly of spiritually enlightened persons every one is in a position to realise the meaning of the words of the Shastras. So it is not necessary for me to explain the meaning of the text of the Bhagavata. I would, however, like to add that the provision of varna and ashrama is the basis of the life for obeying the commands of God. Irreligion comes to prevail in a country in a proportion as it happens to be more or less without the varnashrama organisation.

24. Let us now consider the nature of the application of the terms, "nitya" and "naimittika" to "karma". If we look the underlying significance of the Shastras we cannot resist the conclusion that those terms in their application to "karma" are not used in their spiritual sense. They are used in reference to "karma" with a mundane or transferred connotation. The terms 'nitya dharma,' 'nitya karma,' 'nitya tattva,' 'nitya satya' etc., can be properly used in reference to no other position except the unalloyed spiritual condition of the soul. Therefore, when the term 'nitya' is used in reference to 'karma' as a means to an end, we must understand that 'karma' which is distantly indicative of the eternal truth in this world is called 'nitya' only by reason of such reference. 'Karma' is never 'nitya' or eternal. It is only when 'karma' by the method of karma-yoga' is engaged in the quest of 'jnana,' and 'jnana' points to 'bhakti,' that 'karma' and 'jnana are termed 'nitya' in a transferred sense. When the evening worship performed by a Brahmana is called 'nitya karma' it means no more than this that the method that has been laid down in regard to the material activities of our physical body, in as much as, it has a distant bearing on bhakti, is nitya as a means towards the realisation of the eternal function, and not because it is itself 'nitya'. Such application is known as 'upachara'.

25. In truth Krishna-prema or love for Krishna is the only eternal function of the soul. Its ontological nature may be stated as the activity of the unalloyed cognitive principle. Those material activities that are resorted to for the realisation of the spiritual function are performed towards the same end. Therefore, there is no harm if they are prescribed as eternal in this sense. From the absolute point of view it is better to call them 'naimittika' instead of 'nitya'. The distinctions of 'nitya' and 'naimittika' as applied to different varieties of 'karma' itself are for convenience and have no eternal significance,

26. In a consideration of the actual entity of things the exercise of the unmixed cognitive principle is admissible as the only eternal natural function of the individual soul. Every other function is accidental. Varnashrama (the duties of the varnashrama organisation), astanga-yoga (the eight-fold yoga process), sankhya-jnana (the path of materialistic knowledge) and tapasya (asceticism), all these are accidental functions. There would have been no necessity for all those functions if the individual soul had not been in bondage to Maya. On account of his having been fettered by Maya, the resulting infatuated state is itself one of the accidental causes. All those functions as the products of that accident, have thus become duties for the jiva. From the absolute point of view all of them are accidental functions.

27. The superior status of a Brahmana, his fruitive activities like the ritualistic practices of daily worship and prayers and assumption of sanyas (life of an ascetic by renunciation of family and society)—all these are accidental natural functions. These duties are held in esteem by the Dharmashastras (codes of social duty) and are most wholesome at the appropriate stages of spiritual pupilage. Yet they have no claim to one's regard as being on a footing with the eternal spiritual function. A shloka of the Bhagabat (Bhag. 7/9/9) runs thus : "Even the Chandala, feeding on the carcase of dogs, is better than a Brahmana, possessed of all the twelve good qualities, who is averse to the service of the Lotus Feet of Krishna. This is so because I hold that a person, whose mind, speech, all endeavours and wealth are dedicated to Krishna, sanctifies his family as well as his own life, whereas the Brahmana, although he is possessed of immense honour in society, cannot do so."

28. A Brahmana is distinguished above the other orders by his possession of the following twelve good qualities viz., truthfulness, control over his senses, austerity, freedom from malice, forbearance, freedom from envy, offering of sacrifice, offering of charitable gifts, constancy, listening to the Vedas and performance of vowed pious works. A Brahmana, endowed with these twelve good qualities, certainly commands the reverence of all persons in this world. But notwithstanding the possession of all these good qualities if he happens to be without devotional aptitude for Krishna, the All-attractive Supreme Lord, then even a dog-eating Chandala, who is possessed of spontaneous inclination to serve Krishna, must be held to be superior to him in every way. The real meaning of the shloka is that a person who, although born in a Chandala family, may resort to the cultivation of his spiritual nature, which is the eternal function of all pure souls (jiva), by being purified by constant association with the sadhus, is superior even to a Brahmana who, born in a Brahmana family may be assiduous also in the practice of the enjoined accidental functions but does not actively practise the eternal function in the shape of culturing his unalloyed spiritual nature.

29. In this world there are to be found two types of persons viz., those whose sense of right and wrong has been roused to activity and those in whom it is dormant. The world may be said to be almost full of the latter type. Persons whose ethical sense is properly aroused are extremely rare. A Brahmana is the highest among those whose ethical judgment is dormant ; and, therefore, the daily worships and prayers, that are the appropriate duties of persons endowed with the disposition of Brahmanas, are also the highest among the functions that are performed by this type of people. Persons, whose moral sense has been properly aroused to the state of activity, are also known as Vaishnavas. The conduct of Vaishnavas must necessarily present points of difference from that of persons whose sense of right and wrong is dormant. But although the conduct of the Vaishnavas happens to be different it is not opposed to the spirit of the Smarta rules that have been made for the guidance of persons with dormant ethical sense. The spirit of the regulations of the Shastras is the same in every case. Persons, whose moral sense is dormant, have been under the necessity of remaining confined to a particular portion of the elementary provisions of the Shastras. Persons, possessed of active moral sense, extend their friendly welcome to the spirit of the Shastras. There is no difference in spirit despite any difference in acts. To ineligible persons the conduct of persons with an awakened conscience has an appearance of being opposed to that of people in general. But as a matter of fact the underlying significance of even such apparently different conduct is one and the same.

30. In the judgment of persons with properly awakened ethical faculties it should appear as quite proper to teach the accidental function to people in general. But the temporary function is nevertheless really imperfect, adulterated with unwholesome ingredients and impermanence.

31. The accidental function does not attempt the direct culture of our spiritual nature. In it the culture of the material principle is accepted in the form that is not incompatible with spiritual culture. Such function thus becomes no more than a means for the attainment of spiritual culture proper as the end. The means ceases to be followed on the production of its end. For this reason the means is also never complete in itself. The means is only a dissociated section of the truth of the thing which is the end. Hence the accidental function can never be perfect. For example the duties of daily worship and prayers of a Brahmana are temporary and dependant upon the observance of the proper rules in exactly the same way as his other secular duties. Those activities do not proceed from his natural spiritual disposition. After one has been accustomed to a course of such regulated activities for a long time, and when he comes to feel a liking for direct spiritual culture in the form of the chant of the Name of Hari by dint of the purification of his mind through active association with pure devotees, the duties of daily worship and prayer in the form of secular occupations are no longer necessary. The performance of the chant of the Name of Hari is complete spiritual culture. The performance of the daily prescribed worship and prayers is only a means for the attainment of the said end. Such performance never attains the characteristic of the complete activity.

(To be continued).

Shree Shree Namastakam

(1) O Hari Nama ! the tips of Thy Lotus Feet have eternally been adorned with the glowing radiance diffused from the gemmed chaplets of the Upanishads, the crest-jewels of the Vedas. Thou art eternally worshipped by the liberated souls. O Hari Nama ! clearing myself of all offences I entirely take shelter in Thee.

(2) O Holy Nama ! All Glory to Thee, who art eternally chanted by the saints. To confer eternal bliss upon the people Thou hast appeared before them as the Transcendental Word. Thou killest all sorts of terrible sufferings of him who happens to chant even Thy dim reflection known as Namabhasha.

(3) O Sun of Blessed Nama ! even the slightest reflection of Thy Radiant Self is sufficient to dispel the gloom of ignorance from the minds of those who are steeped in the foul sink of worldliness, and to confer the spiritual vision of pure devotion on those who are blind of the inner sight. Who is there so expert in the world that can sing the glories of the Nama ito finish ?

(4) O Holy Nama ! the seed of mundane acts which necessitate rebirth for their fruition is not totally destroyed despite realisation of at-oneness with Brahman by dint of constant meditation. But O Hari Nama ! No sooner dost Thou gain a free scope on the tongue of Thy chanter the seeds of mundane activity of his previous lives are destroyed. So the Vedas loudly declare.

(5) O Killer of the demon Agha ! O Son of Yoshoda ! O Son of Nanda ! O Lotus-Eyed ! O Moon of the Gopees ! O Lord of Vrindavana ! O Merciful to the submissive ! O Krishna ! Thou hast manifested Thy Self in such various Forms out of Thy infinite mercy ! Let my ardour of love for Thee ever increase !

(6) O Holy Nama ! Thou hast a double Form viz., Vashya (signified) i.e., the Transcendental Personality of Godhead, and Vachaka (significant) i.e., the Transcendental Word or Name. such as Krishna, Govinda etc., identical with the Vachya. But to us, the Latter or Vachaka is more compassionate than the former or Vachya, the Divine Personality against whom we, fallen souls, have sinned; because, as soon as we chant the Vachaka i.e., Thy Holy Nama, keeping clear of offences against the Nama, we are at once immersed in the blissful ocean of Divine Love.

(7) O Holy Nama! O Krishna! Thou killest the offences of Thy devotees who have taken shelter in Thy Lotus Feet. Thou art the Embodiment of the most delightful Self-conscious concentrated Bliss. Thou art, O Holy Nama, the embodiment of the great rejoicings of Gokula. O Krishna! I offer my humble greetings, time and again, to Thee, the Divine Form of all exquisiteness in the fullest degree.

(8) O Holy Nama of Krishna! Thou art the very Life of Narada's guitar and the spiritual elixir of the ambrosial ripples of the ocean of the Divine mellowness of Love. I beseech Thee O Holy Nama! do Thou ever find a full scope in my tongue with all the ardour of Divine Love.

The Doctrine of Illusion vs. Vaishnavism

By Aprakrita Bhaktisaranga Goswami

Shankar's disregard of considerations in favour of the distinctive transcendental activities of pure souls is altogether untenable. The point of view of Shandilya Rishi whom he attempts to refute stands fully vindicated to all sincere souls. This has been conclusively shown by many distinguished writers.

I do not see, because my vision is liable to be eclipsed when I am located in the realm of three dimensions. These wrong conceptions are not got rid of till I am established in the purely spiritual state which is free from all mundane limitations. They have established their firm hold on me by my neglect to take into my serious consideration the claims of the transcendental existence. In the Bhagabatam "Viswanath" instructs "Satee" as to the proper nature of Vasudeva. He tells her of the activities and realisations of the unalloyed spiritual essence. Viswanath makes his obeisance to Vasudeb. Those who are willing to hear his words, in the spirit of humility displayed by Viswanath, can, indeed, hear them. Those who covet fame and wealth are given those things by Mahamaya (the great Deluding Power).

The Teachings of Sree Krishna Chaitanya refer to the un-alloyed function of the soul. The person in whom the real hankering for listening to Hari-katha (Word of Godhead) manifests itself, displays total absence of every form of worldly pedantry and vanity. To such a person it is not the summum bonum for man to attain a high degree of material civilisation. The alternative of merging in the undistinguished spiritual essence of the Brahman presents itself to the choice of the soul as the summum bonum in the concluding stages of the development of mental speculation. The formulation of such a doctrine marked an advance on the Budhistic position which had put the principle of mercy in the shape of mere toleration of all animation, above the requirements of sense-ridden worldly elevationism. But the service of the Supreme Predominating Personality (Purusottama), or Vasudeva, is beyond the range of speculation of even those who regard merging in the indivisible indistinct cognitive principle as the goal. Srimad Bhagabatam has accordingly advised us to cease all speculative activities and concentrate on the consideration of the Mercy of the Real Entity made available to us by His Descent to the plane of our cognitive vision. It is, therefore, necessary to turn our attention to the serious consideration of the function of pure souls who belong to the positive eternal world.

This truth was revealed in the heart of Brahma before he began to create this world. Subsequently, when by the operation of the influence of time differing speculations on the subject of the ultimate Reality made their appearance in this world, Krishna himself came down to the mundane plane in different visible forms to prevent erroneous views regarding the nature of the Absolute which have always been eclipsing from our view the knowledge of the Absolute handed down by Brahma through the medium of successive bona fide spiritual teachers. The Ten Avataras of Krishna were for the purpose of re-establishing in this world the eternal function of the soul (Sanatan Dharma).

That function is not limited even to the essentially true but not fully developed spiritual visions of Bodhayana Rishi and Lakshmana Desika Anandatirtha mercifully gave to the world the conception of the worship of Boy-Gopala. The Sonhood of Krishna is inconceivable to the reverential serving attitude. Sree Ramanuja has offered his arguments against the desirability of intimate unconventional relationship with Godhead lest it might give rise to very great evils. But Sree Krishna Chaitanya and His followers have extended our spiritual vision to the highest spheres of transcendence.

The worship of those who are eligible to praise Godhead by the offer of their unalloyed spiritual reverential homage is relatively undeveloped in comparison with the intimate all-loving service of Braja. We should not remain contentedly pinned to the level of the service of even Arjuna. Chitraka, Patraka, Sridam and Sudama stand on a much more intimate footing. They are eligible to offer to Krishna even the remainders of their tasted food. Godhead is cherished with the tendermost affection by them. They know Krishna as nothing more nor less than a friend. They know familiarly that He is theirs. The Divine Son is served by His parents from His infancy. Krishna is not served by Nanda and Yasoda in expectation or otherwise of any return of a commercial equivalent of service from Him in their old age.

In offering our pure worship to the Absolute Personality Sree Krishna we may stand in one or other of the relationships of absolute neutrality, of a servant, friend, parent, wife or consort i.e., of Shanta, Dasya, Sakhya, Batsalya or Madhura Rasa—the fivefold possible personal relationships that are also to be found on this earth. In Shanta, Dashya and the reverential moiety of Sakhya Rasas we approach Godhead with the reserve of reverential attitude. More intimate and even more laudable service can be rendered to Him by the confidential moiety of Sakhya, Batsalya and Madhura Rasas. When we look up to Goloka from below we see only the lower half of the Highest Sphere, not the upper half. Half the thing is placed for our ocular activity, not the other half. In the other half we find confidential Sakhya Batsalya and Madhura. Even those who are privileged to approach Godhead by the pure reverential aptitude, may miss the more confidential and intimate service. I mean that the upper two and half "rasas" for more confidential and intimate service are withheld for their own purpose. Sonhood and Consorthod of Godhead would not be understood. If we choose to remain confined to the two and a half varieties of reverential service by accepting the tidings of Ramanuja we would not be enabled thereby to practise the remaining two and a half varieties of intimate relationships to be found in Goloka. There can be no permanent absence of fullness in Godhead. The upper two and a half Rasas which are open to His servitors may, through deliberate neglect of their proper cultivation hurl us down to Godlessness.

We are also not to confine ourselves to the level of the worship of Ram-Sita which is no doubt higher than the worship hinted by Shankara and developed by Ramanuja, but which nevertheless stands in the way of our participating in the pastimes of non-conventional Divine Amour. Godhead should not be restricted. It is not possible for us to realise the nature of pure reverential worship not to say of the service of the milkmaids of Braja, as long as the existence of the gross and subtle physical bodies persist to obscure our vision. The pure-hearted Rishis of Dandakaranya alone could conceive the transcedental desire for serving Ramachandra in the relationship of consorthood, but their desire was not fulfilled till after they had been reborn in Braja. The cult of Vasudevism as imagined by even the late R. G. Bhanderkar and most European scholars is not reconcilable with the needs of complete self-realisation. The level of transcendental service is not attained thereby.

We should be disposed to accept as our eternal function nothing short of the ideal of the service of the milkmaids of Braja taught and practised by Sree Chaitanya. Consorthood constitutes the highest plane of the service of Sree Krishna.

आराध्यो भगवान् व्रजेशतनयस्तद्धाम वृन्दावनं

Other opinions are for deceiving or cautioning the ignorant. They are of no further use on the attainment of enlightenment. The other opinions have different interpretations on the scriptural evidence. They are hampered by this radical defect of their poverty of the fullest convincing power. The Sankarsana Sutra has dealt with this vital point. The enlightening potency of the Transcendental Sound purges our mind of all preventive dirts and enables us to accept the true meaning of the words of the scriptures. We are thereby enabled to avoid all hasty conclusions which have a tendency to drive us more or less to seek to merge in the impersonal derivative aspect of the Absolute.

A few words of appreciation of Kavikarnapura

(By Sambidananda Das M. A.)

It will be enough to say here that Rasa, which Kavikarnapura has meant and introduced into the definition of Kavya, is spiritual in character and unlike that of all other writers on poetics. This Rasa is best understood as Sringara which, in its different aspects, is the under-current of Gaudiya vaishnava kavya and drama literature. Rudra Bhatta's Sringara Tilaka and Bhojadeva's Sringara Prakasha are no doubt the earlier important works on Sringara. But Kavikarnapura vitally differs from them in the conception of the said Rasa. He divides it into three divisions each of which is essentially different from the others. For our present purpose we may take up its two main divisions Prakrita and Aprakrita Sringara in following lines,—Prakrita laukikah malatimadhavadinisthah Aprakritah Sri Krisna Radhadi nisthah (Alamkara kaustubha v. 6.)

Kavikarnapura refers to Bhavabhuti's Malati Madhava Nataka in identifying Prakrita Sringara with the love of Madhava (Not Krisna Madhava). He identifies the latter kind with the love of Radha for Krisna. It is not possible for Aprakrita Sringara to exist except in relation of Radha to Krisna. He does not seem to approve of its application even to Narayana. He criticises Kalidasa for his describing Sringara Rasa of Siva Parbati with the argument,—

Uttamadevatanam parvatiparamesvaradinam
Sringara varnanam ca na karyam
Yatu kritam Sri Kalidasadibhi staddustam tadvarnanam hi svapitroh sringara varnanamiva" (Alamkara kaustubha x, 42).

Sringara of Parvati and Siva ought not to be described as it is untastable because of their being mere gods who are regarded as parents to the people. Kalidasa has done wrong in so doing. Kavikarnapura reluctantly approves of some poets describing Narayana's Sringara provided Narayana is raised above the category of Devatas who are certainly subjected to the conventional morality of the world in which case their love should not be described to us, their sons and daughters. He justifies the description of Sringara of Radhakrisna in the following lines,—

Radha madhavoyostu varnaniya meva sarvesvara tena devatatvabhavat (Alamkara kaustubha. X.42).

'Sringara of Radha Madhava is only to be described on account of their absolute supremacy over all gods'; in other words they are not subject to the rules that govern the gods and mankind alike and which stand in the way of the description of Sringara. He raises Radha-Madhava above the moral restriction of the world on account of their absoluteness. Kavikarnapura identifies the best Nayaka or Hero of Sringara with Krisna in the line. Sarva Suddhva rasa vrinda kandalah sarva nayaka ghata kiritagah atyalaukika-gunairalamkrito gokulendra tanayah sunayakah (Alamkara kaustubha X.27). "The best and greatest Nayaka (Hero) is the son of the lord of Gokula, who is the seed of all purified Rasas, who is the crest-jewel of all Nayakas, who is endowed with all unworldly qualities".

Furthermore, Kavikarnapura differs from all other Kavya writers and theorists in their definition of Mahakavya that it should be written with any of the following four Vargas or ends in view—Dharma (Piety), Artha (wealth), Kama (fulfilment of desires) or Moksa or salvation. Of these Bhamaha prefers Artha. Many of them are in favour of fame. Dandin says the following to the effect, Catur Varga phalam petum (Kavyadarsa i,14-19.). Kavikarnapura criticises it as selfish and mean. So he gives his noble view on the point in the following lines,—"Fame and other objects that have been pointed out as the aim of the composition of Kavya are not the real fruit. The deep divine bliss, that wells up in the heart on account of application of mind in course of describing the most charming sportive qualities of Krisna, is the summum bonum, others are trivial. The readers of Kavya should also gain that celestial bliss (Alamkara kaustubha ii,14.). As a Kavya writer and theorist, Kavikarnapura deserves a very high place in the literature of poetics because of having presented noble ideas and giving a new shape to old views on Kavya and making a perfect union of Dhvani with Rasa. So far as Rasa is concerned, Kavikarnapura and his immediate predecessor Rupa Gosvami categorically differ from all others who have written on the subject in treating it with its necessary doctrine of Nayaka and Nayikas in an exhaustively scientific and psychologically analytic way and from a different point of view.

Let us say a few words by way of appreciating Kavikarnapura's Caitanya Carit Mahakavya in conformity with the established canons of Mahakavya which are as follows :—(1. It ought to be divided into Sargas and named after its hero and endowed with metres agreeable to the ears, which should change themselves at the end of each Sarga, and it should be based on actual facts. 2. It ought to begin with namaskriya or obeisances and vastu-nirdesa or indication of the contents. It should be replete with the descriptions of towns, mountains, rivers, seas, seasons, and so on. Rasa or Bhava should underlie it. 3. Of the four Sargas the poet should describe at least one as being his aim. Dandin's Kavyadarsa, I. 14-19.).

Kavikarnapura has described the noble deeds of our Lord Sri Caitanya which are historical facts, in his Caitanya Carit Mahakavya which has been named after Him whom he described as Dhirodatta Hero (vide xx.47.), defined by him in his Alamkara Kaustubha (V.27.) as one who avoids self-importance and self-glorification, who is kind, generous, grave, calm in disposition, gentle in manner, sweet in speech, and so forth. Caitanya Carit is divided into twenty Sargas and written in elegant Sanskrit. It evinces a marvellous display of metres which change themselves at the end of each Sarga to suggest its coming end. For example the Mandakranta chhanda in the thirty-eighth and the next sloka of the twentieth Sarga is suddenly succeeded by the Sikharini chhanda in the fortieth sloka which in its turn is followed by the Vasanta tilaka chhanda in the next four slokas. The said Sarga is ended with the Sarddula vikridita metre. Kavikarnapura opens his Mahakavya with obeisances to its Hero Lord Sri Caitanya and Vastu-nirddesa or indications of the contents which are the life and deeds of its Divine Hero. In this connection, the poet could not but express the deep pathos of hundreds of our Lord's weeping followers together with his own at His Ascension which took place about nine years before the composition of the Caitanya Carit Mahakavya when the sad feeling was still fresh.

As regards Alamkara of the book, it would be no exaggeration to say that our poet Kavikarnapura has few rivals and hardly any one excels him in this respect. His every word is pregnant with significance and suggestiveness and adorned with most shining ornaments which delightfully enhance the beauty of his Kavya. Figures of speech and of thought are perfect. His similes, metaphors, allegories and so on, are well-cut, clear, familiar and striking at the same time. His descriptions have a feminine grace and charm that transport his readers to the presence of the self-love in the agony of loving separation from Himself. Neither metaphysical hardness, nor didacticism, nor dry history, nor disagreeable asceticism, nor long continued story, has been given admission to the book to mar the beauty and purpose of Kavya. He maintains all through from first to last a perfect unity between melting pathos of loving sentiment and its self-same expression. The art of the poet manifests itself in the wonderful unity of the two. In his description the things of Nature are of no less significance than Paramananda Puri in ministering to our Lord's deep love-in-separation for Krisna on the way from Puri to Bengal. Our Lord embraces every tree taking them as friends, and comes up to them to be allowed to possess again the Lord of His heart by their favour. The hero of Kavikarnapura's Kavya has entered into fellowship with the soul of Nature which is seen by Him to feel equally their separation from Krishna The flowers and trees are given a heart to mingle with our Lord's love, and a voice to join His song in chorus. The poet has given Nature a chord of faith in the deep harp of the bliss of separation of love which the Hero experiences with added poignancy in the woods by the banks of the Mahanadi and Godavari. Our author's poetical genius lies in the fact that his touch gives to Nature's art its expression of perfect harmony with the emotions of the Hero's soul. Persons mourn the absence of the Beloved in their flowers and in the songs of their birds. His revelations of these holy mysteries expand and exalt us. Our poet is very sensible of the sweep of the celestial stream which to him permeates the whole world. Kavikarnapura has painted Puri, Navadvipa and other towns in glowing colours and has luxuriously described Ratha-yatra, and Dola-Yatra festivals, for deepening the mood of the Hero by their contrasts. Every line is suffused with Bhakti-Rasa. The Gaudiya vaishnava writers as a class, wrote and developed all branches of devotional literature to teach the doctrine of Gaudiya Vaishnavaism and popularise the career of our Lord Sri Chaitanya. It has a peculiar characteristic of its own which has differentiated the literature of our school from the rest of Indian literature. Kavikarnapura sings the glory of our Faith in and through the grace of Kavya and voice of drama. He exults equally in the "family happiness" as well as the asceticism of the Hero who knows no longer except Krishna. Both aspects of the Hero's life gain fresh accession of sweetness at the hand of our poet. Krisnadasa Kaviraja does not delineate our Lord's married life which was already treated in an adequate manner by Thakur Vrindavanadas. Kavikarnapura describes in glowing colours the attractive grace and charm of Sri Laksmipriya's beauty and surrounds Her with the halo of a singularly chastening mellowness in her marriage and life. The story of our Lord's life is described in this Sanskrit Kavya with equal dramatic force and psychological penetration. Both are equally transparent. The book as a whole breathes the pure spiritual air. Unlike all other secular Kavya books which are written for Artha, which Bhamaha prefers, or for, any of the four Vargas which all Alamkarikas emphasise, Kavikarnapura's book is free from such selfish motive, and is intended to destrory the threefold affliction (vide XX. 48.) which torments mankind for cherishing such desires.

Kavikarnapura's purpose being mainly poetical, much that is of historical and geographical importance is omitted from this book. As a historian, indeed, Kavikarnapura, so far as this Caitanya Carita Mahakavya is concerned, is occasionally open to criticism. For instance, it says that Sri Caitanya did not meet Raya Ramananda in the first instance on His outward journey in the south. The poet makes Him meet with Raya on His way back from Setuvandha and again takes Him to the Godavari from Puri. He contradicts Himself in his Caitanya Candrodaya Nataka which agrees with Krisnadasa Kaviraja in this respect. Again he says in his Caitanya Carit that a few days after our Lord's sannyas at Katwa He sent Sri Nityananda Prabhu from the Rada country to give His mother and other devotees the news of His sannyas and take them from Navadvipa to Santipura where He would stay and meet them (XI. 63-64.). But he says differently in his Caitanya Candrodaya Nataka (Anka IV) that Nityananda Prabhu sent Candrasekhara Acarya to Navadvipa for the purpose, and that he himself led our God-intoxicated Lord to Santipura by a pious trick by giving out that he was taking Him to Vrindavana. Sri Caitanya Bhagavata by Sri Vrindavanadasa Thakura agrees with Kavikarnapura's Caitanya Carita in this respect. But Krisnadasa Kaviraja says the same as Kavikarnapura's Caitanya Candrodaya Nataka which is to the contrary. Kavikarnapura in his Mahakavya avoids the actual geographical names as far as possible. For instance, he possibly refers to Kulia by saying that it is a certain place on the Ganges to the west of Navadvipa without mentioning it by name (XX.26.). But so far as the historical outline is concerned, it is quite right. This omission of accurate topographical names and a few historical inaccuracies ought to be overlooked on account of his tender age of about sixteen when it was composed and when he may not have the opportunity of accurately knowing the details. These faults are conspicuous by their absence in his latter work Caitanya Candrodaya Nataka. These are minor blemishes of a book which has many astounding qualities of its own. It is one of the best exquisite specimens of typical Kavya literature for which the name of young Kavikarnapura is worthy of being remembered. The admirable soft quality of its language together with its clear music and the dancing movements of its metres has the limpidity and brightness of a running stream.

Good and Bad

(By Brajeswari Prosad)

Nothing in the world is good in itself, nothing which cannot but become good when used towards the service of Godhead.

On the plane of perfect reality the natural function of the unalloyed soul is to serve Godhead.

The 'real' spiritual plane is also the 'natural' plane of the unalloyed soul. The truly 'natural' is that which cannot but be independently of all conditions, therefore, also it is the truly 'real'. The truly 'real' alone is that which always is what it is ; therefore, it is alone the truly 'natural'.

Those souls, however, who came to beguile themselves into electing to be served on their own seperate account instead of serving Godhead, were put into the shadowy and perverted region of Maya after being encaged in the linga sharira (astral body) and sthula sharira (physical body).

Looked at from the point of view of their eternal natural position their new state, viz., the conditioned state, is a real misery, being a kind of an extinguisher of their real entity.

But even during the period that they choose to entertain the unnatural desire to be served there is also nothing but the Mercy of Godhead in His Gift of the astral and physical bodies to them through the agency of His Deluding Energy.

The desire to be served being unnatural to the unalloyed soul it cannot have fulfilment on the plane of his natural position.

Those souls, therefore, who were smitten with that wrong desire had to be shifted to another plane congenial to their new aptitude and yet not really congenial because against their natural function. That is the plane of the mundane world.

The desire to be served being unnatural it can have an apparent fulfilment only in a shadowy way on the plane of the linga and sthula shariras.

The 'unnatural' for the soul is the 'shadowy', and vice versa. That which cannot be true by nature cannot but be false. The 'unnatural' is the shadow of the natural, and, therefore, it is. Therefore, the fulfilment of the desire to be served as experienced in this world is delusive.

In the sense that the astral and the physical bodies are the mediums through which the soul is enabled to experience the delusive fulfilment of his desire to be served, the astral and the physical bodies vouchsafed to him are in the nature of his equipments.

The conditioned stage of the soul being not at all a wholesome stage it was but an act of Causeless Mercy to help him in realizing the fact of its unwholesomeness and in getting back to his original position, which is being done by Godhead's Deluding Energy lashing the forms representing his wrong choice round and round in the miserable wheel of Karma after imprisoning him in the said astral and physical bodies.

Correspondingly to his unnatural desire to be served the soul is placed in such surroundings as where he cannot, as in any position whatsoever, be really served, but is yet apparently served. The Deluding Energy of Godhead created this mundane world for fulfilling Godhead's own purpose. But the conditioned soul looks upon his surroundings as intended to contribute to the satisfaction of his wrong enjoying mood. The conditioned state of the soul is being perpetuated by his being constantly engaged in the act of pressing every 'fact' for indulging his wrong activity. For such purpose every 'fact' of the mundane world is bad. But if those very 'facts' are pressed by the conditioned soul in the line of the real purpose of Godhead towards himself they become the only available means of his deliverance.

(By Prof. Nishi Kanta Sanyal M.A.)

Biographies play not a mean part in the formation and modelling of character of a man or a nation. They have their utilities in their own spheres. We all know that the lives of great men carry with them an electric influence which we often times cannot escape. Both in the mundane as well as in the spiritual realms life-sketches of great personalities generate in the minds of men an impetus to emulate them or try to follow in their foot-steps.

Biographies of men, who, by dint of their own sheer personal exertions or through the chance concatenations of favourable circumstances brought into force by the god of fortune, have attained to the highest enviable positions in the meterial as well as intellectual worlds, are not wanting in these days. It will not be our business to add one more chapter to such biographies with which the country is over-flooded. But the value of history cannot be ignored in proving that in spite of all the manifold greatnesses achieved by men both in the physical and in the intellectual regions, people lag behind the goal of human existence viz., peace and happiness and bliss in the only true sense of the term—the summum bonum of life.

The glare of sensuous enjoyments, both physical and mental, oftentimes, lead, rather tempt, men to become imitators of the successful heroes of the world. It is our business to keep ourselves away from such deluding enjoyments and confine our attention to the history of those devoted souls who have led a saintly-life for the service of Godhead which includes the lasting welfare of humanity and is promotive of eternal peace and never-ending, unmixed bliss. Enjoyments of this world, like will-o'-the-wisps, leading men astray from one pit to another, ultimately delude them to their damnation. God-loving saints or sadhus, who come down to and move in this world not for any selfish worldly purpose of their own but solely for the welfare of humanity, are no other than the agents of the Lord, deputed by Him for the regeneration and uplift of all fallen souls (jivas).

To return to our narrative. There appeared in ancient times in the Presidency of Madras, many a holy saint who, sanctifying the land where they lived, preached and taught the processes for the attainment of the service of the Supreme Lord. Many of those names are not quite well-known to the people of Bengal. It is true that the Gaudiya-Vaishnava literatures teem with the cult of devotion; but the Tamil and Telugu literatures of Madras do not also fall short of the teachings of the doctrine of devotion. In this short sketch a few anecdotes relating to the great devotee Pothan, the compiler of the "Andhra Bhagabat" are being placed before our readers. He appeared in the village of Aksita Nagaram in the district of Kuddapa in Madras. The exact time of his appearance cannot be definitely ascertained at this distant date; but scholars are of opinion that he made his appearance in 1800 Saka Era. His father's name was Keshon who was an ordinary cultivator. The father had not the means to engage servants and so he managed to till his lands, as far as he could do it, by his own labour. He could maintain his family with difficulty on his small income from the scanty product of his lands. Pothan, born in this poor family of a cultivator, had to assist his father in his humble work from his childhood.

No other traces of his early career have been handed down to us save and except the fact that in his early life he had no opportunities for receiving any literary education. On one occasion when he was grazing his father's cattle in a hilly part of the country, he came across a great saint (sadhu) who was absorbed in meditation in a cave of the hill. At the sight of that sadhu the door of his heart opened and it became filled with feelings of Divine ecstasy. The sight inspired him with some feelings which he had never experienced before and prompted him to fall prostrate at the feet of the sadhu with folded hands and to pray for his mercy in the form of initiation. The meditating sadhu finding Pothan in this attitude, could gauge his mind to see that there lay hidden in the secret corner of his heart the perennial fountain of devotion. Satisfied with the intensity of his heart's cravings and considering him to be a fit disciple, the sadhu initiated him into spiritual life.

Thus began the spiritual career of Pothan. Henceforth he began to feel utter disgust for worldly affairs and a longing to pass his days in seclusion, fully absorbed in the service of Godhead. The culture of devotion washed away, like a clear stream, all the evil propensities of his heart (anarthas). One day after bathing in the river Tungabhadra as he was chanting within himself the mantras received from his Guru, he found standing before him the Sree Murti of the Object of his devotion, who also appeared to be highly pleased with him. The sight of the most exquisitely beautiful Form of the Lord of his heart filled it with infinite delight and made it dance in ecstasy. All the honest endeavours of his life were now completely fulfilled, his life was crowned with its supreme success and his whole ancestry was sanctified. It is said that the Lord inspired him to compile Sreemat Bhagabata in the Andhra language and to dedicate the same to Him. Inspired by the Lord Himself Pothan complied with the dictates of the Lord and came to have the reputation of a compiler of the Shastras in the land where he is known to this day as the Andhra-Vyasa or Sahaja Pandit.

At the time of which we are speaking, the Province of Madras was divided into several small kingdoms, each with a king of its own. In those days it was a custom with the authors or compilers of books to dedicate them to one or other of their kings and to seek favours from him in lieu thereof. Any departure from the prevailing custom entailed punishment by the king. But Pothan, as advised and directed by God, instead of dedicating his book to his king, did so to the Supreme Lord as a mark of his heart's devotion to Him. Nobody in those days would have dared to dedicate his book to any but the king, save and except for the reason that the Lord Himself had agreed to accept the offering. It is accordingly written in the first sloka of the Andhra Bhagabata 'that Bamera Potha Raju (such is his full name) having had no desire for worldly riches from any king in the act of the dedication of his book dedicates the same to the Lotus Feet of the Lord for the eternal welfare of humanity.' The news of his determination not to dedicate his book to his king circulated in the land and filled the authors of the day with great astonishment, and enraged and mortified his king. Taking this conduct of Pothan to be a haughty and deliberate offer of insult and flouting of authority of himself, the king determined to inflict the condign punishment on him.

Mysterious are the ways of heaven which are beyond the limited comprehension of the conditioned jiva. There is no power in all the worlds which can crush a devotee of Godhead. As declared in the Bhagabata Geeta, the Lord Krishna has promised that His devotees will never be crushed. Instances of the kind may be multiplied, but we confine our attention to the particular case before us. When Pothan was writing about the Avatara of Varahadeva in the third skandha of the Andhra Bhagabata, fully absorbed in thought about the Transcendental Pastimes of Sree Varahadeva, his king, in order to punish him, surrounded his house with a body of armed soldiers. Pothan was so lost to himself with the contemplation of the absorbing Leela of Sree Varahadeva that the tumults from outside failed to reach his ears. The king was about to realise his hope of punishing Pothan when lo ! a great wonder happened ! All on a sudden a ferocious boar with terrible tusks appeared on the scene and nobody knew from where he came. By his thunderous roar he created so much terror in the minds of all persons that the soldiers dispersed through sheer fright. The Hand of the Almighty God is always found to come to the help of His devoted servants. Pothan was miraculously saved by the Grace of the Lord. It may be said that the Lord enacted His Varaha Leela for the second time in this world solely to save one of His most devoted servants, Pothan.

This incident had its effect in marking out Pothan to the high and the low as a self-realised soul and as one of the favourites of the Lord. Since then people's regard for him increased apace.

But there are often exceptions to the general rule. There was one such in the person of Sreenath, the poet-laureate of the king's court, whose heart burned with malice at the sight of the rising fame and reputation of Pothan, and he began to find loop-holes in his character to lower him in the estimation of the public.

The Raja Bahadur of the place hearing the arrival of the Sadhus paid his respect to them. On being requested Tridandiswami Bhakti Gaurab Baikhanas Maharaj went to the palace and had religious discourses for nearly three hours before the Raja Bahadur and Rani saheba. They listened with interest and attention. A lecture was arranged by the officers of the State and local people next day. Swami Parvat spoke on the Messages of the Supreme Lord. After the close of the meeting Raja Bahadur took Baikhanas Maharaj to his palace and made several querries which were clearly explained to his satisfaction. Raja Sahib was so much pleased that he showed his inclination to meet the Editor.

Assam :

Mahopadeshaka Acharya Pandit Sripad Nimananda Sevatirtha, B. Ag. B. T., is in charge of the propaganda works of the Mission in Assam. He convenes meetings, delivers lectures, writes thesis, edits paper in Assamese for the spread of Mahaprabhu's Teachings there. He spares no pains to diffuse the Messages of the Editor.

Germany :

Swami B. H. Bon of the London Gaudiya Math is out on a tour all over Germany in delivering lectures at the different Universities on their invitation and previous engagement. The Swamiji is making great impressions all over and soliciting sincere inquiries about the Philosophy and Teachings of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu from leaders of thought and education.

In his lecture on 'Sree Chaitanya's views on life" at the University of Bonu, 400 students, the professors and the Rector attended. At the Marburg University Prof. Dr. Rudolf Otto seems to be very much interested in the religion of Sree Chaitanya. There was satisfactory response to the lecture of the Swamiji at Jena University. The Superior leader of the Nazi Military His Magnificence Prof. Dr. Arnim Uberfuhrer of Berlin has again invited the Swamiji for two more lectures at the Lessing Rochs-chule where very distinguished philosophers are only invited to speak. The Berlin University has also invited the Swamiji again for at least two other lectures on the Message of the Gaudiya Math to the West and the Religion of Sree Chaitanya in which the students and professors evinced great interest. Regierungsrat Dr. Martin, Weigert Ph. D., L.L.D., seems to be coming very much forward in following the teachings of Sri Chaitanya. He was once a very big man in Germany holding a very high position.

ALL-GLORY TO SREE GURU AND GAURANGA

—:o:—

The Harmonist

(Sree Sajjanatosbani)

VOL. XXXI. | JANUARY 31, 1935 | No. 11

The Ten Basic Principles July '91.

(Thakur Bhakti Vinode)

1. The Vedas are self-revealed truths. They declare that

2. Hari is the Absolute Person of the Godhead and is One without a second ;

3. He is endowed with all the Potencies in the fullest degree ;

4. He is the Ocean of all Rasas (the principle that is palatable to the pure soul);

5. The jivas are His discrete parts ;

6. Some of them are enthralled by His Deluding Potency or Maya ;

7. Some are free beings or liberated souls eternally rendering loving service to Him under the guidance of His Internal Exhilarating Energy ;

8. Both the jivas and the phenomenal world are His manifestations simultaneously distinct and non-distinct from Him ;

(9) Pure devotion is the means of attaining the Highest End of Spiritual existence.

10. Krishna-Prema or Divine Love for Krishna is the summum bonum of human existence.

The Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya has taught these ten basic principles to all the people of the world.

1a. The Vedas are self-revealed truths. They come down to us through the lips of the genuine devotees of the Supreme Lord such as Brahma, in the chain of preceptorial succession. They are recognised as the true criteria of real knowledge. They assert the nine principal doctrines as proved conclusions with the help of auxiliary sources of knowledge viz., perception, inference, analogy, etc., reasoning or logical argument being powerless, due to its limitations, for establishing transcendental truths.

2a. Hari is the One Universal Truth Absolute worshipped by Brahma, Shiva, Indra and all other Gods. The attributeless Brahma is the effulgent aspect of His Spiritual Form. The Immanent Paramatma, the Primal Cause, is the partial aspect of Sree Hari Who is the most Beloved Consort of Sree Radha and Whose complexion is like that of a fresh nimbus cloud.

3a. May the Supreme Lord be glorified, Who is identical with His Internal Self-conscious Energy and yet independent of His powers. The marginal Jiva Potency and the external mayik potency, though co-existent, are not identical with Him. He lords it over all His Powers. He is the Sole Proprietor and Enjoyer of all His Potencies, spiritual and mundane. Despite the manifestations of His Potencies in the spiritual and mundane planes, He remains unchanged and untransformable.

4a. May Sree Krishna, the Chief Sportive Hero of all amorous games in Braja, be triumphant, Who is ever immersed in the Ocean of Rasa (liquid mellowness to the spiritual palate), Who exhilarates Himself and His devotees through His Hladini Shakti or Exhilarating Energy. He disports Himself as the Chief Centre of all divine expressions of love through His Pure Self-Conscious Sambit Energy. Through the Energy of Existence known as Sandhini He manifests His Own Form, His Spiritual Abode and all Spiritual Entities for His eternal pastimes.

5a. Jiva-souls are the atomic parts of the All-Pervading Over-Soul, like the sparks of a blazing fire. Like the rays of the sun, they are inseparably connected but are not identical with the Over-Soul, Who is the Lord of Maya, His Deluding Potency. The jiva soul, even in his unfettered state, is liable to be enthralled and infatuated by the triple qualities of His Deluding Potency.

6a. Those who have forgotten their real nature hankering after their selfish enjoyments and have turned their backs against the Supreme Lord Krishna, are punished by the three-fold noose of His deluding Energy, enclosed by the double envelopes of gross and subtle bodies, and are hurled down to the enigmatic labyrinth of Karma, the cycle of births and re-births, enjoying for a while by turns heavenly pleasures or suffering terrible miseries.

7a. If, in course of this erratic sojourn, the conditioned soul comes in contact with a true devotee or a Vaishnava saturated with the intense love of Krishna, and finds relish to follow Him in the track of devotion, he is released from his Mayik imprisonment by the constant hearing and chanting of the eternal Qualities and Glories of the Holy Name of Krishna, with the result that his heart becomes pure and transparent and in that transparent heart he sees reflected the real nature of the Supreme Lord with all His Paraphernalia and that of his own pure self, a fact which enables him to realise the blissful state of Divine Love in the company of the Absolute-realised souls or Sadhus.

8a. Hari is the Supreme Lord of all His Potencies. The Jaiva (sentient), the Cosmic (insentient) and the Extra-Cosmic (Spiritual) worlds are the transformations of His Potencies, spiritual and material. The theory of Illusion, as propounded by the Pantheists, is untenable and false as it is opposed to the Sruti, the Revealed Word. It is the dirty filth of Kali, the age of controversy for self-assertion. The Doctrine of simultaneous existence of distinction and non-distinction is the unalloyed view approved by the Srutis. In matters purely spiritual Divine Love ensures spiritual perfection and is always triumphant.

9a. When a devotee renders, as a neophyte, nine-fold spiritual services of hearing, chanting, meditation, tending His Holy Feet, worship, greetings, doing all that pleases Him, friendship, and self-surrendering in obedience to the regulated practices of devotion, he attains nascent or dawning of Love to the Lotus Feet of Sree Krishna.

10a. When a devotee attains maturity in his spiritual practices, he realises his eternal nature which enkindles him to render confidential service to Sree Sree Radha-Krishna in Braja under the guidance of his Divine Master Who is also an Exhilarating Potency eternally engaged in Their loving service. The acme of his life in this world is reached when he is blessed with the eternal loving service in the Love-games of the Divine Youthful Couple bringing upon him the nonpareil wealth of felicity endowed in the highest ecstatic principle.

11. A devotee who possesses a natural aptitude for the eternal service of Sree Hari must be well acquainted with the intricacies of the Scriptures. He must discriminate the following inner truths viz., Who is Krishna ? Who am I, a Jiva ? What is the nature of that spiritual kingdom ? What is this phenomenal world ? What is the relationship that exists between Krishna and all these entities ? He must shun, by all means, the error of at-one-ness with Brahman, all acts of piety and impiety and all sorts of offences. If he does so, he is entitled, as an humble servant of the Supreme Lord Sree Hari, to drink of the ambrosial Bliss accruing from chanting of the Holy Name in the society of His genuine devotees.

12. By taking recourse to the elixir of these ten Basic Principles, the jiva can shake off his malady of nescience or Avidya and can regain his eternal function of loving service in the Blissful Realm of Braja under the benign guidance of his Divine Master Sree Guru Deva.

Service

(By Krishna Mohan Bhaktibandhab)

In these hard days when the problem of unemployment has been taxing the brains of the intelligentsia of the twentieth century, a discourse with the above caption, it is hoped, will not be out of place. The careful perusal of this short paper may give a ray of hope to the despairing minds of the unemployed.

All service-seekers owe it to themselves in the first place to analyse the object of their search in a thorough-going fashion. Service means obeying somebody else. Not a single person is to be found in this or in the next world who is not actually rendering service in some form or other. From the Avataras (God appearing in visible forms), from the gods of heaven, down to the lowest and meanest insects on earth, no one can go on without doing service in his own way. Thus from the highest to the lowest all have got to do service. There is only one exception to this rule. It is He Who, according to His Own Sweet Will directly or indirectly receives the service of all of us.

He Who fills this position of the Absolute Master is no other than Godhead Himself.

The Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya Deva explained to Sree Sanatan Goswami how the service of the Absolute is the eternal, inalienable function of our souls. Whether a person be a king, a subject, a merchant, a servant, a master a father, a son, a husband, a wife or a beggar, he or she must be doing the service of this only Master. The unemployed are no exceptions to this rule. We who are thus provided with different forms of service that are found in this world have nevertheless forgot the nature of this eternal service of our Master. In its stead we have engaged in the hopeless slavery of the many who can never be our masters. The transcendental words of the spiritual Scriptures, which alone can restore to us our lost memory of the service of the Absolute, make no impression on us. We are running in all directions for securing the service of those transitory things which are not our Master, and by running about in this blind fashion we have fallen into the whirlpools of the greatest miseries in the shape of being out of the employ of the Truth and under the thraldom of untruth. We, who are the eternal servants of Godhead, have refused to accept His service. In place of the Supreme Lord we have substituted every other thing to be our Masters, with the result that our relation of service cannot fortunately be made to subsist. And as the consequence whereof the overwhelming miseries of a profitless drudgery, in which we are engaged night and day under the baleful influence of Maya (the Deluding Energy of Godhead), are afflicting us unceasingly for our good.

Intelligent human beings as we are, and gifted with the faculty of distinguishing between right and wrong, is it not fitting on our part to consider whether we should not prefer to accept only Him as our Master who is immortal and whose service makes us immune from death, sorrow and fear, and with whom our relation will never find an end? Or is it at all worth while for us to establish the relationship of unwholesome servitude of our ephemeral sons, fathers, mothers, wives, friends etc., to render service to those who are incapable of receiving any service though they may choose to pose as our lord? In any forward march of our responsible human life, we must pause to consider the nature of the goal.

Service is of two kinds. One is compulsory service under Maya (the Deluding Energy of Godhead) and the other is willing service under Krishna or Godhead Himself. We are at present under the domination of the threefold attributes (gunas) of Satva, Rajas and Tama, which makes it impossible for us to go on without doing some kind of work. It is one of the well-known teachings of the Bhagabat-Geeta. We have, however, the option to choose between this slavery to Maya and the spiritual service of Godhead. If we be inclined to tender our slavish subservience to Maya, we lose our service of the Supreme Lord, there being no other alternative than these two. If we do not anxiously wake up to the service of Krishna we shall be forced to fall back under the serfdom of Maya or, for the matter of fact, the abject subservience of this transitory world.

In our perverted egoism, we have this bad idea inherent in us that we desire to lord it over this world, to enjoy this world. But as a matter of fact we always find it, to our utter, disappointment that the table is turned and that instead of becoming lords, we turn out to be the slaves, of Maya, Examples of this may be easily multiplied; but we think one will suffice for the present. In our daily life we try to lord it over our wife, son, etc. We wish to enjoy their relationships. But if we consider the matter seriously, we are bound to come to the definite conclusion that in trying to enjoy our wife and children we have to turn ourselves into their slaves for meeting their many passing needs and carrying out their vain wishes.

The thing is that we cannot be lords. To serve is the inherent eternal function of our souls in whatever sphere we may happen to function. Therefore, we find in our matter of fact life that in trying to lord it over something we have got to submit to the very thing at every turn.

According to the Brahma Samhita, Maya is not an independent entity. She is the servitor of the Power of Krishna, as shadow serves the light of the sun. When we shall learn that to be a slave of Maya is not to serve Krishna, we shall be disposed to give up our slavish function and turn to the willing service of Krishna. There is a wide gulf of distinction between subservience to Maya and the service of Krishna. By our thraldom under Maya, we have met with no peace whatsoever in our countless lives. But still the trouble is that we cannot go on without it. We have our relatives, friends and well-wishers in this world. None of them advise us to turn away from Maya in order to serve Krishna, the Fountainhead of all peace, all bliss and all existence. The service of Krishna and Krishna alone is the source of all real bliss which is not to be found otherwise. We live in a world full of wants, and, before any one of these wants is fulfilled, other wants take their place to fill up the cup of our misery. No ingenuity on our part can at all remove any of these wants which rather increase in proportion to our efforts for their removal by our subservience to the laws of Maya.

Subservience to Maya may be attended with temporary sensuous pleasures at times. But service to Krishna is sure to produce that ever-increasing eternal spiritual bliss which seldom falls to the lot of an ordinary being. Man knows not what nectarine bliss there is in the service of Krishna. It is a sealed book to all conditioned jivas. Krishna out of His Full Grace and Sympathy for animate beings made His Advent into this world in the role of the Perfect Servitor of Himself under the Name of Sree Krishna Chaitanya Deva and showed by His Own Career of service how to serve Krishna and attain to that bliss.

The number of men who are favoured with this sort of service of Krishna is very, very limited. The Scriptures say that among millions of liberated souls there is scarcely to be found even a single true servitor (devotee) of Krishna. Few, indeed, anxiously hanker after the service to Krishna. In this age, in which we live, false things have more currency than genuine ones. Although we have every reason to serve Krishna, our misfortune is that we feel averse to it. Krishna manifests Himself in the Personality of the spiritual Preceptor. The real spiritual Preceptor is not wanting in this world in any age. Although he has no worldly business of his own, he nevertheless comes here for the welfare of conditioned jivas.

Of their own accord the pure servants of God go about from door to door, and publish advertisements for recruits for the service of Krishna, in the spiritual organs of the press. Pseudo-preceptors in the service of Maya, falling short of even moral life, are not also wanting in any age, who put forth, in unfair competition, advertisements of a similar nature to deceive the honest and liberal-minded people. But the wise must beware of them !

A real scrutiny of these advertisements should show the two classes in their true colour and real perspective, and enable all wise persons to find their true friends. It is, however, only a fortunate few who are seekers of the service to Krishna ; and those are the most unfortunate who choose the bondage of Maya. Krishna, in His Majestic Aspect as Narayana, is the Lord of all wealth. Therefore, to serve Him is to be without any wants. It is a pity that we cannot realise this plain truth and thus avoid the temptation of the subserviency of Maya. A moment's deviation from the service of Krishna hurls us down from the beatific position and makes us be enamoured of the thraldom of Maya ; because there is no tie of continuity or compatibility between the two.

Anything short of cent per cent service of Krishna creates the loop-hole which admits the enemy and makes us fall into the trap of Maya. So we must learn to carefully distinguish between these two kinds of service, and always accept the service of Krishna which alone leads to the region that is free from all sorrow, stupefaction and fear.

We live in a world which is full of abject cares and wants, sorrows and miseries. Scientific inventions through the ages have proved futile to remove the root cause of our miseries. If one item of want or misery is practically removed, the remedy itself brings its other fresh troubles, the cause of the old ailment cropping up again almost the same. In this way we are doomed to revolve in the painful cycle of births and deaths. Some of my countrymen may envy the lots of the independent trader and of those who breathe the free air of a free land, and may suppose that they are not the servants of Maya. But due consideration of the subject should make it clear to all of us that whatever be the calling, profession or position of a man in this world, if he does not render service to Krishna, he is like the bullock yoked blindfold to the oil-grinding mill. Maya makes us serve our senses which allow us no respite even when we feel utterly jaded and miserable. But the service of Krishna is the destroyer of the root-cause of all misery. According to Thakur Bhaktivinode, a very great saint, who flourished in the last century, all troubles in the service of Krishna are but the embodiment of eternal pleasures, and both the pleasures and pains of such service are a priceless treasure that destroys all our miseries of nescience.

Jivas have no other alternative but to serve either Krishna or Maya. If they desire eternal bliss they must seek the service of Krishna by serving His Spiritual Power or His most favourite devotees. The real Acharya is the most favourite associated counterwhole of the Supreme Lord Krishna. He comes to this world to give us service of Krishna by incorporating us in his service of Krishna.

Let it be known to all that ony one having a hankering for the service of Krishna is to apply to His Divine Agent, the bona fide Acharya. All service-seekers should avail themelves of this golden opportunity to remove their manifold wants by joining heart and soul in the service of the Acharya. Firm faith (sraddha) in the plain meaning of the words of the Shastras can alone help us in carrying out the directions of the Agent of Krishna. This is the only thing required for obtaining the Mercy of Krishna. Those alone miss His mercy who are not wilfully desirous of being the recipients of eternal bliss and who are consequently lacking in firm faith in the reality and tangible nature of the process of our redemption through causeless Divine Mercy.

A few words of appreciation of Kavikarnapura

(By Sambidananda Das M. A.)

The next dated book of Kavikarnapura is the famous Caitanya Candrodaya Nataka, a biographical drama dealing in great details with the life and philosophy of our Lord Sri Caitanya. It is a vivid description particularly written for consoling the aggrieved followers and also for popularising the life and teaching of our Lord through dramatic representation. It is of supreme historical importance in tracing the development and success of the movement of our Lord. It also represents the religious condition of the then India which was in striking contrast with the religious fervour and purity of character of our Gaudiya Vaishnava Acharyas. This book is very well knit and full of interest, obvious truth and readable qualities. This historical drama, by the excellence of the writing and the judiciousness of the selections of deeds, is the true representation of the celestial character of our Lord and does not fail to convey to the lay reader the greatness and spiritual import of its Hero. Its ornate language does not seem to hide its simplicity or tire the reader. It is more historical and doctrinal than merely dramatic. It consists of ten acts. The last verse gives us Saka 1494 (1572 A. D.) as the date of the play. It has been rendered into Bengali metrical verses by Purusottama Siddhantavagisa alias Premadasa in Saka 1634 (1712 A. C.), which date is given in the colophon at the end of the translation.

His other historical book is Gauraganoddesa Dipika written in Saka 1498 (1576 A. C.), which date is given in the last sloka. It consists of 215 Sanskrit slokas and give us an account of the historical origin of our community and the principal followers of our Lord Sri Caitanya, most of whom have been identified with the associates of Krisna. Apart from the question of our practice and belief, it has great historical importance. The author says that it ought to be hidden from the atheists, sceptics, cunning sophists and materialists (vide verse V). The account of this book is very authentic because he had personally seen and heard of all the devotees living at Mathura, Bengal and Puri before he wrote it (verse V.).

Our poet-author has written a large treatise on Sanskrit poetics under the name of Alamkara Kaustubha, the principles of which have been illustrated by verses in reference to lives and deeds of Radha and Madhava. It is based on the Gaudiya Vaishnava principle of Bhakti Rasa in opposition to secular literature on poetics. It consists of ten Kiranas headed as follows :-(1) Kavya samanyoddesah, (2) Savdarthavritti traya nirupanah, (3) Dhvani nirnayah, (4) Gunibhuta vyangya nirnayah, (5) Rasa bhava tadbheda nirupanah, (6) Guna vivecanah, (7) Savdalamkara nirnayah, (8) Arthalamkara nirnayah, (9) Riti nirnayah, (10) Dasa nirnayah.

Another important large book written by Kavikarnapura is Ananda Vrindavana Campu dealing with the early life and amorous youth of the Supreme Lord Sri Krisna as we find in the tenth canto of the Bhagavata. It is written, as Campu Kavya should be, partly in poetry and partly in poetic prose. Its style and imagery deserve high admiration and it is an excellent addition to the Sanskrit literature of our community. It is divided into 22 stavakas.

The late Raja Rajendralal Mitra has taken notices of the three manuscripts of Camatkara Chandrika which mention Kavikarnapura as the author in the following colophon found at the end of the said manuscripts :— Iti Sri Kavikarnapura Goswami viracita Camatkara Candrikayam caturtha kutuhalam etc. (Notices of Sanskrit manuscripts. Vol. VI. PP. 212-213). But the India Office manuscript which I have examined (Eggling, No. 1177e.) contains no such colophon. Our Editor attributes its authorship to Visvanatha Cakravarti (Saka 1560-1630) (Vaishnava Manjusa Samahriti Part I. p. 61). The editor of the Gaudiya also puts it in the list of Visvanatha's works (Vol I. Part 18, p.8).

Vrittamala, a short treatise of 93 verses on Chhanda, has been recently published by Sasi Bhusan Deva Gosvami of Naptipara, Assam, together with a commentary Valasuvodhini by Kavi Pancanana. The last but one verse 'Kavina Kavikarnapurena guru Sanmata karmana Malladeve mahipale vritt maleya varaci' etc., says that it was composed by poet Kavikarnapura Gosvami with the approval of his guru and dedicated to king Malladeva. The editor likes to identify Malladeva of the Vrittamala text with the Koch king Nara Narayana and calls the poet Karnapura an inhabitant of Assam, attached to the court of Koch Vihar. But he could not advance any ground or reason for the validity of his fanciful supposition. I have discussed these points in my forthcoming book on our Gaudiya vaisnava history and literature. What seems probable is that the Vaisnava Vrittamala text was a work of the Bengali vaisnava Kavikarnapura, and its patron Malladeva was the vaisnava Malla King Vir Hamvira of Visnupura.

His Excellency at Sree Mayapur

His Excellency Sir John Anderson, Governor of Bengal, was pleased to pay a visit of love to Sree Mayapur, the holy birth-place of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya on January 15.

His Excellency was accompanied by A.D.C., Mr. Russell, Military Secretary; Mr. N. V. H. Simons, M.C.I.C.S., Private Secretary ; Mr. H. J. Twynam C.I.E., I.C.S., Commissioner Presidency Division; Mr. S. Banerjee I.C.S., District Magistrate, Nadia ; Mr. S. Gupta, Police Superintendent, Nadia ; Mr. C. Gupta, Sub-Divisional Officer ; Mr. P. Pathak, Circle officer and Hon'ble Minister Khan Bahadur Moulvi Azizul Haque. The gubernatorial party left Krishnagar at 9-30 a. m., and motored seven miles to the landing on the Bhagirathy at Nabadwip Ghat. The morning had been ushered by light showers followed by splendid weather. The motor launch 'Suradhuni' of the the Gaudiya Mission was in waiting at the gaily decorated landing-pier. The party crossed the river to the opposite bank of the town of Nabadwip. A beautiful pandal had been constructed by the Municipality on the water's edge for the reception of the Governor. Sir John Andersen replied suitably to the addresses of the Municipality and the Pandits which were presented to him at this place.

The Governor and his party were immediately conveyed back to Sree Mayapur. At the landing of Hular Ghat at the junction of the Jalangi and the Bhagirathy a beautifully decorated jetty had been set up for giving a right royal reception to the ruler of the Province, to the Home of Mahaprabhu Sree Chaitanya. Sir John Anderson was received on landing by Pandits A.C. Banerjee and Kunjabehari Vidyabhusan, Secretaries of Sree Viswa Vaishnav Raj Sabha. The Mission had spared no expense or care for making the two miles of the road from Hular Ghat to Sree Mayapur a thing of beauty. Gay buntings carried along both sides of the way over long poles set off the natural holiday charms of one of the happiest and most peaceful of landscapes. The country road had been made wonderfully smooth by art and the timely showers.

The town temples of Sree Mayapur attract the loving gaze of the pilgrim long before he alights at Nabadwip Ghat. The magnificent temple on the Site of Birth of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya, which is under construction, already towers over all the rest and is the cynosure of all eyes. As the cars of the Governor approached Sree Mayapur in full view of the Temple to which the straight road from the landing leads as to its natural terminus the distinguished visitors must have experienced a certain degree of veneration and chastened unworldly expectations.

The turn of the road just in front of the Temple of the Birth-Site disclosed a wide street of the growing rural settlement lined by its school houses and many places of worship mingling with the newly-built houses of its hospitable dwellers whose culture and simple refined taste were writ large on the face of every charming household. The influence of the place is always felt to be of real relief from the abject cares of the world. It is so real that it found an involuntary expression even in the speech of the Head of the administration.

His Excellency was received at the entrance of the pandal which had been erected in the grounds of Sree Chaitanya Math, by the venerable spiritual Head of the Mission His Divine Grace Paramhansa Paribrajakacharya Sree Srimad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj and was conducted by Him to the dais where His Excellency was garlanded by Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj, a sanyasi disciple of Srila Goswami Maharaj. The other guests of the party were also garlanded. His Divine Grace then offered His Excellency His blessings by slightly touching his forehead with sandal paste and putting some fresh flowers and durba. He also presented His Excellency with a stringed garland of beautiful workmanship. His Divine Grace then read out some Sanskrit verses welcoming His Excellency to Sridham Mayapur.

He also presented His Excellency with a stringed garland of beautiful workmanship. His Divine Grace then read out some Sanskrit verses welcoming His Excellency to Sridham Mayapur.

Pandit Haripada Vidyaratna followed with a Bengali song of greeting.

Pandit Atul Chandra Banerji, Secretary of Sree Viswa Vaishnava Raj Sabha, on behalf of the members of the Mission, welcomed His Excellency in an eloquent complimentary address. His speech which was finely worded and contained a brief survey of the work of the Mission, is on another page.

His Excellency was pleased to make the following gracious response to the address of welcome.

Guru Maharaj, Pandits and Gentlemen!

I can assure you that it gives me the greatest pleasure to visit this holy place and to see for myself the place from where you carry on your activities and beneficient works. I knew something of the Gaudiya Math from Swami B. H. Bon who met me more than once in Calcutta. I saw him recently when I was in England. I heard with great interest from him about his activities there and he handed me a copy of the report of the great work he is doing there. You have told me that the Mission exists for the propagation of the universal Gospel of Divine Love; for which there is room in every corner of the earth and they can expect intellectual and spiritual sympathy in all countries

Speech of Pandit A. C. Banerjee

On behalf of the members of the Gaudiya Mission I hail this opportunity to accord our cordial welcome to all our distinguished guests and particularly to Your Excellency in this sacred place, Sree Mayapur, the Sanctum Sanctorum of old Nabadwip Dham, and I beg most respectfully to express our sincere gratitude for sparing this requisite time from Your Excellency's multifarious and pressing duties elsewhere. I crave Your Excellency's indulgence to detain Your Excellency and the distinguished audience for a few moments which I intend devoting to a few general observations and paying our homage to the Crown.

We greatly appreciate Your Excellency's kindness for this favour of your coming over to this place with so much trouble to encourage us by your presence in our midst and I feel strongly urged to express our heart-felt thanks for this generosity which will ever remain a lasting proof of your innate goodness for which Your Excellency has been rightly reputed among the public.

Your Excellency's visit to this sacred land has been hailed with great delight as an event of great importance and I doubt not that this function of to-day will be of immense benefit towards the advancement of the cause of loyalty in this part of the country, as it has brought an odour of sanctity and loyal inspiration even to the poor man's door, and we, the rich and poor alike, have got this chance, the uncommon opportunity, to pay our homage to the Crown from this holy land, Sree Mayapur, which, though a little tiny colony now, was the Oxford of India some four hundred and fifty years ago and is still the chief centre of pilgrimage in Bengal.

Your Excellency, it is here that the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya was born just after sunset, when the moon was eclipsed, on the 18th February, 1486, of the Christian Era, and from here He propagated the universal religion of Divine Love throughout the length and breadth of this country.

It was here that a renowned Mahomedan Governor named Maulana Serajuddin ruled during the time of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu and his cemetery still stands as a lasting proof of this place being the very site where Sree Chaitanya was born.

It was here that the Hindu Sen kings ruled for some time and the remnants of their palaces still bear testimony to this fact and they are now being preserved by Government for archæological explorations.

It was here that Thakur Bhakti-Vinode, a very great Saint, who was formerly a renowned member of the Bengal Provincial Civil Service and Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland, convened a big meeting of several thousands of gentlemen from different parts of Bengal, and authenticated this place to be the very Birth-Site of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu after scrutinising the old records and maps of Bengal Government and the authentic writings of the great vaishnava chroniclers who were contemporaries of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu, and this fact has been strongly supported and corroborated by Sir William Hunter's Gazetteer, the Statistical Accounts of Bengal.

Your Excellency, the genuine Vaishnavas of our Gaudiya Sampradaya throughout India and abroad are loyal by nature. Loyalty to the Crown and to the social order is ordained in our scriptures and forms a part of our mental and spiritual outfit we receive in youth. I, therefore, avail this opportunity of emphasising our loyalty to the British Crown and to express our sincere thankfulness for the entire religious liberty we enjoy under its beneficent rule.

Your Excellency, it is our conviction that unless all education is permeated with the religious spirit it will fall short of the ideal we should seek to achieve in all our work. It may interest Your Excellency to know that our institution and its numerous branches in different parts of India are establishing schools for imparting religious along with secular education and we send forth qualified preachers to all parts of India to teach and instruct the people in the principles of our faith and to distribute religious literature among them. We recognise that the spirit of religion is one unifying power which makes a people one in heart in loyalty to God and to Government ordained by God.

In accordance with the creed we follow we honestly believe His Most Gracious Majesty and his representatives to be heaven-sent agents on earth to maintain peace, harmony and order and to safeguard and promote the religious interests of all. The advent of the British into India is an arrangement made by Providence who holds in His hands the destinies of all nations and individuals, and none can dare encroach upon the divine right of any one. On the other hand if we abuse our freedom He gives us a chance of redemption by our own bitter experience. The British have brought us on from a long sound sleep and have maintained a very lofty outlook on many problems affecting our country. Above all such religious toleration was never found in the history of India before. Our indebtedness to the throne is, therefore, very great and we feel sure that we may reap an abundant harvest of good from our loyalty to the Crown.

Moreover if the happy wedding of the oriental and occidental spiritual lores be consummated in accordance with the instructions of an Absolute-realised Soul under His beneficent rule, the brightest issue of that happy union will be an unswerving trust in the eternal, spiritual, blissful Personalities of Godhead, which will lead us to the goal of human life, I mean to the realm of transcendental love which is the final object of spiritual existence of all human beings.

Of all human excellences reason is undoubtedly the greatest. But it has at present a limited jurisdiction as we are all located in this world of three dimensions. Self-manifestive Absolute Truth is, therefore, realisable through Transcendental Sound, the basis on which the religion is built and the root out of which it grows. The Gospel according to John says, "In the beginning was the Word, the Word was with God and the Word was God." But if without the help of the Holy Word of the Transcendental Sound coming out of the holy lips of a true devotee of the Lord, we wilfully allow our reason to go astray or to be kidnapped, adulterated and impregnated by the erroneous and evil ideas of the materialists or empiricists, she will generate Atheism, Agnosticism, Anthropomorphism, Zoomorphism, Phytomorphism, Pantheism, Panantheism, Scepticism, Henotheism, Deism, Demonism, Dogmatism, Anarchism and such sorts of "isms" which will tend to kill Theism and will be undone.

Your Excellency, we are not followers of the principle of "Vox populi Vox Dei"; but our principle is to trust in God after listening to the right. An English poet has justly said,

Some will hate thee,
Some will love thee,
Some will flatter,
Some will slight;
Cease from man
But look above thee,
Trust in God
And do the right.

When we return from the variegated world to the innermost recesses of our heart, or when our soul is brought back to its normal condition, we feel the spiritual magnetic power of Divine Love so conspicuously vivid on the Divine Person of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu.

Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu was an embodiment of Divine Love and He proclaimed Himself a gardener possessing and nurturing the ever-fruitful tree of Divine Love and His business was to distribute the fruits thereof to one and all without distinction of caste and creed. He entreated everybody to taste this fruit of Divine Love and contribute His share in distributing to others.

Jesus Christ has also said, "Love God with all thy heart, with all thy mind, with all thy soul and with all thy strength; and love man as true brother", for God is the common Father of all mankind and we all are brethren. This is true, indeed, but my heart sinks at the thought how it has lost its significance by repetition, and how it has become a cant phrase which ends only in sound and has no practical effect on our life. But nevertheless it is not quite dead. It will and must revive by spiritual cultivation. God's Grace extends Herself to those who take recourse to spiritual cultivation through transcendental sound to go back to God and back to home, and by that Grace is generated Bhakti consisting of special love for Him which ultimately ends in the realisation of our soul and in the universal brotherhood of man. For the more we love God the more shall we love one another, and the more the universal love will be kindled in our hearts. There is no other alternative, there is no other artificial means to attain this blissful state.

Sree Chaitanya's Message is a Message of Hope, Peace, Harmony and Good-will to all mankind regardless of bounds of country and even of religion. Be he a Mahomedan, a Christian, a Hindu or any man living either in the Poles, or in the Equator, dwelling either on the face of the earth or in heaven, he is entitled to embrace this religion of love which is the final object of the spiritual existence of all human beings, not only of all human beings, but of all terrestrial, celestial and divine beings.

Your Excellency it is this philosophy of Divine Love which the preachers of our Mission are going all over the world to preach under the revered direction of His Divine Grace Paramahansa Sree Srimad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj, the President-Acharya of this Mission, who is now carrying aloft the victorious banner of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu which has become the polar star of many a man in their spiritual endeavour in India.

In Europe, too, our preachers are making good headway, and it is no doubt through the instrumentality of Your Excellency's introduction to Sir Findlater Stewart, Under-Secretary of State for India, to one of the preachers of our Mission that Their Majesties were graciously pleased to command Lord Chamberlain to invite our representative in England to the Buckingham Palace where he paid his homage to Their Majesties on behalf of this Mission, and the Rt. Honourable Sir Samuel Hoare has introduced him to Herr Hitler in Germany where he has been delivering lectures at the various Universities. Our London Gaudiya Mission Society has also been formally inaugurated under the Presidentship of the Marquess of Zetland, and it already includes among its members many eminent and distinguished persons in Europe. We owe all this to the initial impetus given by Your Excellency. We wish to commemorate Your Excellency's gracious visit to this holy land by erecting a suitable gate at the entrance of Sree Mayapur which is visited by several thousands of pilgrims from different parts of India every year.

I cannot conclude without acknowledging Your Excellency's personal qualities which have endeared Your Excellency to all who have the pleasure of Your Excellency's acquaintance. Your Excellency's kindness, courtesy, unfeigned friendship, justice tempered by mercy, and a desire to do good to all, consistently with Your Excellency's position and duties, have not a little heightened Your Excellency's services as a ruler. Your Excellency has evinced a breadth of mind, strong common sense, great vigour, firmness and frankness and, above all, an enlightened and generous sympathy for all classes of people. Every class of people has reasons to be grateful to Your Excellency for services rendered to it.

We hope Your Excellency will take back with Your Excellency the pleasant memory of our beloved holy land Sree Mayapur and assure Your Excellency's good, great and grandself of our deep attachment to the throne and to Your Excellency's person. We are not ambitious of acquiring riches, name or fame, but our whole desire is to live and die honest, loyal and religious men serving our Supreme Lord and humanity with our heart and soul.

One word more. A public tribute is due to our Commissioner Mr. H. J. Twynam as also to the Collector and Superintendent of Police, Krishnagar, for their active help which has made this function of today possible. I thank them from the bottom of my heart for their kindness which will be ever remembered by the members of our Mission.

Round the Gaudiya Maths

Sree Rupa Gaudiya Math, Allahabad:

On January 16, Mr. S. P. Chakravarty B. A., Commercial Superintendent, E. I. Ry., paid a visit to Sree Rupa Gaudiya Math with his wife, for a sight of the Deities. They were warmly received by the inmates of the Math. The preacher-in-charge of the Math explained to them the messages of the Mission and the Teachings of the Supreme Lord. They were pleased to have such opportunity of religious association and to hear the discourses for a short time and showed their inclination to visit the Math regularly.

On January 23, Sj. Amarendra Nath Majumdar, Divisional Accounts Officer, E. I. Ry., came to the Math with his wife. They were pleased with the manners of the Math people and their cordial reception, and expressed a desire to come on a visit to Sreedham Mayapur.

Sree Chaitanya Math, Sree Mayapur:

His Excellency the Rt. Hon'ble Sir John Anderson P. C., G. C. B., G. C. I. E., with several other high officials visited Sreedham Mayapur on January 15. A detailed statement of the visit appears in another page.

Mahopadeshak Pandit Pranabananda Brahmachari, Pratnavidyalankara, has been reading and explaining the Upadeshamrita of Sree Rupa

Goswami at the Avidyaharana Natya-mandir. In course of his reading he is careful to touch many points bearing specially on pure devotion.

Tridandi Swami Srimad Bhakti Srirup Puri Maharaj is staying at Sree Chaitanya Math. He is always prepared to meet all honest seekers of the truth and help them with his interesting conversations on the Supreme Lord and His Leela.

Sripad Nabin Krishna Vidyalankar explained Sanatan Siksha from Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita on January 23.

On January 25, Sj. Surendra Nath Roy Chowdhury, Advocate, Calcutta High Court, paid a visit to Sreedham Mayapur with his wife. They saw all the places of interest and were particularly pleased to see the Deities.

Sree Jagannath Gaudiya Math, Mymensingh :

The preachers of the Math in course of their propaganda tour visited Bishnurampur, Sushuti, Naogaon, Kishoreganj and many other places in the district. Dr. Jatindra Mohan Ghosh, Dr. Jnanendra Nath Mittra, Sj. Govinda Chandra Dey, Kaviraj Srinath Seal and many other respectable gentlemen of the localities helped the preachers in various ways in conducting their propaganda in a peaceful and systematic manner.

Sree Paramahansa Math, Nimsar :

Sj. Satya Narayan Das Adhikari, keeper of the Math, being invited by the Secretary of the Hari Sabha of Lucknow, delivered a lecture there on January 15, on "Vaishnavism" for nearly two hours. In course of it he cited several important slokas from Srimad Bhagabat and explainad them lucidly to the satisfaction of the audience.

On January 18, Mr. Aniruddha Sinha, S. I. of Police Station Misrikh in Sitapur, paid a visit to the Math. Sripad Gauranugraha Brahmachari and Sripad Satya Narayan Das Adhikary received him cordially and held conversation on religious topics for some time. Mr. Sinha was glad to have the company of Sadhus for some time, and heartily thanked them for telling him the messages of Sree Chaitanya.

Sree Purushottam Math, Puri :

On January 14, the devotees and the preachers of the Math had been to the temple of Sree Jagannath Deva for the performance of patha and kirtan on the occasion of Makar Sankranti. Sripad Jadabananda Brahmachari read and explained portions of Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita. Many pilgrims and local inhabitants assembled to hear the discourse. The devotees paid a visit to the house of Sj. Abani Mohan Mookherjee of Messrs. O. N. Mookherjee & Sons at his request. Sripad Jadabananda Brahmachari read and explained Sree Chaitanya Bhagabat at this place also.

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Bhudeb Srauti Maharaj :

Swamiji reached Bakhrabad, in Midnapur, on January 4. He went to Phulberia with his party and was received as the guest of Sripad Jadabendra Das Adhikari. He is giving expositions of Srimad Bhagabat and also explaining the Leela of Sriman Mahaprabhu, illustrating same with lantern slides at different places of the locality.

On the invitation of Dr. Satyendra Nath Mukherjee of Cawnpore a preacher of the Math Sj. Satyanarain Das Adhikary paid a visit to the town. At the request of Dr. Mukherjee he read and explained Srimad Bhagabat at his residence. The meeting was attended by many respectable gentlemen.

Sree Gaudiya Math, Patna :

Sripad Sivananda Brahmachari, keeper of the Math, went out to Arrah on a preaching tour. He delivered a lecture at "Nagri Pracharini Sabha" on "the object of human life" on January 20, for an hour and a half. Many members of the bar and other respectable gentlemen of the city attended. Brahmachariji read and explained Srimad Bhagabat in the house of Sj. Brajanandan Sahai for a week.

Sree Gaudiya Math, Calcutta :

After a stay of two weeks at Sreedham Mayapur, Editor returned to Calcutta on January 27.

Sree Gaudiya Math, Baliati (Dacca) :

Sree Murties of Sree Radha Madhab were installed at the Gadai-Gauranga Math on January 20. Sm. Radha Kundeswari Ray Chowdhurani, the pious wife of Sj. Rai Mohan Roy Chowdhury, devotedly prayed for the appearance of the Deity. With the help of Sj. Mohini Mohan Roy Chowdhury, Bhakti Vikram, the function of the day was celebrated with befitting grandeur. Many respectable gentlemen attended the meeting and Mahaprasad was distributed to all present. Sripad Anadi Krishna Brahmachari Bhakti-sastri read and explained the story of Sakshee Gopal from Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita.

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Sudhir Yachak Maharaj :

Swamiji is propagating the doctrines of Sriman Mahaprabhu in Farakkabad. On January 21, he read and explained Sree Chaitanya Charitamrita in Hindi at the temple of Sitaram. About three hundred persons attended. Cultured gentlemen of the locality are taking a keen interest in the Misson's work. Mr. Bhagabati Prasad, Advocate; Pandit Lal Mohan Bhattacherji, President Sanatan Dharma Sabha, and Sj. Sital Das, Teacher Govt. High School are sincerely helping Swamiji in his activities.

Germany :

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Hridoy Bon Maharaj, preacher-in-Charge in the West, is now on a propaganda tour in Germany. He delivered two lectures at the Berlin University on January 25 and 26. It was attended by several prominent members of the University. The lectures were appreciated. The subjects were "Need of training in Spiritual Life" and "Object of Human Life" respectively. He has spoken eloquently on the "Theism of India" at different centres. The savants and intellectuals of Germany are listening with deep interest to the discourses of Swamiji who is trying very sucessfully to offer to Germany the religious atmosphere of Bengal. Swami Bon has been invited to address the University of Paris. His wholehearted devotion to the Truth is causing the Transcendental Sound to reverberate throught the whole of Europe.

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj :

Swamiji is conducting a vigorous propaganda in the Indian States of Dholpur and Jaipur. He was preaching the messages of Lord Chaitanya in Agra for some time. Swamiji had also been at Gwalior where in January 21 he delivered a lecture at the premises of Normal School in Hindi on "the "Transcendental Name". On January 22, he spoke before many educated persons on "Daiva Varnasharam Dharma, Brahmacharya, life of householders, Vanaprasthas and ascetics".

Sree Gaudiya Math, Amarshi :

Tridandiswami Srimâd Bhakti Vijnan Asram Maharaj with a party of Brahmacharins, had been to Sardaspur on a preaching tour. Sj. Bhuban Mohan Das Adhikari received them cordially at his house. Swamiji explained Srimad Bhagabat to the people.

Sree Prapannasram, Amlajora :

Sripad Jamadarjun Brahmachari, with Sripad Japa Gaur Das Adhikari and several other devotees, went to Kenduvilwa in the District of Birbhum. Kenduvilwa is the seat of Srila Jaideva. Brahmachariji lectured at the "Jaideva Harinam Pracharini Sabha" on January 14, 15 and 16. Mahamahopadhyaya Ram Brahma, Sj. Kali Pada Bhattacherjee and many other gentlemen attended the lectures. The subjects of the lectures were the Real self of Jiva, Sri Nama and Devotion.

VOL. XXXI. FEBRUARY 14, 1935 No. 12

Sree Chaitanya Shikshastakam

I. The seven-fold efficacy of chanting the Holy Name ;

May the chanting of the Holy Name of Sree Krishna be glorified which (1) sweeps off all the dirts from the mirror of our hearts ; (2) extinguishes the great forest-fire of suffering from the cycle of births and deaths ; (3) sheds moon-light upon the lily of eternal good ; (4) is the very life of the Bride of real learning ; (5) swells the Ocean of ecstatic Bliss ; (6) gives the full taste of pure nectar at every utterance of the Holy Name and (7) bathes i. e., purifies and refreshes the whole self including body, mind and soul in Divine Bliss.

(II) Non-relishing misfortunes or four-fold impediments * standing on the way of chanting the Holy Name ;

O Almighty Supreme Lord ! Thou hast, out of Thy Infinite Mercy, given to the world a multiplicity of Thy Names, endowed each of Them with all Thy potencies and made no restrictions as to the time, place etc., of their recitations and remembrance. But alas ! such is my ill-luck that I have no love for chanting Them !

* The four-fold impediments are ; (1) forgetfulness of Real Self, (2) weakness of heart, (3) evil desires and (4) offences. Each of these four is again sub-divided into four kinds which the reader will find in the 'Bhajan Rahashya' by Thakur Bhakti Vinode.

(III) Eligibility of chanting the Holy Name ;

He who is humbler than a blade of grass, is more forbearant than a tree and honours others yet without any desire for honouring himself, is ever worthy of chanting the Holy Name.

(IV) What to pray while chanting the Holy Name ;

No riches, no friends or relatives, no beautiful consort or genius for poetry do I pray Thee for, but may my heart ever cling to Thee, O Supreme Lord, out of self-less devotion, whenever and wherever I may be born.

(V) The true conception of the chanter of the Holy Name ;

O Son of Nanda ! graciously count me, Thy servant, as a particle of dust of Thy Lotus Feet, fallen as I am in the terrible Ocean of this world.

(VI) The permanent symptoms of Rati or the dawning of Love arising out of chanting the Holy Name ;

When will my eyes, O Lord ! at the chanting of Thy Name, be filled with flowing tears, my voice become choked and the hair of my body stand up in ecstasy ?

(VII) Intense feeling of unbearable separation from the Supreme Lord Govinda, the Real Form of the Holy Name, when nearing perfection ;

The separation from my Beloved Govinda makes an instant, i. e. the twinkling of an eye, seem to me to be an æon, my eyes are turned into the rainy season itself and the whole world appears to me a void.

(VIII) The realisation of the Highest End (Divine Love) of chanting the Holy Name, in the unalloyed existence (soul) ;

Whether Krishna, my Beloved, hugs me in His sweet embrace or tramples me under His Feet, or torments me by keeping Himself away from me and gratifying His amours in whatever manner He likes, He and none else is the Lord of my life (so says Sreemati Radhika to Her most Beloved Consort Krishna)

Jaiva Dharma

30. The accidental function is adulterated with undesirable factors, notwithstanding the fact that it deserves to be esteemed for aiming at the true end. The spiritual principle is alone wholesome. Matter and association with matter are alone unwholesome for the individual soul. The accidental function contains a great proportion of the material principle. Moreover the said function brings forth such a profusion of irrelevant results that the soul cannot but get entangled in them. For instance it is certainly a good thing for a Brahmana to worship God, but a false egotism, in the shape of such beliefs as that "I am a Brahmana other souls are inferior to myself",—is apt to render the worship of a Brahmana productive of undesirable consequences. Similarly an objectionable bye-product of the eight-fold yogic function which goes by the name of "bibhuti" (magical power). is also extremely harmful to the individual soul. 'Bhukti' (mundane enjoyment) and 'mukti' (liberation) —these two are unavoidable companions of the accidental function. It is only if a person can save himself from the clutches of these fell enemies that he can have a chance of attaining the spiritual function proper which is the fundamental object of such activities. But we must bear it in mind that in the accidental function, for the purpose of the individual soul, the undesirable factor is preponderant.

31. The accidental function is impermanent. It does not hold at all times and in all conditions of the jiva. For instance the Brahma nature of a Brahmana, the Kshatra nature of the Kshatriya etc., are accidents ; they disappear as soon as the cause of them is exhausted. A person may be born a Chandala following his birth in a Brahmana family. In his second life the accidental function corresponding to his varna as a Brahmana is no longer his proper function or svadharma. The term 'svadharma' as used in reference to the accidental function has also a transferred meaning. After every birth the proper specific function or svadharma of the jiva suffers a change. But the eternal function of the jiva is never changed in any birth. The eternal function alone is really the svadharma of the jiva. The accidental function is transitory.

32. If then you ask, "what is the Vaishnava religion or the function of a Vaishnava ?" The answer is that the function of a Vaishnava or Vaishnava religion is the eternal function of the jiva. The Vaishnava jiva in his state of freedom from the bondage of the material energy practises love of Krishna in his unalloyed spiritual form. The Vaishnava jiva in the conditioned state by being awakened to his proper function thankfully accepts every form of material entity and mundane relationship that is conducive to his spiritual culture and rejects all those that are detrimental to the same. He does not carry out mechanically the injunctions and taboos of the Shastras. He welcomes an injunction of the Shastra when it is conducive to the service of God and disregards it when it is opposed to the same. The attitude of a Vaishnava towards the prohibitions of the Shastras is also exactly the same. The Vaishnava is the only true entity and the essence of all goodness in this world. The Vaishnava is the only friend of this world. The Vaishnava is the only source of well-being of this world. I have submitted in all humility all that I have to say before the Vaishnavas who are assembled here today. I humbly pray for their kind forgiveness for all my offences".

35. When at the conclusion of his speech Vaishnavadas, after making his obeisances to the assembly of the Vaishnavas, assumed his seat at the further end of the gathering, all those devotees were greatly moved and tears rolled down from their eyes. All of them thanked him with one accord. The groves of Sree Godruma also responded by the offering of their gratitude.

36. The Brahmana, who had put the question and who was an accomplished singer, could also perceive the most profound truth in many parts of the exposition, although he experienced also a certain degree of doubt in regard to some of the statements. However, the seed of firm conviction in the truth of the Vaishnava religion, which had been implanted in his heart, was quickened into vigorous life by what he had heard. He now said with folded hands, 'Great devotees, I am not a Vaishnava, but I have been turned a Vaishnava by listening to the Name of Hari. If you be pleased to instruct me at your leisure out of mercy it may remove my doubts which are many.

37. Sree Premadasa Babaji Maharaj made the gracious answer, "May I request you to associate at your convenience with Srimad Vaishnavadasa. He is versed in all the Shastras. He was residing at Benares on his assumption of Sanyas after deeply studying the Vedanta Shastra. Sree Krishna-Chaitanya, the Darling Lord of our lives, by manifesting His boundless mercy, has drawn him here to Sree Nabadwip. He has now become fully conversant with the principles of the Vaishnava religion and has developed a deep love for Sree Hari-Name".

38. The name of the enquirer was Sree Kalidasa Lahiri. On hearing these words of Babaji Maharaj he mentally accepted Vaishnavadasa as his spiritual preceptor (Guru). He thought within himself, "He has been born in a Brahmana family and has accepted Sanyas. He is, therefore, fit to instruct a Brahmana. Moreover, I have found him to be possessed of very great knowledge of Vaishnava principles. I can confidently expect from him much light about Vaishnavism". With these thoughts in his mind Lahiri Mahashaya made his prostrated obeisances to the feet of Vaishnavadasa and said, "Revered sir, have mercy upon me". Vaishnavadasa, after prostrating himself to Lahiri Mahashaya in his turn, replied, "If you are pleased to be merciful to me, the wish of my heart may be fulfilled".

39. As the evening was drawing nigh all the assembled persons departed to their homes for that day.

40. The place where Lahiri Mahashaya lived was hidden away in a secluded part of the village. It was also a grove (kunja). The centre of the grove was occupied by an awning of Madhabi creepers and a platform to Sree Vrindadevi (tulasi). There were two rooms, one on each side. The yard was fenced round with the chita plant. A bela tree, a neema tree and several other fruit and flower trees added to the charm of the grove. Madhabadasa Babaji was the Adhikari (lit. vicar) of the grove (kunja). This Babaji had at first been a really good soul. But his Vaishnava nature had suffered a great deterioration by the evil effects of bad association. His devotional practices had been greatly curtailed by vices contracted by wrong association with women. Pecuniary want also stood in the way of meeting the expenses of his livelihood in tolerable comfort.

He practised begging from many persons and had hired out one of his rooms to a tenant. Lahiri Mahashya was living at this place as his tenant in the rented room.

41. It was now midnight when Lahiri Mahashaya's sleep was broken. He was pondering the substance of the speech of Vaishnavadasa Babaji. Just then a sound was heard in the yard of the grove. On coming out of his room Lahiri Mahashaya found Madhabadasa Babaji talking with a woman in the yard of the grove. The woman disappeared on catching sight of him. Madhabadasa remained silent. He evidently felt embarrassed in the presence of Lahiri Mahashaya.

42. Lahiri Mahashaya spoke first, "Babaji, what is the matter ?"

43. Madhabadasa replied with tearful eyes, "It is my evil fate. What more need I say ? Alas, what I had been in the past and what I am now ! With what affectionate confidence Paramahansa Babaji once looked upon me ! I am now ashamed even to approach his presence".

44. Lahiri Mahashaya said, "We can understand the position if the matter is definitely stated".

45. Madhabadasa said, "The woman whom you saw was my married wife in my former household life. A short time after I accepted the life of renunciation she came to Sripat Shantipur, which is one of the sacred places of the Vaishnavas, and lived there in a cottage, which she made for the purpose, on the bank of the Ganges. Many days passed away in this manner. I chanced to go to Sripat Shantipur and meeting her on the side of the Ganges asked her why she had renounced the household life. She let me understand that worldly life had ceased to have any attraction for her and that she was living by begging in the holy place after being deprived of the service of my feet. Without talking to her further on the subject I came back to Sree Godruma and put up in the house of a Sad-gopa. I met her everyday at some place or other. The more I tried to avoid her hold, the more did she press her intimacy on me. She has now an ashrama (a house for living in pious retirement) of her own at this place. She now makes every possible endeavour for accomplishing my ruin by visiting me in late hours during the night. My evil fame has been circulated everywhere. By association with her my own devotional practices has suffered very great curtailment. I have proved the renegade among the servants of Sree Krishna-Chaitanya. Since the junior Haridas was punished I am the only wretch who have turned out to be a fit object of punishment. The Babajis of Sree Godruma out of their mercy have not yet punished me. But they no longer have any trust in me."

46. Lahiri Mahashaya on hearing his story said, "Madhabadasa Babaji, beware of the evil course". Having said so he returned to his room. The Babaji also betook himself to his hermit's seat (gadi).

47. Lahiri Mahashaya had no more sleep that night. He said within himself, "Madhabadasa Babaji has ruined himself by breaking his hermit's vow of continence. It is not proper for me to stay here, because even if it does not lead to actual evil association it will give rise to grave evil reputation. The pure Vaishnavas will no longer teach me as one who is fit for their trust."

48. Accordingly the very next morning he repaired to Pradyumna Kunja and after duly saluting Sree Vaishnavadasa he begged for a little room in the Kunja for his stay there. When Vaishnavadasa informed Paramahansa Babaji of his request, he commanded him to be assigned a cottage for his stay on one side of the Kunja. Since then Lahiri Mahashaya lived in that cottage and arranged for obtaining food that had been offered to Vishnu at the house of a Brahmana.

(To be continued)

The pontifical position of Sri Madhavendra Puri

By Tridandiswami Sreemad Bhakt Rakshak Sridhar Maharaj

Sri Madhavendra Puri is said to be the sprout of the great tree of devotional love represented by Sri Chaitanya Dev to the world. He comes of the line of Sri Madhwa, the Acharya of the pure Dwaita (Dualistic) philosophy. It is well known to a student of religious literature that pure Dualism is one of the four Theistic Vaishnava Schools of ancient India. As Brahma, the creator himself, has been mentioned to be the pioneer of the Faith, the school is also known as 'Brahma Sampradaya'.

The line of succession of the Acharyas from Brahma to Madhwa shows variation. Some count it as Brahma, Sanakas, Durbasa, Achyutapreksha, Madhwa, while a sober section holds to the line as Brahma, Narada, Vyasa and Madhwa. Because though Sri Madhwa took his ascetic order formally from Achyutapreksha, he is found all along to be in severe opposition to the professed creed of this formal Guru both before and after the acceptance of such order. Besides, Madhwa's propaganda, before he met Sri Vyasa, was clearly limited to a destructive line of vanquishing Mayavada, and it is only after he came under the Divine Feet of Vyasa Deva, —the great world-teacher of Theism,— that he took up the constructive side of regular preaching, and made converts and commentaries as an authorised Acharya. Achyutapreksha, his former Guru, then submitted to him and was converted fully to Transcendental Dualism from the Mayavada of Sankara. Therefore, that Sri Madhwa, as an Acharya preaching the positive principle of Transcendental Dualism comes in the line of Sri Vyasa is considered more valid and is accepted by the wiser section.

Sripad Madhavendra Puri was an Acharya of the Madhwa school and is considered to be the connecting link between Madhwa and Gaudiya Sampradaya. This is accepted both by the Madhwa as well as by the Madhwa Gaudiya-Sampradayas. The author of Sri Sri Gaur-Ganoddesa-Dipika, Sri Baladeva Vidyabhusan and others have left authentic records to that effect. But some suspicion may arise in a modern empiric mind as to how 'Puri' can possibly come of the Madhwa Sampradaya where the sanyasins go by the general title of 'Tirtha'.

In answer to that a section in the Madhwa community wants to say that though 'Tirtha', having its sacred association with 'Ananda Tirtha'—Madhwa himself, found special favour in the school and got prominence as a general title of the sanyasins of the community, yet 'Puri' and other titles were not absent altogether. It asserts that Madhwacharya himself as well as his successors converted many sanyasins of Sankara school and allowed the retention of their former titles to demonstrate their victories over Mayavada, and thus Madhavendra Puri must either be a disciple of such a convert or a direct convert. But as this section cannot show any authentic record, sufficient to prove their statemet, we do not find any reason to accept mere assertion.

The other section, however, holds that Sripad Madhavendra Puri, as a Guru of the Doctrine of Transcendental Love, must have accepted his Diksha (Divine Initiation) from the bona fide line of Transcendental Dualism of Madhwacharya though he might have taken his sanyasa (formal ascetic order) from any other community. The section attaches the real importance to Diksha and points out the remarkable indifference with which a Vaishnava Acharya treats the formal taking of an ascetic order. This party draws our attention to Madhwacharya himself who took his sanyasa from Achyutapreksha of the Mayavada school only to refute the professing faith of the very Guru.

The fact that the Vaishnava school does not attach much importance to this external formality of ascetic order, but considers it merely as an ostentatious advantage for propaganda work, is also maintained by Sri Ramanuja's example of going through the order himself without the help of any Guru of any sect whatso-ever. On the other hand the same Ramanujacharya was seen perseveringly trying for the Grace (in the form of Mantra Diksha) from a Vaishnava Guru, times without number. Later on Lord Chaitanya too, showing His anxiety for sanyasa, took it at once from the immediate available Kesava Bharati of Sankara school after giving him necessary instructions for the same, and is seen mentioning in modest sportive expression at times this Mayavada connection which an adventurous and interested critic often misreads and very prudently gives his decree to count Him as one in the Mayavada fold.

So it is not definitely known whether Sripad Madhavendra Puri had his ascetic order from Madhwa Sampradaya. But it is sure that he was an Acharya of the very Sampradaya. It is also sure that he was not a mere convert too, from any other sect. Because his faith and love to Sri Krishna and His service was far too sublime and soaring to keep him even within the bounds of Madhwa school itself, what to speak of Mayavada theory which propounds God, soul and service as all illusion. In fact Madhavendra Puri was not sadhana-siddhwa i.e. not one who had to realise his goal in this life, but nitya-siddhwa or eternally self-realised one.

Trouble, however, arises again as to the adjustment of several names in the pontifical list from Madhwa to Madhavendra Puri. Empiric enquiry, ignorant of the real nature and object of spiritual lineage, finds itself in a blind lane while meddling with matter beyond its scope, and tries to break through the walls with animal wrath. How the four direct disciples of Sri Madhwa—Padmanabha, Narahari, Madhava and Akshobhya—could come in a line of pontifical succession and how they could occupy the same seat of the principal Acharya of the same institution, each for seven, nine, seventeen and seventeen successive years respectively,—are congenial although essentially trivial problems to these pedants of intellect. Then again the history shows a very small span of time between Sri Chaitanya and Vyasaraya Swami. So how can a long list of so many Acharyas be possibly accommodated within this short period of time ? A puzzle it is, indeed, to a critic of foreign experience. One may hope to be excused to draw the attention of these rationalistic speculators to the list of royal succession of the present Cochin State, of course granted that they are not conversant with the special method of inheritance of that particular State, when these friends will simply become stupefied to find that even more than a dozen successive ruling princes are very often contemporaries. Therefore, the correct reading of pontifical line depends on our sound knowledge of Sampradaya-rahasya (Esoteric Technics of spiritual society). And, when really blessed with such light alone, we can find that sometimes names of remarkable contemporaries are retained and sometimes names that are not very prominet are omitted from the pontifical list.

But the greatness and importance of Sri Madhavendra Puri, however, does not lie so much in his being a mere bona fide member of the Madhwa community, as in his being the pioneer of the Faith of Transcendental Love to Sri Krishna, to proclaim which the Great Lord Sri Chaitanya Deva descended on Earth. The first effective start of Madhura-rasa Upasana or Consort-service to the Youthful Krishna, was really given by Sri Madhavendra

Puri. Although the services of Krishna as the Gopees rendered them in Brinda. van, were not unknown in Madhwa Maths, yet the Object of their service being Bala Gopala the mode of service can naturally be only in Batsalya-rasa or Parental-affection. The famous poems of Sripad Madhavendra Goswami beginning with 'Oyi Deena Dayadra Natha etc.', 'Kamprati Kathaitumese etc.', 'Shyamameva Param Rupam etc.', not only indicate the highest achievement of the author, but prove that even men of high religious culture of the time were quite strangers to the sublime thought of deep Consort-love to Ever-Youthful Krishna, Reality—the Beautiful. There is also a hint in his poem of the Advent of a Great Apostle of an extensive and organised propaganda of this blossoming doctrine of sweet Consort-service to the Youthful and Beautiful Supreme Person—Sri Krishna, the All-love, and it is not difficult to see the meaning in the Great Lord Chaitanya Deva and His overflowing distribution of the nectarine treasure of Love-service to the Supreme Krishna.

Sri Nityananda, Sri Adwaitacharya, Sri Ishwara Puri, Sri Ranga Puri, Raghupati Upadhyaya and many other towering personalities of great religious and social importance of the time, have been mentioned to express their high reverence and spiritual indebtedness to this great saint and saviour of mankind.

Andhra-Vyasa

One day when Pothan was engaged in his work of writing the Bhagabatam, his son Mallan was ploughing the land in view of his father. At this moment Sreenath was passing by his house on his way to the court of the king, seated in a beautifully ornamented and valuable palanquin. It may be noted that Sreenath was an adept in certain supernatural powers by virtue of his meditative practices. To show to Pothan, by means of his supernatural power, his own higher position and thereby to lower the latter in the estimation of the people, Sreenath had recourse to one such by asking the two palanquin bearers, who were supporting the front side of the palanquin, to leave their posts, but contriving at the same time that the palanquin would move on as before in their absence. Pothan could read the mind of Sreenath, and in order to giving a fitting reply to humble his pride, he asked his son to let go one of the two bullocks from the yoke, but the ploughing was carried on with one bullock, as before. This tit-for-tat excited Sreenath to remove the other two palanquin bearers from behind the conveyance, but the palanquin continued to go on suspended in air. Herein also Pothan was not a bit slow in his reply. He asked his son to remove the other bullock from the yoke and made the ploughing to go on as before in the absence of both the bullocks. This incident humbled the pride of Sreenath through his possession of supernatural powers. But this rude shock did not deter him from carrying on his malicious intrigues against Pothan. In the chapter on "Gajendra-mokshana" of eighth skandha of the Andhra Bhagabata, Pothan narrated that Sree Vishnu on hearing the pitiful and afflicted wailings of Gajendra left Vaikuntha all in a hurry to save the devotee who had surrendered himself to His Feet and that He was in such anxious haste that He did not care either to speak with Lakshmidevi or to take His Club or Chakra or to equip Himself with proper dress.

These lines of the Andhra Bhagabatam were too much for the puppy brain of the king's poet Sreenath who made cutting and sarcastic remarks against Pothan, because he could not make himself believe that the lamentations of a devotee could bring about such a perplexed state of conduct in Sree Vishnu Himself. Pothan heard them, but for the time being did not think of giving the reply, although he was on the look out for one such in the shape of a cut and dry matter of fact incident. And he had not to wait long. One day when Sreenath was engaged in his mid-day meal, Pothan informed him that his (Sreenath's) son had fallen into a deep well near by. The news had its forcible effect and Sreenath at once jumped up from his seat and ran to the well in such anxious haste for saving his son that he had no time for caring about anything else viz., securing the ropes, men or other things necessary for his purpose. Pothan was not now slow to address this taunt to Sreenath, "Now, sir, by your own conduct you have provided me with an apt reply to your sarcastic remarks. Your anxiety to save your son from the well in all haste without caring to be provided with the means for his rescue is a fit reply to your observation as to how Sree Vishnu could run to the rescue of Gajendra in distress, forgetful of Himself. Are you any longer in doubt about the conduct of Sree Vishnu? Besides your love for your son is infinitely less than that of Lord Vishnu for His devotee in distress". This telling reply of Pothan brought Sreenath to his senses, who now understood his mistakes and thenceforward never raised his finger again against Pothan.

It is true that the Andhra Bhagabata is a rendering in the Andhra language of the original Sanskrit text. But it is not an exact translation in the strict sense of the term. Endowed with heavenly powers, Pothan has manifested in the book a poetical genius which has made it an unrivalled treasure among the spiritual scriptures. When Pothan was writing the chapter on "Gajendra mokshana", the flow of his poetry received by chance a set-back with the result that inspite of all his best efforts that he could bring to bear on the subject, he could not fill up one of the lines in the metre to his satisfaction. When the poem was still unfinished, he had to leave his desk for a while. On his return he found to his great surprise and satisfaction that the line in the poem had been filled up in his absence. Rumour goes that the Lord Himself appeared in the guise of Pothan and filled up the blank in his Divine poem. An incident of similar Divine favour is also reported to be attached to Jayadeva, the great amorous poet of Bengal. Opinions may vary as to the truth of such traditions, but this much at least can be safely assured and believed that nothing is at all impossible in the Leela of the Supreme Lord. All limited empiric attempts to measure the extent of the Pastimes of the Supreme Lord are nothing short of the delirious outbursts of mad men.

The short life-sketch of a devotee of Pothan's type shows, in bright contrast of the ordinary run of people of this world, how the course of a devotee of Godhead is an easy-going one, how he is saved from all extraneous pernicious influences by the Graceful Hand of God, how, inspite of any the least exertion on his part, all supernatural powers flock to him, and how all his wants are spontaneously met without his asking for the same. This narrative, not drawn from the fertile imaginary brain of men but based on the actual facts of life, has its own intrinsic worth to the minds of all religiously disposed readers who, it is hoped, will not fail to draw the necessary healthy inspiration therefrom.

Gradations of the duty of Man

By Brajeswari Prasad

Actions performed by men are divisible into three categories, (1) fruitive actions, (2) actions performed with a view to leading on towards deliverance from bondage, (3) service of the Supreme Godhead.

Fruitive actions may again be subdivided into two heads, (1) regulated fruitive actions and (2) non-regulated fruitive actions.

Regulated fruitive actions.

The Shastras contain a large number of rules and practices for regulating the conduct of all people with due regard to their pre-existing tendencies and affections with a view to qualify them ultimately to enter upon that spiritual endeavour which their souls have always stood in utter need of. These rules and practices constitute the naimittic dharma of the society. The real purpose of the naimittic dharma, however, has never been ordinarily understood by the conditioned soul on account of his natural aptitude of being served on his own separate account. On the other hand the enjoying mood of mankind went on to discover that the rules and practices aforesaid were capable of yielding another kind of fruit also which would be more in line with its own purpose. Practising honesty, truthfulness, non-violence, philanthrophy, self-sacrifice and restrained use of the sexual urge on the one hand,—and propitiating the gods and goddesses by means of the prescribed Yagyas on the other, could give the possessor of the enjoying aptitude power, prestige and material prosperity in this life, and Swarga with all the pleasures and happinesses which it implies in the next. People possessed of the enjoying mood, therefore, began to press the said rules and practices for indulging their own acquired predilections. Now a days however, many of the Yagyas prescribed in the Vedas cannot be performed and the acts of propitiation of the gods and goddesses and the rules of honesty, truthfulness, etc., mentioned aforesaid, have degenerated into mere acts of piety and rules of morality respectively calculated at best to lead one to Swarga. In so far as people perform the said acts of piety and follow the said rules of morality their actions are called 'regulated'. They are very good in the sense that they tend to make the highest worldly good of the performer of the said actions as consistent with the highest worldly good of all as is possible within this triple textured world. With regard to these Krishna says the following in Srimad Bhagwat Gita, Chapter IX, slokas 20 & 21.

त्रैविद्या मां सोमपाः पूतपापा
यज्ञैरिष्ट्वा स्वर्गतिं प्रार्थयन्ते।
ते पुण्यमासाद्य सुरेन्द्रलोक
मश्नन्ति दिव्यान् दिवि देव भोगान्॥
ते तं भुक्ता स्वर्गलोकं विशालं
क्षीणे पुण्ये मर्त्यलोकं विशन्ति।
एवं त्रयीधर्ममनुप्रपन्ना
गतागतं कामकामा लभन्ते॥

(By performing fruitive actions made known, in the three Vedas, drinking Soma juice, and thus freeing themselves from all sins people worship me by means of Yagyas and desire Swarga. Having attained Indralok in the shape of fruits of virtuous acts they gain the enjoyment of resplendent gods in Swarga. Having exhausted the store of the fruits of their meritorious acts by enjoying the mightily expanded Swarga they return to Mrityulok. Thus people who resort to the fruitive actions laid down in the three Vedas with numerous desires in their heart are subjected to constant births and deaths.)

All acts done with reference to the phenomenal entities are measurable in terms of time and space and, therefore, must in their very nature be capable of bearing only perishable results. They have no power to solve the real problem of the soul. Krishna has, therefore, condemned all involvements in the medley of virtuous and sinful acts as indicated in the slokas quoted above and in the following sloka :—

बुद्धियुक्तो जहातीह
उभे सुकृत-दुष्कृते
तस्माद् योगाय युज्यस्व
योगः कर्मसु कौशलम्।

(Those people who perform work without being attached to it and with indifference to its results give up all considerations of good actions and bad actions in this very life. Therefore, try to perform Samatvabuddhi Yoga which constitutes the real adeptness in all actions.)

Non-regulated fruitive actions

People engaged in performing non-regulated fruitive actions have been described by Krishna in Srimad Bhagwat Gita in Chapter XVI, slokas 7, 8 & 9.

प्रवृत्तिञ्च निवृत्तिञ्च जना न विदुरासुराः।
न शौचं नापि चाचारो न सत्यं तेषु विद्यते॥

(Those people who are of Asurik temperament neither know to get engaged in doing works which ought to be done nor know to be free from doing works which ought not to be done. Such people have neither purity nor are of noble conduct nor truthful)

असत्यमप्रतिष्ठन्ते जगदाहुरनीश्वरम् ।
अपरस्परसंभूतं किमन्यत्कामहेतुकम् ॥

(Those people of Asurik temperament say that the world is without a support, false, and without Ishwar,—it is created purely out of sexual co-union and, therefore, there is naught else except to enjoy things)

एतां दृष्टिमवष्टभ्य नष्टात्मानोऽल्पबुद्धयः ।
प्रभवन्त्युग्रकर्माणः क्षयाय जगतोऽहिताः ॥

(Those such people who are doers of crooked actions and harm to every one, and whose nature is perverted by acceptance of false knowledge, and whose faculty of reasoning has become small, have been born only to destroy the world).

The above line of description has been continued in several more verses, but all of them need not be enumerated here.

The tendencies and affections of the people of Asurik temperament are devoid of all reference to any ideal. The mainspring of their lives is their propensity to lord it over the phenomenal entities. Their conduct is guided solely by their own whims and caprices. They believe that there is nothing else except that which their senses perceive—no Ishwar, no soul, and no life hereafter, that the only sensible use which this life can be made of is to make it as enjoyable as possible, that sin and virtue are mere figments of the human brain concocted to terrorize unsophisticated people and that the rules of the Shastras are merely social rules framed for ensuring temporary material well-being of the people. The rules of morality which some of them profess have really no raison-d-etre to mention. While these men of Asurik temperament might, on particular occasions, deign to offer their allegiance to a rule of morality here and a rule of morality there for the reason that the said rule serves the purpose of feeding their enjoying mood, they would not hesitate to throw it to the winds if, on the other hand it hampers the operation of their enjoying predilections. Thus the performers of regulated and non-regulated, fruitive action are both equally possessed of enjoying temperament. They are together classed as Bhogis. They have not yet awakened to the consciousness that the mundane world is in reality a place for correction of the individual soul, and only seemingly a place for his enjoyment, that the pleasures that can be snatched out of the phenomenal entities are but of a deluding nature and that the mood of enjoyment is bound to keep the possessor thereof in a state of constant discontent, on account of both subjective and objective reasons. On account of subjective reasons because human capacity to enjoy is limited and opposed to his higher nature, on account of objective reasons because the external factors are not within human control and are not on the plane of his unalloyed soul.

We are endowed with five senses, viz., those of touch, smell, taste, hearing and sight. There is in addition a sixth sense or rather the regulator of the senses which is called 'mind'. Each of the first five senses claims for itself the full fidelity to the sixth sense "mind". As mind can spouse itself to only one sense at a time it is reduced to a state of great distraction on account of the centrifugal forces excercised on it by the aforesaid five senses. By yielding themselves to, rather than trying to obtain a control over, the operation of the laws of the senses and the mind people in this world are constantly plunging themselves in to the Ocean of misery. The ranges of operation of the senses of vision, hearing, touch, smell, and taste being exceedingly limited the said senses suffer from an utter and tantalizing inadequacy to fulfil the insatiable craving of the enjoying temperament.

Objectively also we have very little control over the circumstances which we want to press to the service of our enjoying temperament. Therefore, all our arrangements for satisfying the said temperament stand in uttermost jeopardy. The degree to which our own efforts can help us in achieving the things of the mundane world is to a very great extent controlled by the inexorable law of Karma.

The "objects" and "persons" in relation to which our enjoying mood is seeking its fulfilment are themselves temporary and uncertain. In respect to persons every one is further an autocrat unto himself and the degree to which he may curb his autocracy to serve the demands of the enjoying predilections of others is necessarily very small.

On account of the above reasons and many more the catalogue of the Bhogis' unfulfilled desires is, as it always must be, a long and heart-breaking record. Furthermore, whenever any of his manifold desires happens to be fulfilled it becomes a source of the fresh series of desires only to serve as further links in the chain of bondage. The Bhogi, however, does not realise this, because his predilections for enjoyment are so strong that the tottering legs of his wiser consideration are swept off their feet. How is he going to be extricated from this miserable quagmire in which he is stuck up; obviously, not by the aid of those who are themselves in the same predicament. One lunatic cannot see the madness of another lunatic. It is only the sane man who can correctly observe the real condition of both. And in order to effectuate the cure of the lunatics the sane man must start treatment atonce. He need not begin with trying to convince the lunatics that they are not in a healthy state of mind and that in their own interest they should submit themselves to be treated. Such an attempt is bound to end in failure. On the other hand the sane man must be prepared to overcome all oppositions which would in all likelihood be offered by the lunatics, and forcibly thrust those pills into his mouth which, though bitter have got the quality of restoring him to his original health. It is quite likely that the lunatics would not relish the force used with them,—but when they are cured they will have nothing but thanks to offer to the sane man.

Actions done with a view to leading on towards deliverence from bondage.

People engaging themselves in this class of actions are those who have turned away from the path of Bhog on awakening to a sense of realisation that the gratification of the sensual desires cannot constitute the highest good of a man's life. In the struggle between themselves and the phenomenal entities to lord it over one another they were worsted all along the line. Now they have come to discover that the secret of success of the phenomenal entities in lording it over them was their own action in trying to lord it over the said entities. They, therefore, want to dissociate themselves from these entities altogether hoping that by gradual renunciation they will be able to get to some desirable situation. As compared to the condition of the enjoyer the visualised condition of the renouncer appears to them as infinitely superior because of the fascination it offers in the shape of a short of negative bliss otherwise described as freedom from miseries. The practices by which they expect to reach their goal are different according to different schools of thought. But it is not the purpose of this article to detail them here. There are a few things, however, which seem to be common to all of them. According to them, God, if one really exists, is only a means to an end. After allowing Himself to be utilised for the purpose of enabling one to attain deliverance from bondage He has to go out of the picture. Their idea is that certain practices and rules of conduct are all that are necessary to transcend the world of limitations and those conduct have no references whatsoever to the Supreme Transcendental Icon. Their activities being confined to the region of mental and bodily functions the result of which is achievable by such activities cannot but be like the results of all other phenomenal enterprises i.e., non-eternal. Says Sreemad Bhagwatam in the tenth skandha.

येऽन्येऽरविन्दाक्ष विमुक्तमानिन
स्त्वय्यस्तभावादविशुद्धबुद्धयः
आरुह्य कृच्छ्रेण परं पदं ततः
पतन्त्यधोऽनादृतयुष्मदंघ्रयः ॥

(O Lotus eyed ! those others who hold salvation in great regard and whose reason is not pure on acount of their not having resigned their Bhavas unto Thee, climb up with difficulty to the highest stage and then fall down below in so for as they suffered from want of proper regard for Thy Feet.)

The idea of Mukti so completely overpowers them that they miss sight of the fact that the promised land is not reached, and that the attainment of Mukti offers no solution of the craving of their soul. They might succeed in freeing themselves temporarily from the cycle of birth and death. But that is not what they did positively want. The sammum bonum appertains to the Transcendental Plane. It can have no reference to the phenomenal world. All the physical and mental gymnastics that can conceivably be performed in the world of phenomena are ill-fitted to overstep themselves. Just as it is impossible for a man to feel the palatable taste of sweetmeat by the efforts of his visual, aural, olfactory and dermal senses so it is impossible to have a taste of the Transcendental by means of material senses.

(To be continued)

Man and Animal.

(By Madhu Sudan Chatterjee)

Man has been defined as a rational animal. There is thus an element of rationality combined with animality in man. Man has a higher nature and a lower nature. The common characteristics of man and animal have been shown in the following sloka :

"आहार निद्रा भय मैथूनञ्च सामान्यमेतद्
पशूभिर्नराणाम्
धर्म्मोऽहि तेषामधिका विशेषो धर्म्मेण हीनाः
पशुभिः समानाः ॥

Eating, sleeping, fear and sexual intercourse—these are common to human beings and animals. Religion is the differentia of man from animal. Those who are devoid of any religious feelings are no better than animals. All men, however, are not equal. Some are savage, some are civilized; some are intelligent, some foolish; some are rich, some poor; some are high, some very low. If a close study is directed to the nature of man it is noticed that he has a body and a mind. The interests of his body require that he should have sufficient food, sufficient exercise and sufficient rest, so that his body may be in sound health to be able to function properly on the physical plane. Those, who are satisfied simply with the interests of the body, do not think it necessary to look to the higher interests of the mind Thus if a number of educated persons, with sufficient aesthetic culture, would go out to visit some beautiful natural scenery, such as a waterfall, from a long distance, by incurring heavy expenditure, rustic people of the locality, who are perhaps seeing the waterfall everyday and who do not see anything of special beauty in it, might be astonished to find that those educated persons should take so much trouble to come to their out of the way village just to have a sight of the waterfall. But one whose mind has received sufficient culture will feel altogether in a different way. But as both the mind and the body are temporary, their interests also can be only temporary. So when to persons like ourselves, who have considerd the body and the mind as everything and who will not believe in the existence of a soul which is of a permanent nature, true religionists speak about anything about the interests of the soul, naturally enough we are astonished and we, with an air of superiority, look down upon them and do not think it necessary or just to give them even a hearing to see how far their statements may be reasonable. No man can reasonably deny that the things of this world, with which we have our transactions, are not at all permanant. They are subject to birth, existence and death. The very existence of temporary things, however, suggests to a rational mind the possibility of permanent things which are existing for ever and which are not liable to be destroyed. Our scientific knowledge, derived from our experience of the things of this world are all impermanent, do not help us to have any knowledge of any eternally existing entity. So if there was a permanent Entity, (and rationally we cannot say that there is no possibility of of the existence of such an Entity), the way to know Him must be different from that for acquiring any knowledge of the limited things of this world. Here the revealed scriptures come to our help and give us assurance that God, who is the Absolute Truth, can be known, that there are those who have already known Him and that if we are fortunate enough we may also have the knowledge from them and that to know Him is essentially necessary for each one of us, as by such knowledge only we can be free from all imperfection and we can also have the life eternal which is the summum bonum of life. It is man and man alone, as distinguished from other animals, that has the power to think of this higher life, to strive for it and to be blessed with it. So those, who are simply passing the days here in eating, drinking and being merry like animals, cannot be said to be utilizing the higher possiblities of human life. The scriptures have, therefore, declared that human life is so very precious, because it is in this life that one can attain the goal who is no other than God, and one who has reached God is never in want of anything and is always in peace.

Round the Gaudiya Maths

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Prakash Aranya Maharaj :

Swamiji is propagating the doctrines of "Pure Theism" propounded by Sriman Mahaprabhu in the District of Barisal. At the request of Sj. Aswini Kumar Das Adhikari of Pinglakati he went there on January 30, from Chandpur. It is one of the important place in the District. On the following day a meeting was convened at the house of Aswini Babu in the afternoon. Swamiji and a Brahmachari of the party spoke on "Absolute Thing" and "Ekadashi".

The Harmonist

(Sree Sajjanatoshani)

VOL. XXXI. } MARCH 15, 1935 { No. 14

Sreedham Mayapur

The performance of any useful activity requires a number of definite and actual conditions. The first of these is a place. The firm earth is not only the scene of all activity but without it no form of activity would be at all possible.

It is, therefore, a fundamental instinct of the human nature that seeks to find a suitable area of the earth's surface for the place of its activities. The whole earth, one's own country, province, district, village, homestead, working desk, are in this manner interdependent territorial conditions for making our activities to be performed with advantage to ourselves.

It is not, however, possible for two persons to occupy the same plot of land for its unhampered use. This gives rise to the activity of exclusive ownership of land by individuals and communities. Independence as well as exclusiveness of the ownership of the soil is thus a fundamental condition for the adequate functioning of mankind, the nation, family and individual.

The anxiety of the Gaudiya Mission for securing a properly equipped local habitation for the headquarters of its activities can be easily understood if it is considered as being on a par with recognised requirements for the success and permanence of all movements seeking to take root in the world.

There is certainly the other side of the shield in the case of a religious movement, of its degenerating into a parochial affair if it is helped to possess its permanent headquarters in a particular country, province, district, village or building. This is bound to force upon it a number of limited local interests incompatible with the catholic nature of its activities.

The Teaching of Sree Krishna-Chaitanya is the property of all persons and countries. It may, therefore, be asked with every appearance of honest enquiry, why the Mission should have a decided preference for Sree Mayapur for the location of its permanent headquarters there. Calcutta is much better situated for the purpose of its extended activities, if the choice of a site is to be made for the purposes of the movement within the Province of Bengal. And as a matter of fact Calcutta has also been the practical headquarters of the Mission ever since its inception.

To all such proposals for the removal of the 'Parent Math' to any locality other than Sreedham Mayapur there are both rational as well as super-rational objections. Sreedham Mayapur is the Birth-place of Sree Krishna-Chaitanya. No person can have more than one birth-place. Nature has, therefore, supplied an indisputable cause for preferring the said place of all others for the location of the 'Parent Math' of the Mission for the propagation of the teaching of the Master. There would then be no jealousies or questions of local preference of one spot over another. This is essential for securing the unity of the territorial organisation of the movement.

But this is nevertheless not the real reason for the choice of Sreedham Mayapur as the head-quarters of the Gaudiya Mission. This choice is in direct conformity with the catholic doctrine of Sree Krishna-Chaitanya which knows no limits of mundane time and space for the natural functioning of our unalloyed spiritual entities.

In the ordinary affairs of life a certain appearance of unity is brought about for the time being by the manipulation of incompatible conditions. The craze for such superficial unity is not without its dangers and unwholesomenesses. But we should not also ignore its pointing to a spiritual necessity of our nature, although it does not go sufficiently deep into its solution, being satisfied with certain half-way mundane values which are necessarily unwholesome from the point of view of the need of our souls.

The worship of God is an affair of the soul. In the conditioned state a person is not privileged to have access to the conditions of his spiritual function. He is hampered by the opposition of his instrumentals and environment. It is in the power of God to enable him to find the spiritual use of these instrumentals and environment by manifesting His Descent to the plane of his fettered vision.

This ensures the spiritual quality of any worship that it is possible to offer in this world. It is necessary to serve God as the Unalloyed Indivisible Predominating Plenary Cognition. It is not possible to serve Him by the resources of our mind and body nor on the planes of our polluted physical and mental existence. But what are we to do then with our bodies and minds unless God is pleased to provide them with a function in the interest of our souls by manifesting His Descent to the plane of our mundane existence ?

Sreedham Nabadwip is the plane of our spiritual existence manifesting her descent with God when He makes His Appearance in this world, as the inseparable Transcendental Abode of the Divinity. Transcendental spiritual territoriality is pleased to come within the reach of our instrumentls of service for enabling them to have a spiritual function. It then becomes possible and a duty to our souls to decorate the spiritual realm with the resources of our mundane existence.

The object of worship which is offered by the body and mind is not to improve the conditions of mundane existence. Its object is to enable us to transcend the limitations and unwholesomenesses of mundane existence by deflecting all our activities towards the descended Divinity who accommodates every thing. Sreedham Mayapur is the descended Divine Realm. The Gaudiya Mission is seeking to divert the territorial ambitions of mankind towards the service of Sreedham Mayapur by all the resources of mundane civilization. The Gaudiya Math of Calcutta and the branch Maths of the Mission all over the world have their spiritual justification to territorial existence as training centres for the service of Sreedham Mayapur.

His Excellency Sir John Anderson has rightly gauged the innermost depths of the spiritual heart of the followers of Mahaprabhu Sree Krishna-Chaitanya by his kind visit to Sreedham Mayapur in the midst of the pressing calls of the mundane territorial interests of the nation. The Indians would be fully satisfied if their spiritual heritage is approached with an enlightened interest by the other nations of the world. They stand for the assertion of the spiritual interests of mankind which are absolutely identical and can alone provide the real common plank of lasting mutual goodwill and co-operation.

Aprakrita Vyasa-Puja

(A lecture delivered by Srimad Bhakti Saranga Goswami at Math premises in New Delhi, at a meeting held on the memorable occasion of Sree Vyasa-Puja on 23. 2. 35.)

To-day is the most auspicious and propitious Vyasa-Puja day—the Holy day when my Divine Master—Paramahamsa Sree Srimad Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Thakur, out of causeless mercy, manifested His august Advent in Purusottamdham, like the moon from the Ocean, to tread upon this terrafirma for the deliverance of fallen souls, so far as I can realize, and for other valid reasons best known to Himself and His most beloved devotees. I bow down to this Holy day which rotates every year to bless me and the world. Let me piteously pray, therefore, to this auspicious moment with folded hands and bended knees that I may not for a moment stray from His Divine Holy Feet. Let us also try to delineate the subject of to-day—Vyasa-Puja—for the satisfaction of all good souls.

नारायणं नमस्कृत्य नरञ्चैव नरोत्तम्।
देवीं सरस्वतीं व्यासं ततो जयमुदीरयेत्॥

The Divine Saraswati, or the channel of the revealed transcendental sound, first came out of the holy lips of Narayana and flowed through the ears of Brahma, Narada and Vyasa who embodied in his writings the visualized revealed transcendental sound and in disciplic order has now made his appearance as our Mahanta Guru or the spiritual authoritative guide.

वागीशा यस्य वदने लक्ष्मी यस्य च वक्षसि।
यस्यास्ते हृदये सम्विद् तं नृसिंहमहं भजे॥

We need not seek to include spirit and matter into a common category or profess compatibility of the spiritual with the mundane. The spirit has a genius peculiarly its own which runs as an under-current in all its activities both in the spiritual and mundane worlds, and has a tendency to reveal the truth to all submissive souls; contrary to it would be against the truth, cantankerous, and prove intransigent to all spiritual thoughts.

It must borne in mind that Gurupadpadma ever remains fully in Vaikuntha transcending all regions of mental speculations, all mundane references and relativities, though He manifests Himself to us inhabiting this mundane world. He maintains in tact His unconditional immunity from all regulative principles.

We must not anthropomorphise the limited unwholesome conceptions of this world to the Divine Personality, or apotheosise the possession of His Divine Power by mortal men. There is no worse blasphemy against Gurupadpadma than to suppose that He is anything mundane, and such attempt will not lead us to the thresh-hold of the Spiritual kingdom, nor enable us to touch the fringe of His Divine Holy Feet Who wholly transcends all limiting attempts.

Those who possess the knowledge of the soul offer their eternal worship to the Divine Person Who has no deviated standpoint from the Absolute Who is Eternal, Real, Indivisible, Full-existence, Full-cognition, Full-bliss having His Eternal Name, Form, Quality, distinctive servitors—by discarding all impurities of this mundane world.

All self-realised souls, all Absolute-realised souls, all transparently genuine Gurus have a harmonius tone in their exposition of Absolute Truth. They do not differ in opinion in this effect. In Absolute cognition there is no mundane dualistic cognition.

'द्वै ते भद्राभद्र ज्ञान, सब 'मनोधर्म्म'।
'एइ भाल, एइ मन्द,—एइ सब 'भ्रम' ॥

The apprehension of good and evil in the dualistic state is wholly a speculation of the mind. This is good, this is evil,—all such knowledge is error.

There is an eternal difference between "Shalagram" and ordinary pieces of stone, Ganges water and ordinary water, Transcendental Sound and mundane sound, Gurupadpadma and mortal men. It is unjustifiable to attempt a reconciliation of the eternal difference that separates the unspiritual realisation from the spiritual, the pure cognition of the soul from the erroneous thinking of the non-soul, intuition of the soul from the intuition of the mind. Such an attempt is opposed to the principle of service of the Divinity.

Sree Gurupadpadma must not be considered as a fragmentary part of any mundane entity or a mortal man. Though He so appears to geocentric speculations that move within the four walls of this world of three dimensions. He is the One Indivisible Object of worship—the Predominated Half of the Absolute—the Absolute Counter-Whole of the Predominating Integer.

He is the undivided Counter Whole as representative of the Eternal Divine Line of blissful preceptors—the line of the princes of the greatest messengers of the spiritual world—of the most beloved agents and couriers of the All-love Who seek to establish all relations of love and to regulate all our non-loving principles.

Love craves communion with the beloved. Wherever there is love, it seeks to find its function with the beloved. God is All-love and He loves us though we have forgotten to love Him. The moment we look back to Him, we feel His love. The harmonising Energy of the All-love can shower His Blessings Personally or through His agents who are transparent and identical with Himself. Such an agent is the predominated aspect of the Absolute as the Associated Counter-Whole of the Predominating Integer, and has no deviated standpoint from the Absolute Personality. Such a Mahanta Guru deserves our eternal homage with eternal love.

Puja means a reverential or confidential service of the object of worship through words, body and mind, which culminate in the eternal servitude or love.

Now I think we have got a rough idea of what Vyas-Puja is, but through our ill-luck we sometimes meet with opaque and translucent so-called preceptors instead of transparent genuine preceptors.

Opaque Gurus or akrmi-gurus pocket our puja or love intended for the One Who is the Fountainhead and Main-stay of all aspects eternal love—to whom our love is eternally due, and cogs us to fall into the snares of Maya, as he has other ulterior selfish motives, like Shukracharyya, to dissuade us from having a sure access to the transcendental treasures.

He, instead of being 'guru', becomes 'laghu' (less mighty) i. e. order-supplier of our mundane desires who target the entity of Godhead in the same category with themselves. Their school-boyish attempts to enjoy this world or to run after phantasmagoria or will-o-the-wisps can be discerned by translucent preceptors or jnani-gurus, as they are punished by the very fading things they dote on.

Translucent preceptors or jnani-gurus, though glowing and tempting with their deep mundane wisdom, again mislead us. All that glitters is not gold. Want of knowledge is much better than knowledge abused ; and to live and die the poorest idiot is more desirable than to possess knowledge without applying it to the service of the Absolute Personality.

Knowledge without practice in proper field is much worse than vain and insignificant. It is a bane and a curse. It renders those who possess it more despicable and vile ; it increases guilt and will sink us into the deepest misery.

Translucent guru impedes our impressions of "Sachchidananda" of the Eternity, Full Knowledge and Incessant Bliss of the All-love, as they urge us to merge in the void of conception or perception or into the being of God, by salvation where we want to annihilate our desires and even want to become idential with the object of worship thereby to attain full impersonality, killing love once for all.

The distinction between the subjective and the objective is lost by their philosophy and so such Guru-Puja is intended to killing one's own self, as the preceptor as well as the Personality of Godhead all merge in one mental position where their different entities are not traceable. They profess with the lip that they admit Gurupadpadma and are followers of Vyasa (?), but as a matter of fact they welcome Gurudeva simply to kill him (?), as they disown the eternal existence of His Personality.

The assertive statements of opaque gurus may be congenial to a particular locality and fulfil a temporal purpose for the time being, but will prove futile when compared with the interest of the Absolute.

Beware of these unscrupulous and selfish pseudo-gurus masquerading as members of a religious order, who swarm in this world to misguide the people.

True genuine preceptors are transparent Agents of the Absolute and do neither misappropriate anything offered to them nor usurp the throne of their Eternal Master. There is no strife between them. They are eternally and inseparably connected with the irresistible course of the Divine Saraswati flowing on majestically from the Divine Lips of Nrisinhaji down to us, to fertilize the transcendental soil and bless the world.

Your Divine Grace,

I bow down my head to the Divine Saraswati. We are no doubt eligible to receive Your mercy, if we, in our prayer, show a clean heart free from all dirts of selfish or personal desires, in the shape of unconditional surrender which will invoke you to condescend to our prayer and inundate our afflicted heart and pacify the turmoil arising out of our baneful activities.

Your Divine Grace has a burning desire to lead us to the ken of Inspired Truths revealed by the Vedas and to concentrate our scattered activities in the Personal Absolute. Thou hast placed before us a comparative chart of time, space and entity, and decidedly convinced us that in the eternal spiritual kingdom of infinite dimension the Indivisible Cognitive Principle is Nanda Nandana—the Son of the Chief of Braja in Braja, and that our eternal function is to associate ourselves with Him to sever our connection with anything temporal to dispel all darkness of ignorance as well as to develop and progress with our inherent transcendental entheasm.

We are to go back to God and back to our eternal Home where there is no conflicting discord due to our mental rivalries which we cannot escape in this world on account of our different interests. In Goloka all of us have got but one interest one aim and object i. e., the service of the Supreme Lord in our different capacities under the revered direction of Gurupadpadma.

My Divine Master,

Your soul-stirring logos is a home-thurst and deadly weapon to do away with the erroneous and evil ideas of the elevationists and salvationists and is a blissful source of Divine deep wisdom dispelling the dirts of dormant and conditioned souls.

Like dwarfs aspiring after the moon I feel ashamed to speak highly of Your Divine Grace, or magnifiy or glorify Your Divine Holy Feet, as no amount of eulogy or encomium, praise or extolment can commend or enhance the beauty of Your Divine Holy Feet. May Thou be pleased to consider me a fragmentary part of the dust of your Divine Holy Feet.

The Gaudiya Catechism

1. Q. I have come to you to enquire about the Truth. I do not know what is the goal of my life or the means to my goal. I am not in a position to put my questions in the proper form. Kindly tell me what you consider to be necessary for me to know for this purpose. May I be permitted to ask any questions that may also occur to me ?

Ans. Krishna is Merciful to you. The Truth is not unknown to you. It is the nature of a pure soul who is willing to serve Godhead to ask these questions for strengthening his faith. As you are willing to learn the Truth for the purpose of serving Him in your life, Krishna will be pleased if I try to serve you in this matter.

2. Q. You have mercifully drawn me to your feet for my good. I, indeed, possess a measure of such so-called wisdom that is necessary for living among the people of this world. I hold such wisdom to be the Truth. I now find that I have wasted my life in the pursuit of such evil objects, I feel that I am wholly ignorant of my duty. I submit myself to your feet and prey to be instructed about my real duty.

Ans. The Mercy of Krishna will suggest to you the proper line of enquiry and also the answers to your questions.

3. Q. May I ask a few questions as I wish to receive their real answers from you? Who am I? Why am I afflicted with the threefold misery from accidents, from other sentient beings and from myself? In what way I can be really benefited?

Ans. I shall try to answer your questions one by one. You are a soul (jiva).

4. Q. What is a soul?

Ans. You will be able to avoid misunderstanding if I tell you in the first place what the soul is not. The soul is not this physical body which is constituted of insentient matter. He is also not the subtle material body that you possess, consisting of your mind, faculty of judgment (buddhi) and your present egoistic consciousness (ahamkara).

5. Q. Is my soul wholly unconnected with these two bodies?

Ans. Your soul does not consist of your material bodies. They bind your soul to this mortal existence. You are also not the Absolute, but a subservient of the Absolute Person Krishna. Your present material bodies prevent your soul from all access to the Presence of Krishna.

6. Q. Am I separate from Krishna?

Ans. You are related to Krishna as a ray emanating from a portion of the sun is related to the undivided entity of the sun. Or, you may be compared to one of the infinity of sparks sent up by the countless tongues of a blazing fire, while Krishna may be compared to the undivided substratum of fire whose power is manifested in the form of the vast conflagration.

7. Q. Do I exist for a time or for eternity?

Ans. The Absolute exists eternally. You are a manifest particle of the essence of the Power of the Absolute on the eternal plane. As such you are also eternal. You are an eternal subservient of the Absolute, appearing in an intermediate position between the eternal and temporary planes of existence.

8. Q. What are the ultimate categories?

Ans. The Absolute Person Krishna and His Power in three positions.

9. Q. What are the three positions of Krishna's Power?

Ans. Krishna exists in four forms, viz., His Own Form, expansions of His Own Form, Forms that are of the essence of His Own Form and those that are not of the essence of His Own Form. These four forms appear in three distinct positions. The first is distinct from the second and the third and the fourth are again distinct from the two former. The Power of Krishna displays three distinct positions corresponding to these different Forms of Krishna. The three positions of Power are three different forms of One Power. These powers are known as (1) Krishna's Own Power, corresponding to the first and second Forms of Krishna, (2) the Intermediate Power corresponding to the third Form of Krishna, and (3) the external power corresponding to the fourth Form of Krishna. The jiva is an infinitesimal particle of Power in the intermediate position (tatastha sakti).

10. Q. Why am I afflicted with the three miseries ?

Ans. The jiva, due to his intermediate position, is liable to forget Krishna. This happens when he turns his face towards the external power of Krishna. The tendency of this aversion to or turning way from Krishna is inherent in the jiva in his eternal position. When the jiva turns his face towards the external power he finds himself in this mundane realm. His miseries are due to his submission to the external power who makes him totally forget his own nature and to entertain the delusion that he, and not Krishna, is the master of the external power.

11. Q. Is fear of punishment helpful to the soul of the jiva ?

Ans. The sense of fear comes upon the jiva only when he turns his face towards the external power. It is due to the reversal of his relationship with Krishna. It is this fear of punishment that finds its appropriate plane in this worldly sojourn. The external power playing upon the fears and hopes of the jiva sometimes elevates her victim to heaven and sometimes hurls him headlong into the lowest abyss of hell. The jiva is not allowed to have a moment's safe and secure position. His condition has very aptly been compared to that of criminals in ancient times who were punished by being held forcibly under water and brought up to the surface for short intervals to prevent death by suffocation. But the jiva does not suspect that the external power is deluding him in this manner. On the contrary he trusts in her promises to give him domination over the world.

12. Q. How can the jiva get rid of his delusion ?

Ans. The jiva can be relieved of the miseries of his worldly sojourn only if his mind is turned towards Krishna by the mercy of sadhus and the Shastras. As soon as the jiva turns his face towards Krishna, the external power ceases to have any control over him. So long as the jiva agrees to be deluded by the external power he remains without any recollection of Krishna. Krishna out of His Mercy manifests Himself to jivas in His three Forms of (1) the Veda fully explained in the Srimad Bhagavata, (2) the spiritual preceptor who is the best-beloved of His servitors, and (3) as the Internal Divine Guide. The jiva is enabled with the help of these Divine agencies to realise the fact that Krishna is his Lord and Saviour.

13. Q. In what way does the Veda enable us to recollect Krishna ?

Ans. The Veda tells us (1) about Krishna as the object of our relationships, (2) about the natural function of our souls and (3) also about the final desideratum. Krishna is the Object of all our relationships. Bhakti or spiritual service of Krishna is the means of realising this eternal relationship. Prema or love for Krishna is the desired object to be gained by the realised service of Krishna. The treasure of love for Krishna is the summum bonum. By tasting love for Krishna we realise our highest bliss, and incidentally get rid of the miseries of our worldly sojourn for good.

14. Q. Is Krishna apart and different from all other entities ?

Ans. This phenomenal world as well as the transcendental world are the transformations of the Power of Krishna.

15. Q. What is Krishna Himself ?

Ans. Krishna is the Ultimate Reality. He is non-bifurcate Knowledge. He is the Son of the Chief of the Realm of Braja, His Eternal Abode. He is the beginning of all things, the Integer of Whom everything else is only a fractional part, the Rarest of all rare jewels of a Budding Youth. Krishna has a Body of pure consciousness and perfect bliss. He is the Support of everything and the Lord of all entities. Krishna is Godhead Himself. He is the same as Govinda Whose Eternal Realm of of Goloka is full of all Beauty.

16. Q. Why is Godhead not realised as Krishna by all seekers of the Absolute ?

Ans. There are three possible methods of approaching the Absolute viz. those of undifferentiated knowledge, artificial concentration of consciousness and unalloyed service. Godhead manifests Himself as Brahman, Paramatman, and Bhagawan respectively to the followers of the above methods of search.

17. Q. Are the three manifestations of the Divinity distinct from one another ?

Ans. The manifestation of Godhead as Brahman is non-designative. Brahman has no distinctive features. Brahman is really the majestic Glow of the Body of Godhead, even as the Sun appears to be a ball of light to the eye of flesh. Those, who seek for the Absolute Reality through knowledge devoid of all distinctive realisation, target Him as Brahman devoid of all distinctive features. While to those who seek for the Ultimate Principle by the progress of astanga yoga (artificial inhibition of activities) realise Him in their hearts as the Supreme Soul indwelling the souls of all entities of this world. Those who seek Him by the method of unalloyed spiritual service realise Him as Bhagawan i.e. the Divine Person in Whom the six Divine Prerogatives have their perfect existence. Paramatman is only a Divine Portion of Krishna.

18. Q. What is the complete realisation of Bhagawan ?

Ans. The full realisation of Godhead is attained through spiritual service. His Body is One. But there is an infinity of Divine Forms that are also His Own Bodies. The Forms of Krishna are broadly divisible into three categories viz., (1) Swayamrupa i.e. the Form that is Himself, (2) those Forms that are different from the Form in Himself, but are identical with Him in essence (tadekatmarupa), and (3) those Forms that are permeated with Divine Power (avesharupa). The Form, Who is the expansion of the activity of Swayamrupa, is known as Sree Balarama. The same Balarama has his fourfold forms of Majestic manifestations. These in their turn have also their respective forms of expanded activity. There is a derivative series of the fourfold covering forms for secondary Divine activity with their respective forms for the expanded activities of each of them. There are also other forms that are known as Swamsha or Portions of the Divinity's Own Form. The Swamsha Forms are again of two kinds viz. (1) transcendental Support and Ruler of phenomenal Nature, and (2) various Descents (avataras) as Protectors of the sadhus and Destroyers of the wicked. Among the Avataras the foremost are the three Purusha Avataras. Sankarshana-Balarama, the second Person of the fourfold primary expansion, is the direct wielder of power for the creation of the spiritual and mundane worlds. He makes manifest the spiritual realm, which is uncreated and eternal, through the Spiritual Divine Power. He creates the order of mundane worlds by the external power. Forms permeated with Divine Power are again divisible into primary and secondary forms. Such is the brief outline of the scriptural account of Krishna as the Object of all relationship.

19. Q. Are there other worlds besides the world that we experience ?

Ans. Material space has its spiritual counterpart in the Realm of the Absolute. That space is called Parabyoma. In Parabyoma the innermost sphere is Goloka-Vrindavana. Goloka-Vrindavana is the Eternal Abode of Sree Krishna. Within Parabyoma, below the Realm of Krishna is the Realm of Vishnu. In this lower sphere of Parabyoma there are an infinity of Vaikunthas each of which is the realm of one of the infinity of Divine Forms of Sree Narayana, the Lord of Parabyoma. Outside Parabyoma is the realm of Maya or this mundane world. The spiritual stream of the Biraja flows between the Realm of the Absolute and this mundane world, The mundane realm is also infinite and passes the conception of jiva. The Realm of the Absolute is the manifestation of three quarters of the Glories of Krishna and the infinitude of this phenomenal world displays only a quarter of His Glories.

20. Q. How are we to practise our relationships with Krishna ?

Ans. Krishna is one without a second. He is non-bifurcate Knowledge. He is served by His Power, although the two are also really one. For the purpose of His Activities, in reciprocity with His Power, Krishna expands Himself into His Own Plenary and His dissociated portions. His Divine Portions have already been mentioned. They are distinct from the jivas who are His dissociated portions. The Divine Portions are Possessors of power. Jivas belong to the category of power. Jivas are again divided into those that are eternally free and those that are eternally fettered. The eternally fettered are afflicted with the triple misery on account of their aversion to Krishna which is ingrained in their nature. These fettered souls can be rescued from the grip of the deluding power by the mercy of sadhus. By the influence of the instructions of the sadhus the fattered souls may obtain inclination for the pure service of Krishna and is thereby enabled to come to the presence of Krishna where the power of delusion can never abide. The practice of the willing service of Krishna can alone enable us to realise our relasionships with Krishna. Good works, seeking communion by inhibition of activities, cultivation of undifferentiated knowledge have their values as auxiliaries of the willing service of Krishna. The efficacy of these other methods in themselves is very slight. They cannot yield any real benefit independently of the service of Krishna. It is never possible to get rid of delusion except by the service of Krishna. One's judgment cannot really be pure unless it is purified by the relationship of service with Krishna. Krishna is like the Sun. The deluding power is like darkness. Wherever there is Krishna there is no jurisdiction of the deluding power. If the fettered soul sincerely approaches Krishna, even only once, with the prayer to be His, Krishna forthwith delivers him from the bondage of the deluding power.

21. Q. Can also those, who serve Krishna for gaining some worldly object, be delivered from the bondage of Maya by such service ?

Ans. Krishna takes pity on those who serve Him for gaining any worldly purpose. Krishna, by the power of His service, redeems such persons from their addiction to worldliness and enables them to taste the superior excellence of His service.

22. Q. Why does not every person pray for the service of Krishna as it appears to be so very easy to gain and so desirable in every way ?

Ans. It is very rarely, indeed, that a person is redeemed from the bondage of the world. Such chance is like that of a log of wood, floating down a mighty stream, being washed up on the dry bank. It is only when through some rare good fortune one's addiction to worldliness is wearing off that a person has a chance of being attracted towards Krishna by association with His pure devotees. Association with sadhus thus offers the only chance for the redemption of conditioned souls.

23. Q. Are there grades among the devotees of Krishna ?

Ans. Any person, in whom the settled conviction of the all-sufficiency of the service of Krishna has been aroused, becomes thereby eligible for the attainment of His service. The servants of Krishna are graded into the best, the superior and the junior servitors in accordance with the quality of one's faith. The best are those who possess firm faith and are adepts in scriptural knowledge and argument. Such a person is the saviour of conditioned souls. The superior grade of devotees are not aware of scriptural arguments but are possessed of firmness of faith. Such persons are most fortunate. In the junior grade of devotees faith is still tender. But they also will gradually become the best.

24. Q. Are the devotees of Krishna virtuous ?

Ans. All the excellences of Krishna Himself are to be found in His devotees. The quality representing the distinctive nature of the devotee is, of course, his exclusive reliance upon Krishna. His other virtues are external in comparison with it. The best of these are kindness, absence of enmity, regard for the essence of truth, equal regard for everything, absence of vice, magnanimity, gentleness, moral purity, freedom from want, willingness, to do good to all, possession of the peace of the soul, exclusive reliance on Krishna, freedom from worldly desire, indifference towards worldly activity, steadiness, mastery over passions, temperance in diet, absence of excitement, readiness to honour others, absence of any desire for one's own honour, gravity, tenderness, friendliness, the possession of poetic genius, skill, taciturnity.

25. Q. What is the first step in the attainment of a life of spiritual service ?

Ans. As soon as a person surrenders himself to Krishna with perfect reliance, Krishna makes him at once similiar to Himself. This is spiritual proselytisation.

26. Q. How should a person himself after proselytisation, for perfecting his devotion ?

Ans. The object of practising the service of Krishna as means to the end is the attainment of love for Krishna. During the period of novitiate the process which appears as means is the end in the stage of realisation. During the period of endeavour such prescribed activity as listening, chanting, recollection, etc., of Krishna are the proper forms of the process. In respect of means love for Krishna is an accompanying manifestation.

27. Q. Is the process of service the means by which love for Krishna is realised ?

Ans. Love for Krishna cannot be realised by any other means than itself. It is eternally self-realised. The means in this case, such as the acts of listening, etc., are also eternally self-relised processes that appear in the pure spiritual essence of the soul in the form of means to the end.

28. Q. Are there varieties of the practice of Bhakti as means ?

Ans. The practice of Bhakti as means is of two kinds viz. (1) practice of service by the method of obedience to the injunctions of the Shastras and (2) practice of Bhakti in pursuance of spontaneous liking.

29. Q. What is the nature of the practice of Bhakti in obedience to the rules of the Shastras ?

Ans. This course is followed by persons who have no spontaneous liking for the service of Krishna. They do so through their sense of duty. The forms of such regulated service of Krishna are numerous. I shall briefly indicate them. Taking refuge at the feet of the Guru, initiation, service of Guru, learning from him about the real function of the soul and practising loyal enquiry about the same, to follow the path of the sadhus, to give up one's own enjoyments for pleasing Krishna, to reside in a place sanctified by its association with Krishna, to accept the minimum that is necessary for maintenance of life, to observe the fast on the eleventh day of the lunar month which is the Lord's day, to reverence holy trees e.g. emblic myrobalan the cow, the Brahmanas and the Vaishnavas. These ten constitute the first steps on the path of the practice of Bhakti as means. In addition to these the following are negative helps. To avoid offences in regard to service and also those regarding the Name, to avoid spiritual communion with those who are opposed to the service of the Absolute, not to entertain numerous disciples, to avoid partial study and exposition of many books, not to be elated or depressed by profit or gain, not to be subject to grief, etc., not to condemn other gods or Shastras, not to listen to calumnies against Vishnu and Vaishnavas, not to listen to talks bearing on domestic life for the gratification of the sexual appetites of man and woman, not to cause any anxiety to any living thing. To the above twenty are to be added forty-four more varieties of service which are as follows. Listening, chanting, recollecting, worshipping, praising, obeying, serving, practising, friendship, surrendering oneself, dancing before the Sree Vigraha, singing confessing, prostrating oneself, standing up to meet Godhead and His devotees when they are found coming towords oneself, to follow Godhead and His devotees when they move away from oneself, to frequent holy places and temples of Godhead, to perform circumambulation, to recite hymns of praise, to practise mental recital, to perform the congregational chant, to accept the odour of incense and garlands offered to Godhead, to honour the great favour in the form of the remains of the Lord's food, to witness the light-waving service, to view the Sree Murti, to offer objects loved by oneself to Godhead to meditate, to serve His Own (which includes serving the tulasi etc., serving the Vaishnavas, residing at Mathura and tasting the sweetness of the narrative of the Bhagavata), to exert oneself without stint for the sake of Krishna, to expect His Mercy, to perform the festivities of His Nativity, etc., in the company of the devotees, to practise submission in every way, to observe the prescribed vows in regard to the month of Kartika and on other similar occasions, to wear the symbols of a Vaishnava, to wear the Letters of the Name of Hari, to wear the remains of the Lord's offerings, to drink the nectar touched by the Lord's Feet. The greatest emphasis is laid upon the following five practices which are repeated for this purpose, viz. association with sadhus, chanting of the name, listening to the Bhagabata, residing at Mathura and worshipping Sree Murti with faith.

30. Q. Are all these obligatory on every person ?

Ans. There are some who practise only a single form, while there are others who practise many of the forms. The growing tide of love is fostered by constant practice. Each item of these practices has to be performed in its distinct form by the complete employment of one's body, senses and inner faculties. A person, who worships Krishna by giving up the pursuit of the pleasures of his senses in obedience to the injunctions of the Shastras, is under no obligation to serve the devas, rishis and pitris. Those who serve the Feet of Krishna by giving up the prescribed methods have also never any inclination of committing offences that are forbidden by the rules of the Shastras. If such offence makes its appearance unconsciously to the devotee of Krishna, Krishna Himself purifies him from all defilement without subjecting him to any penitential expiation. Knowledge, renunciation, etc., are never constituent parts of Bhakti. Freedom from malice, perfect control over the senses and regularity in the performance of one's duty dog the steps of the devotee of Krishna.

31. Q. What is the practice of Bhakti as means by spontaneous liking ?

Ans. The Bhakti that is identical with spontaneous love is to be found as its source only in the denizens of Braja. Such Bhakti is termed Ragatmika. The Bhakti of those who serve the denizens of Braja is called Raganuga. Love's own form may be described as concentrated longing towards the Object of Love. Constant attachment to the Object of love is its accompanying characteristic. The practice of Raganuga Bhakti is twofold. In its outward form it consists of listening and chanting. These are prescribed by means of the external (sadhaka) body. The inner practice consists of the service of Krishna in Braja night and day by one's realised spiritual body in one's pure mind. Raganuga Bhakti is practised in four loving moods viz. those of servant, friend, parents and consort. The particular mood that is followed by any person is in accordance with his own eternal natural disposition. A person who practices Raganuga Bhakti in this pure manner is awarded by the manifestation of love to the Feet of Krishna.

32. Q. What is the need of the practice of Bhakti as means ?

Ans. The need for the practice of Bhakti is attainment of love for Krishna. When attachment to Krishna becomes concentrated it is called Prema or love. It is also called the permanent loving state.

33. Q. What are the characteristics of the tendency to love ?

Ans. Bhava or the pre-condition for love has been defined by an analogy. It is like a ray of the sun of love. It is pure liking which makes one conscious of a great softness and tenderness and tends to remove all roughness of the cognising function.

34. Q. What are the characteristics of love ?

Ans. When Bhava, after making the seat of consciousness perfectly soft and smooth, manifests an extreme personal affinity with the Absolute and itself takes the form of its concentrated quality, such liking is called love.

35. Q. By what progressive development is the state of love realised ?

Ans. If by some undefinable good fortune any jiva experiences firm and natural faith for the service of the Absolute, such a person is thereby impelled to practise association with sadhus. By such association he has the opportunity of practising listening and chanting the Word. By such practices as means all undesirable hankerings gradually subside. On the complete subsidence of all evil desire Bhakti acquires the quality of constancy. Constancy produces in its turn liking for listening, etc. From growing liking for the practice of Bhakti arises exuberance of attachment. From intense attachment the seed of liking for Krishna germinates in the seat of consciousness. When this liking is condensed it is designated Prema or love. This love, wherein abides all perfect bliss, is the need of our souls.

36. Q. How is it possible to recognise a person who loves Krishna ?

Ans. Even the wise cannot fathom the words, activities and attitudes of a person in whose consciousness love of Krishna manifests itself. It is also not possible to describe the Mercy of Godhead in any explicit form.

God as Foster Son

Published in July. 90

The world has been made acquainted with the idea of the Sonhood of Godhead by the followers of Christ. The Bhagavata has gone a step further in singing the superior mellowness of the services of the Divine Foster-Mother Sree Yasoda to her Foster-Son Sree Krishna. Sree Yasoda is higher in the scale of loving servitorship of Sree Krishna than Sree Devaki, the legitimate mother of the Lord. The love of Sree Yasoda is fully disinterested. It is all-absorbing. She has no legitimate hold on the affections of her Divine Child. But she is wholly unaware of this. The Bhagavata has a decided partiality for this foster conception of service.

The episode of Sree Nityananda and Sree Malini Devi is another instance in point. The world has heard of the name of Hadai Pandit and Padmavati, the legitimate parents of Sree Nityananda. There is hardly a more attractive personality than that of mother Padmavati. She has no hesitation to surrender her son to the call of an ascetic in obedience to the teaching of the Scriptures. Thakur Vrindavanadasa refers to her conduct with the greatest restraint. But everybody can see through his silence the extraordinary personality of 'the mother of the world'.

But what about Sree Malini Devi ? Everything seems to be against any possible appreciation of her apparently strange conduct in tending and feeding, without the least concern for the opinion of the world, her Divine Foster Child Sree Nityanda Who was to all beholders a middle-aged Person. Let us try to place this episode before the reader in the words of Thakur Vrindavanadasa to whom Sree Nityananda was all-in-all. The following is the literal rendering of the account penned by Thakur Vrindavanadasa in the eighth chapter of the Madhya Khanda of his Sree Chaitanya Bhagavata (verses 6-22).

"Nityananda put up in the home of Sreebas. His mood was constantly that of a child, and no other mood showed itself. He did not help himself to his food with his own hands. Malini fed him like her little son. The loyal matron was aware of the nature of Nityananda. She served Nityananda, as the mother serves her son. One day the Lord was talking to Sreebas about Krishna. Lord Viswambhar put this test to the Pandit: "Why do you keep this Avadhut (super-ascetic) always in the family ? Nobody knows his caste or family. I must say that you are too generous. If you care to save your social and family prestige you should forthwith get rid of this Avadhut."

Sreebas Pandit smiled and said, "Lord, it is not meet that Thou do'st put me to this test. He who serves Thee but for a day is my life. Nityananda is Thy Own Body,—this I do know. Even if Nityananda assorts with casteless harlots, takes to drink, if he destroys my caste, life, wealth, there would still be no other feeling towards him in my mind. Indeed, it is the very truth that I am telling Thee."

"No sooner did the Lord hear these words from the lips of Sreebas than with a thundering ejaculatian of joy He climbed to his bosom. "Hark thee, Pandit Sreebas, what was it that thou didst say ? Do'st thou, indeed, possess such faith in Nityananda ? Thou hast found out Nityananda whom I so jealously hide from the view of every one ! I am giving thee My Boon, as I am well pleased with thee : "Even if Lakshmi herself has to beg from city to city there would still be no poverty in thy house. Even the cats and dogs of thy household will have unshaken faith in me. I make over Nityananda wholly to thy charge. May thou restrain him in every way."

In speculating about the Personality of the Absolute it is inevitable for a mortal to fall into opposite errors. It would be ridiculous to postulate either mundane morality or mundane immorality of the Absolute. That which is the very stuff of all existence is necessarily incapacle of polluting or further purifying anything. The touch of the body if another person is the most intimate and pure form of service or otherwise it is an indecency. The private service is not condemned, but the indecency is never tolerated. It should not be very difficult to ascertain the reason of making this apparently un-called-for difference in regard to the same activity. The nudists are insisting on a kind of a natural right of every man and woman to expose their bodies without being hampered by any rule of propriety.

It is not, however, the lesson of the nudist, however plausible the same may appear to be to its advocates, that it was the intention of Sree Nityananda to teach to his contemporaries by going about naked, in the mood of a little child, in the court-yard of the home of of Sreebas Pandit and by receiving the maternal caresses of Sree Malini Devi. Sree Gaursundar's words of advice to Sreebas and his reply show that Sreebas's conduct was deliberate and should dispose of any lingering doubts on the nature of his attitude in this matter Sree Gaursundar put the worldly point of view. He said in effect that it was an offence against Society as well against his family to allow the unknown stranger such indecent facilities of intercourse with the ladies of the family.

The answer of Sreebas Pandit was, indeed, extraordinary. Instead of saying that Sree Nityananda would never abuse the confidence that had been placed in him, Sreebas gave it out that he was prepared to be ruined in all those ways that were suggested by the remarks of Sree Goursuudar rather than give up his unconditional faith in Sree Nityananda. This answer, be it noted, met with the full approval of Sree Gaursundar Himself.

The logic of Sreebas's reply should impress any person who is prepared to obtain the solution of the momentous issues raised by the episode. It is necessary to observe the conventional decencies of family and social life for avoiding the horrors of unprincipled sexuality. In this respect man is not to be supposed to be on a level with lower animals, as seems to be the idea of a section of those who advocate nudity at all costs. Man can never be callous to the problem of sexual reserve, without forfeiting his higher prerogative. This is in accordance with the actual facts of our universal experience. It is necessary to strive for periodical adjustments to the growing needs of social and domestic life. But a mere retrograde policy is a denial of the reality as well as the possibility of progress. The element of truth that is to be found in the conventions of civilized society need not be ignored on account of the perception of their mere insufficiency.

It is nevertheless imperative on every one of us to seek for further light in a non-contentious spirit. What is the purpose of the restraints that have been put upon sexual intercourse in the family and in society? Is it only for avoiding excess and inevitable quarrels? This view cannot supply the positive reply to the contentions of the nudist. It makes the issue only a question of difference of choice of methods for arriving at a common end. Sree Nityananda did not go naked for opposing a salutary convention of the world.

The Absolute can be approached only by unconditional service offered by all the senses of His worshipper. The non-Absolute cannot be approached for worship. The Absolute cannot be approached at all unless He is approached by all the senses. This is the indispensable condition of all genuine worship. But the Absolute is also unapproachable by the mundane senses. What then are we to do with our mundane senses so long as they happen to be in our way? If we want to worship the Absolute at all in the conditioned state it is necessary to learn the proper method of employing our senses in the worship of the Absolute. Sree Nityananda is the Manifestive Personality of the Absolute. He is the Eternal Medium of the Appearance of the Absolute to the cognition of all souls. He has the power of relieving our mundane senses from their ineligibility of being otherwise employed for the worship of the Absolute. To confer such eligibility is the spiritual function of Sree Guru or the Saviour. Sree Malini Devi was perfectly aware of this Transcendental Nature of Sree Nityananda. Lord Nityananda bestowed on her the eligibility of serving Himself as her Son. But He was not her son by the relationship of birth. He was her Foster-Son. This made her maternal service independent of the condition of actual maternity. The function of the mother of the Servant of the Supreme Lord is even higher than that of the service of the mother of Godhead.

The body of flesh cannot be employed in the worship of the Absolute unless it is relieved of its ineligibility by the mercy of Sree Guru. If the body is not employed in the service of Godhead it is sure to be employed for the indulgence of the lusts of the flesh by being offered for the gratification of the senses of atheists. There is, however, the danger of wilful abuse of the practice. Sree Malini Devi is alone privileged to function as the foster mother of Lord Nityananda. The realisation of the nature and excellence of this positive function should effectively prevent the possibility of lending one's support to immoral and suicidal proposals in opposition to essentially fallacious mundane practices and conventions. It is possible to get rid of the obvious imperfections of the empiric moral conventions only by the realisation of the service of the Absolute by our present senses under the direction of the bona fide spiritual preceptor. It is not possible to practise the direct service of Godhead by means of mundane senses. The conditioned soul can serve by his awakened spiritual senses. Sree Malini Devi is not any conditioned soul. No conditioned soul should, therefore, try to imitate the conduct of Sree Malini Devi.

Round the Gaudiya Maths

Sree Gaudiya Math, Calcutta :

Editor reached here from Puri on February 24. Srimad Nemi Maharaj and Giri Maharaj with party reached Calcutta on March 5, per S. S. Elenga after preaching in Rangoon for over two months. The Fullmoon of the Advent of Lord Gauranga

(By Anilkanta Ganguli B.A.)

The last day of the out-going Gaura Era and its Significance : 30th Govinda corresponding to March 20, is the last day of the 448th Gaura Era. On the last day of the solar year, worldly-minded people perform pious deeds so that they may pass a happy time in heaven. Not only that, they also try to anticipate the fruits of their holy deeds by amusing themselves with various kinds of entertainments. But the servitors of the 'Gaura Era' do not seek 'Dharma', 'Artha', 'Kama' or 'Moksha'. The desire for pleasure or piety, profit or pre-eminence cannot perturb the serenity of their minds. This is the reason why they, instead of wasting their time in childish pastimes, pass this auspicious day in Divine discourses by which alone Lord Gauranga, the Father of the congregational chanting of the Holy Name, is pleased. Lord Gauranga the Supreme Divinity has manifested Himself on the mundane plane as the Holy Name Who is identical with the Holy Form, i.e., He Himself is the Holy Name. Those pure souls who incessantly sing the praise of Lord Gauranga, always live at His Lotus Feet and nowhere else. The end of the solar year draws many a sigh of disappointment from the seekers after worldly enjoyments. In sharp contrast with this, the recurrence of the 'Gaura Era', which ever heralds the Advent of the most Benign Divinity, fills the hearts of passion-less loving devotees with unmixed joy. It does not point to unfulfilled hopes, but to the clarion call 'Back to God and back to Home' and to the ceaseless march of perennial love towards the Lotus Feet of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya.

What we learn from this Adventual Fullmoon : We welcome the Advent of the Supreme Lord Gauranga Whose Advent eclipsed the fullmoon on the Eve of His Birth. Lord Gauranga is the most perfect Divinity, as in Him is displayed the Mood of "Sree Radhika" the Divine Transcendental Sweetheart, concealing the Form of Krishna, the Transcendental Divine Lover. Just as the Golden Hue of Sree Radhika (Gaura) is superimposed on the Dark Hue of Krishna, the Adventual Tithis of these Lovers 'Krishnastami' and 'Suklastami' have been joined into the Glorious Tithi of the Fullmoon to effectually disperse the accumulated gloom of all the worlds.

The Fullmoon with her silvery rays, the cuckoo with its melodious cooing, the Holy Saraswati with its soft murmur and the flower with its sweet smell, combine to reveal the transcendence of the Event through the redemptive power of the loud chanting of the 'Mahamantram' by the pure devotees singing the hallelujah in honour of the Adventual Tithi of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya, Who, in His Mercy, has given all of us, 'Kali-ridden jivas' an assured chance of tasting of the nectar of Transcendental Love.

The prediction of Thakur Vrindabana Das : Thakur Vrindabana Das is the writer of "Sri-Chaitanya-Bhagabat" in which Book he has predicted that sages, who transcend the plane of three dimensions, will on a future date make 'Nabadwipdham' or 'Sweta-dwipdham' known to the world. Only those persons whose inner eyes have been opened by the grace of Godhead can see this 'Holy Dham' and none else. Of these venerable sages of the prediction of Thakur Vrindabana Das, the first to appear was Srila Jagannath Das Babaji held in esteem to all over Gauda Mandal, Kshetra Mandal, and Vrajamandal, and the second is Srila Bhakti Vinode Thakur who—as the archetype of Bhagirath brought down to the earth the Ganges of pure devotion.

The years 400, 404, 408 and 448 of the Gaura Era have definite connection with the respective services rendered by those great seers for bringing about the re-appearance of Sreedham.

400 Gaura Era : In this year Srila Bhakti Vinode Thakur received a Divine Injunction to the effect that Sree Viswa Vaishnava Raj-Sabha should be re-established and the Adventual Tithi of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya should be properly observed. Srila Bhakti Vinode Thakur, thereupon, published the 'Nabadwip-Panjika' and revived the Gaura Era, this very year.

404 Gaura Era : This year Srila Bhakti Vinode Thakur visited all the places of 'Nabadwipdham', collected full esoteric evidence, and published a book entitled, "Sri-Sri Nabadwipdham-mahatmya". He published three things in this book, viz., (i) the dicta laid down by the 'Shastras', (ii) the statements of the 'Mahabhagabatas', and (iii) the direct Injunctions of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya.

408 Gaura Era : The ritualistic worship of the Divine Symbolic Form of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya in Sridham Mayapur was started this year.

444 Gaura Era : This year a Theistic Exhibition was opened at Sridham Mayapur to educate all benighted souls about the Transcendental Teachings of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya in pursuance of Sri Sri Nityananda Mahaprabhu's Mission for the establishment of the Universal Religion of Transcendental Love. A relief map showing all the regions up to 'Vaikunthadham' was prepared and exhibited.

448 Gaura Era : This is the present new year. A magnificent Temple has been built this year at 'Yogapitha' at Sridham Mayapur. And on the very site of the Advent of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya, the Divine Form of 'Adhokshaja-Vishnu' came up to the surface while the ground was being dug for laying the foundation of the Temple. The opening ceremony of the New Temple has been performed and the ceremonial worship of the 'Archa-Vigrahas' has begun.

The Advent Fullmoon Tithi, its greatness : The Fullmoon Tithi of the Advent of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya, is the holiest of all Tithis. On seeing the Spotless Moon —Lord Gauranga—rising, the spotted moon hid its face under the pretext of an eclipse and the people unknowingly welcomed the Father of 'Srinam Samkirtan' by a loud universal chant. The light of the earthly moon disperses material darkness of this world ; but the rays of the Spiritual Moon—Lord Gauranga—dispels the gloom of spiritual ignorance from the inmost hearts of all persons.

The Propagation of the Transcendental Teachings of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya : Sri Sri Nityananda has again appeared on this mundane plane in the activities of the Acharya and is trying to fulfil the prophecy of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya, "My Name will be spread all over the world". With this end in view, He has caused to be written a great many books and to be delivered innumerable lectures, has established numerous places of spiritual instruction, has uncovered to the view of the people the true sight of places of pilgrimage and re-established the spiritual worship of the 'Archa-Vigraha's. Thakur Bhakti Vinode Institute, founded at Sridham Mayapur, is offering indiscriminately to all persons the knowledge of the theory and practice of the Transcendental Teachings of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya. Two Sanyasi preachers Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj and Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Hriday Bon Maharaj, have undertaken to propagate in Europe the Divine Message of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya. Rich men whose hearts have been touched by the Grace of God have built beautiful temples and lecture-halls at Sridham Mayapur. The Divine Message of Lord Gaurasundar is being spread through daily, weekly, fortnightly and monthly periodicals consecrated to this great purpose.

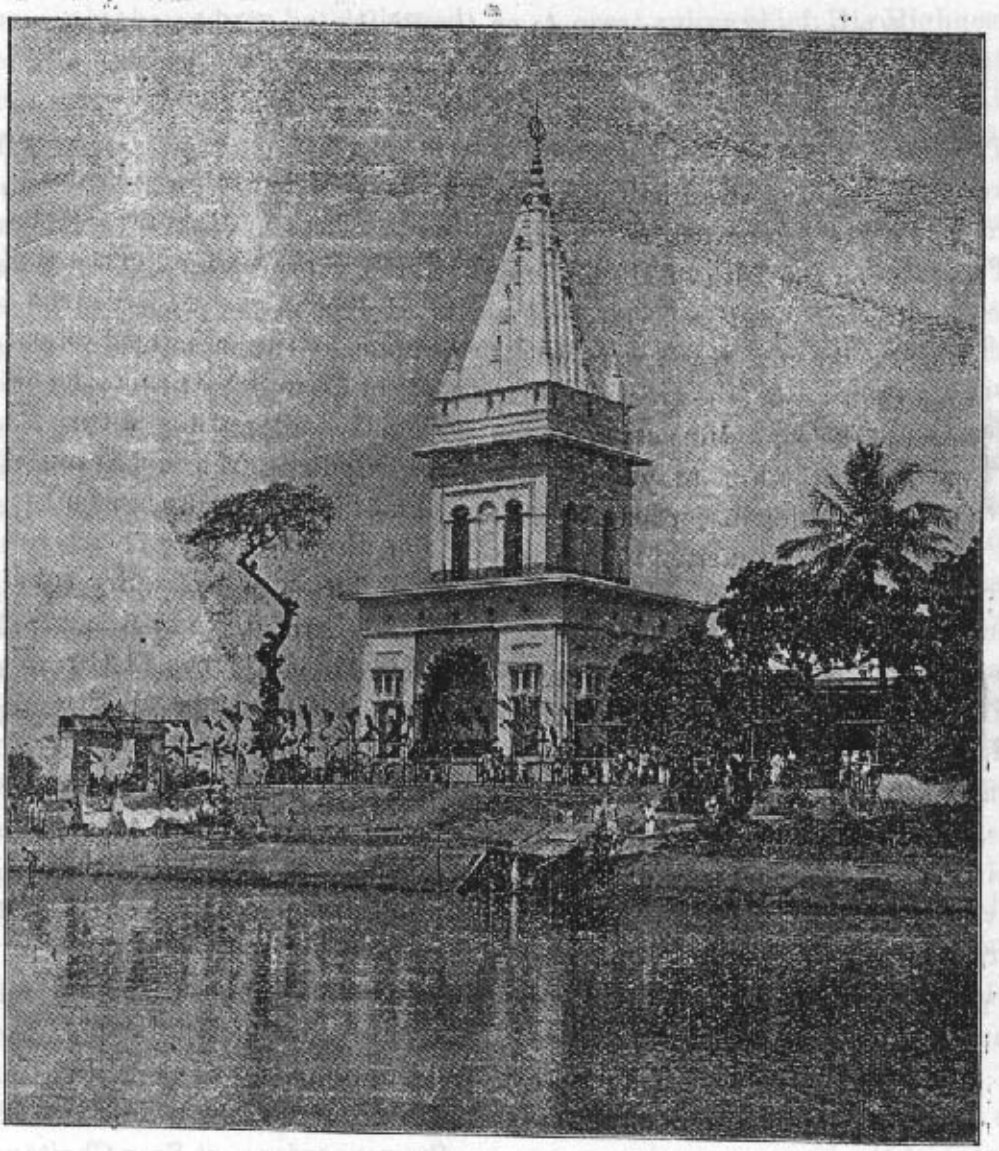
A great ruling chief, His Highness the Maharaja of Tripura, the President of 'Sri Nabadwipdham-Pracharini-Sabha', has been attracted to honour Sridham Mayapur, on the first day of the New Year in order to perform the service of opening the New Temple. Sripad Sakhi Charan Roy Bhakti-vijoy, who has built the 'Bhakti-vijoy Bhawan' for the Acharya, has erected the magnificent Temple on the Birth-site of the Lord, or 'Sri Yogapitha'. It is due to his pure serving zeal that electric lights and telephones are being installed for the service of the holy cause of propagatingt he Transcendental Teachings of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya from Sridham Mayapur. O Most Auspicious Fullmoon Tithi of the Advent of the Supreme Lord Sri Krishna Chaitanya ! we offer You our most cordial welcome ; be pleased to bless us that we may always serve You and give You due honour.

Anniversary celebrations at Sreedham Mayapur

(Opening of the new temple on the Birth-site of Mahaprabhu)

The Anniversary of the Birth of the Supreme Lord was celebrated at Sreedham Mayapur on the 20th of March.



The number of pilgrims who had joined the Parikrama this year was much larger than even the records of previous years. The pilgrims started in procession from Sridham Mayapur on March 11, in the following order. First came two devotees who carried the poles that supported the flag on which was embroidered the words "Sree Nabadwipdham Parikrama." They were followed by a couple of devotees who swept the road clean over which Sree Radha Madhava were to pass. Next behind them were rows of pilgrims carrying flags, mace and other paraphernalia. Behind them was the Editor followed by the Tridandi Sanyasis. The Sri. Vigrahas of Sree Radha Madhav were carried in an exquisitely decorated palanquin. The Deities were followed by the groups of the chanters of kirttan. The immense body of pilgrims formed the rear of the huge procession.

The circumambulators returned to Sree Mayapur on the 19th, after visiting all the nine islands by journeying for nine days. His Holiness Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj joined the Parikrama procession on the third day. His Holiness was accorded a great reception by the assembled pilgrims, the people of Champahatta and the members of the Mission, on his return to Sree Nabadwipdham from his European tour.

The Parikrama procession was conducted this year by Their Holinesses Srimad Tirtha Maharaj, Srimad Bharati Maharaj, Srimad Nemi Maharaj, Srimad Ashram Maharaj, Srimad Giri Maharaj, Srimad Aranya Maharaj, Srimad Sagar Maharaj, Srimad Parbat Maharaj, Srimad Bhagabat Maharaj, Srimad Srauti Maharaj and Srimad Yachak Maharaj. Mahopadesak Sripad Siddhaswarup Brahmachariji very ably arranged for the conveyance of the pilgrims and their luggages.

On the eve of the day of Advent of the Supreme Lord the Editor addressed the pilgrims at Sree Yogapeeth. Another meeting was held at the Avidyaharan Srawanasadana at Sree Chaitanya Math which was addressed by Upadesak Sripad Krishna Kanti Brahmachari, Bhaktikusum and by Acharya Sripad Kishori Mohan Bhaktivandhab, B. L., Bhaktisastri. The ceremony of the Birth-day Anniversary of Sreeman Mahaprabhu was performed with great eclat on the 20th March 1935, at Sree Yogapith, the Holy Birth Site of the

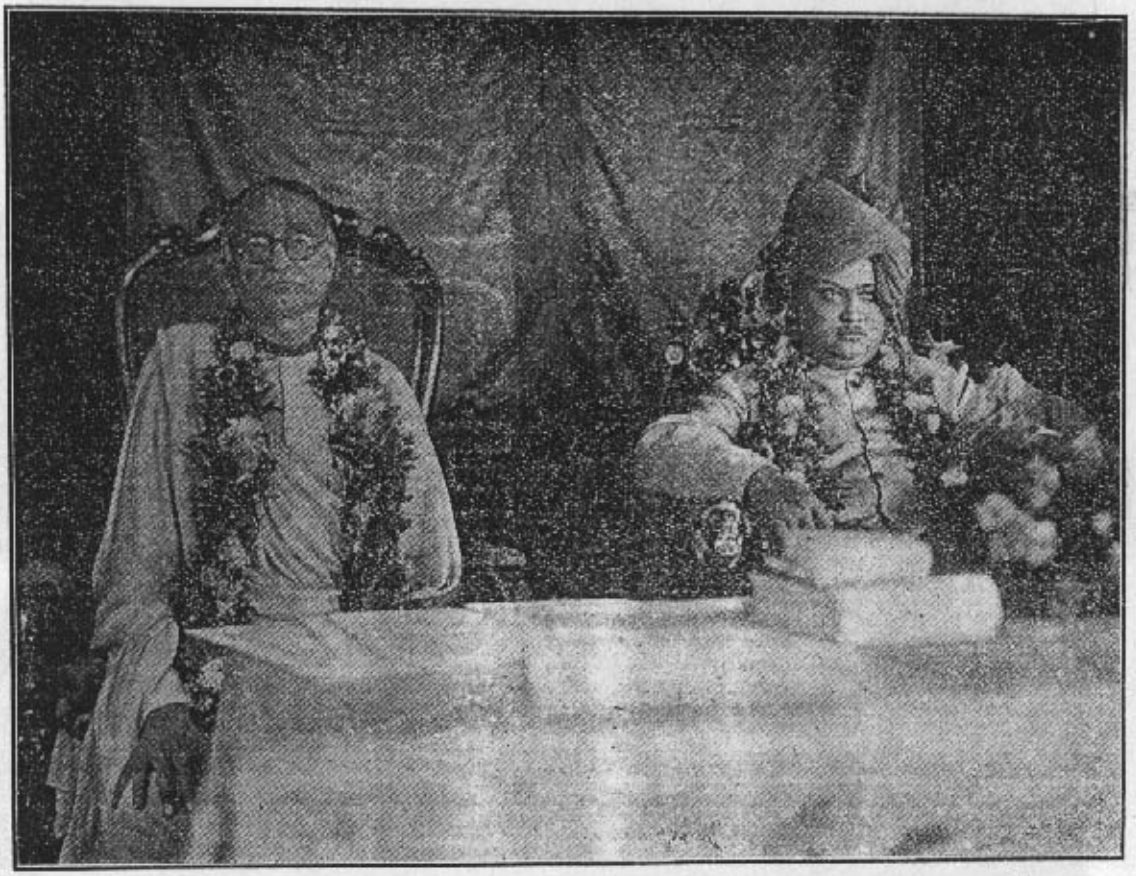
New Temple at the Birth-site of Mahaprabhu



Supreme Lord. The special feature in connection with this important festival of the year was the installation of Deities in the newly constructed big Temple. Sj. Sakhi Charan Roy, a wealthy merchant of Calcutta bore all expenses of erecting this magnificent Temple. The inauguration ceremony of the Temple was held in a fitting manner under the Presidentship of His Highness the Maharaja Bir Bikram Kishore Dev Varman Manikya Bahadur of Tripura State. The Maharaja had with him a long retinue and attended by, among others, Manyabara Rana Bodhjung Bahadur, Chief Secretary to His Highness ; Lt. Maharajkumar Karna Kishore Dev Varman Bahadur ; Lt. Maharajkumar Durjoy Kishore Dev Varman Bahadur ; Capt. Kumar Prafulla Kumar Dev Varman Bahadur, Military Secretary to His Highness ;

His Highness the Maharaja Bahadur of Tripura received at Hular Ghat (Sreedham Mayapur)

Capt. Raja Jhapat Jung Bahadur, A.D.C. to His Highness ; Capt. Kumar Kiron Kumar Dev Varman Bahadur ; Subadar Sahib J. C. Dev Varma, with about 20 followers. The party of His Highness started from Calcutta by Chittagong Mail in the morning and were received by a large number of prominent persons of the district of Nadia at Ranaghat, Krishnagar and Nabadwipghat stations. At Nabadwipghat they were taken in a richly decorated big boat to cross the Jalangi for Hularghat where they were received by a large body of persons numbering serveral thousands amidst loud shouts of joy and continued shouts of Harinam. His Highness with party was taken in a number of motor cars kept for the purpose where among others was received by Mahamahopadeshak Kunjabehari Vidyabhusan, General Secretary, and Mahamahopadeshak Pandit Atul Chandra Banerjee and proceeded towards Sree Mayapur followed by a big procession reaching Bhaktivijoy Bhawan at Sreedham at 11 a. m. where His Highness halted. A large gathering of pilgrims from the surrounding country side and guests from Calcutta and Krishnagar attended the ceremony.

His Highness the Maharaja Bahadur of Tripura sitting at the meeting with Editor

All the preliminary ceremonies in connection with the installation of Sree Vigrahas were held since morning under the direction of Editor. At 2 p.m. His Highness Maharaja Manikya Bahadur went to the Pandal in front of the Temple where His Highness was received and conducted to the dais by Editor amongst continued shouts of joy from the vast multitude of men assembled on this occasion. After the opening song was over, the addresses from Sree Nabadwipdham Pracharini Sabha and from other institutions of Sreedham Mayapur in different languages were presented to His Highness in a nicely designed silver casket. His Highness gave a joint reply in Bengali to the above, the purport of which is given below :

"Revered Saraswati Maharaj and gentlemen,

From long I desired to pay a visit to this Holy place, the Centre of learning in Bengal, which saw its fulfilment at your call and through Mercy of the Supreme Lord.

Our line is included in the Gaudiya Vaishnava community, and accordingly, the Place of Birth and activities of Sriman Mahaprabhu are very dear to me. About 43 Years ago my great-grand-father of sacred memory Maharaja Bir Chandra Manikya Bahadur assisted in erecting the House of the Supreme Lord at Sridham Mayapur. My revered grand-father Maharaja Radha Kishore Manikya Bahadur installed Sri Sri Radha Madhabjiu at this place. So I feel highly gratified to join the opening ceremony of this magnificent Temple and I hold in great esteem the serving mood of Sj. Sakhi Charan Roy, Bhaktivijoy, the generous donor of the newly constructed huge Shrine.

Last year when I visited Sree Gaudiya Math in Calcutta I was pleased to learn of the activities in spreading pure theism in India and abroad. Today I am feeling exceedingly delighted at your strenuous efforts in this direction and your success through your undaunted perseverance. I most cordially sympathise with you in this highly praised enterprise of yours. I pray that this high mission of yours be crowned with good success.

In fine, I thank you for the elaborate arrangements you have made for my comfortable reception."

After this His Highness formally declared the Temple open and the massive gates of the superb Temple were flung open amidst shouts of Hari Sankirtan. The rejoicings of the people knew no bounds and it was a sight for the gods to see.

With a vote of thanks to the chair His Highness was given a hearty send-off by all the prominent members of the Sabha and of Sree Chaitanya Math. The Maharaja Bahadur repeatedly expressed his extreme gladness at the right royal reception and for the elaborate arrangements on such a solemn occasion.

After the close of the function His Highness with retinue visited the houses of Sribas Pandit, Adwaita Prabhu, house of Murari Gupta, Sree Chaitanya Math, the Samadhi-mandir of Srila Babaji Maharaj and Chand Kaji. His Highness then went to Kulia Nabadwip accompanied by Pandit Kunja Behari Vidyabhusan, came back to Sridham Mayapur and returned to Calcutta via. Krishnagar. The Press reporters of the Statesman, the Amritabazar Patrika and the Advance were present They took notes of the function and photos of the Temple and the sitting of the meeting. Among the gentlemen who were present on the occasion, the following is worthy of note :

Manyabar Rana Bodhjang Bahadur, Chief Secretary; Lt, Maharajkumar Karna Kishore Dev Varman Bahadur, Lt. Maharajkumar Durjoy Kishore Dev Varman, Capt. Kumar Kiron Kumar Dev Varman Bahadur, Subadar Sahib G. C. Dev Varman, Rabindra Nath Dutta, M.A., B.L., S. Dutta, I.C.S., Dt. Magistrate, Krishnagar; S. Gupta, Police Superintendent, Nadia; Rev. B.W. Mahaprabhu Sree Chaitanya

(Birth-day offering by Bhaktibandhab Jatindra Kumar Ghosh B.A.)

On the day of Dol Purnima, the full-moon day of the Bengali month of Falgoon, in the year 1407 of the Saka Era corresponding to the 18th February of 1486, Mahaprabhu Sree Chaitanya appeared in this world. His life-history, described in contemporary biographical accounts of His deeds, however, miraculous, is a matter of common knowledge which scarcely needs repetition here and we offer no apology for this little critical study of the same on the basis of those accounts.

Significance of the Day

The notable feature of the day of Advent was that the full-moon as it rose above the horizon became eclipsed, which is considered to augur impending calamities. So all pious people took ablutions in the sacred waters of the Ganges and prayed to the Supreme Lord by chanting the Name of Hari for warding off the threatened calamities. Just at that moment Sree Chaitanya appeared in the world at the invocation of His great and favourite devotee Sree Sree Adwaita Prabhu.

Thus the soul of man becomes eclipsed with the dark desire of self-enjoyment and self-aggrandisement, and when his misery knows no bound, some compassionate saint invokes the mercy of the Lord and the All-merciful Lord doth appear with His blessings and benedictions as the serene moonshine of the vernal night of a Falgooni Purnima. It is a suitable opportunity for the devotees to be engaged in singing the Holy Name of Hari and it is the occasion for the Lord Himself to enjoy the pastime of swinging, Dol Yatra, or Holi.

Significance of the Place

The place of Advent of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu is no less significant. For a very long time, both before and after the 15th century, the old town of Nabadwip, standing just on the eastern bank of the Bhagirathi at its confluence with the Jalangi, was far famed as the principal seat of culture in the east being the "Oxford of India", attracting thousands of pupils from all parts of India to receive the highest education in various branches of study at the feet of the renowned scholars of Nabadwip or Nadia. During the time of Mahaprabhu, Nadia rose to its highest pitch of intellectual achievement and it was for the first time in the history of the world that an Avatar flourished in the midst of such highly learned scholars. So it was quite in the fitness of things that Sree Chaitanya in the very prime of His life humbled, by dint of His own miraculous power of intellect and learning, the proudest scholars and vanquished the mightiest intellects of the time all over India, exposing in all their nakedness the pettiness and uselessness of those wranglings with which the whole intellectual world was then busily occupied.

Is the Religion lacking in intelligence ?

The facts of the life of Mahaprabhu give the lie to the charge of uninformed circles that the religion of Sree Chaitanya is lacking in intellectual culture and is given to sentimentalism. Sree Chaitanya's crushing defeat of the vainglorious 'world-Champion' Pandit Keshab Bhatta and His humbling down the intellectual giant and the greatest logician of India of his day, Vasudeb Sarbabhauma, the Court Pandit of the King of Odhra and Kalinga, are, among others, sufficiently glaring instances of the superhuman intellectual reach of the Propounder of this religion. The positive refutation is offered by the unique series of brilliant theological works that were penned by the six Goswamins, the contemporary followers and apostles of the religion promulgated by Chaitanya which stand as proud monuments of unequalled intellectual culture and scientific rationalism in the world. Time is yet to come for a close study and proper appreciation of these invaluable treasures of our spiritual heritage.

Is the Religion wanting in a high moral standard ?

Sree Chaitanya renounced the world and turned a mendicant in the prime of youth, while He was only 24. According to contemporary biographers, He did not suffer the name "woman" to be uttered lightly in His Presence and the least moral aberrations, even in mental thought or disguised proneness, if ever found among his followers, were chastised and punished with relentless severity. Krishnadas, the too simple attendant of Mahaprabhu, felt the facination of some beautiful blondes during the Southern Indian tour. Sree Chaitanya at once caught hold of the man and sent him home in Bengal never to see his face again. Chhota Haridas, a mendicant follower of Mahaprabhu, who was about to commit mental wrong under the pretext of approaching a woman devotee to beg some fine rice for Mahaprabhu was punished with death in order to atone for his concealed intention of stealing a glance at a young lady.

Inspite of this strictness of the life and conduct of Mahaprabhu and of His followers, critics including a few misinformed European Orientalists and some interested missionaries of other creeds, have not scrupled to prefer charges of immorality against the religion of Mahaprabhu on the strength of corruptions that are noticeable among the uncultured people who pass themselves off as followers of this religion but are actually perverted dissenters who do not deserve to be recognised by any right thinking man. It is needless to state that morality is but a rudimentary step to the huge mansion of religion. In all other religions altruism forms the highest principle of even religious conduct, but in the altruistic view amelioration of the body alone is intended almost always at the cost of mental improvement and invariably at the total denial of the health and interest of the soul, the real essence of the human personality, whereas in the religion of Mahaprabhu the fullest interest of the soul is first of all guarded without making too much of the transient external tabernacle. Again, in most religions comfort and weal of the human body are sought at the cost of the lives of the lower creation, and thus the meaning of altruism is greatly narrowed to suit human requirements; whereas in the religion of Mahaprabhu due respect is shown to every grade of sentient entity and personal weal and comfort of man is always studiously sacrificed for practising the great religion of Love. Thus the highest moral standard is revealed in the religion of Mahaprabhu in its unambiguous form than in any another faith.

Is the Religion Sectarian

Some self-sufficient pedants turn up their noses at the religion of Mahaprabhu by imputing in it the bad odour of narrow sectarianism. But the charge is equally baseless. If the good and the pious are to be called a sect in distinction from the lewed and the atheists, then such critics are surely justified in refusing to bring the latter under the banner of Mahaprabhu. The religion of Mahaprabhu is the most catholic form of faith that has ever been conceived in as much as it makes no distinction of caste, colour, sex, position, rank or any other accident of their temporary sojourn. Thus the rich and the poor, the healthy and the sick, the learned and the uneducated, patricians and plebians, nobles and commoners, the imperialists and the socialists, the gentry and the slum, man and woman, the depressed and the privileged, labour and capital, the white and the black, ruler and ruled, the east and the west, man and beast—are not viewed as such but are looked upon from the highest stand point of their soul within, which creates no dividing difference not only between man and man but even between man and the lower creation.

Is there any other conception current among humanity that can at all cope with this wide and catholic view ? The muddy vesture of our physical frame and the incidental associations and equipments thereof are not allowed to override the interest of the soul in the religion of Mahaprabhu. Even our mind, which is subject to changes and transformations along with the whole range of our senses over which it holds its sway, is but a covering or sheath inside which the proprietor, who is no other than the self or the soul, dwells, and is only the manager of the properties by appointment of the proprietor. Regarded from this point of view it is the soul who has the right to come in relationship with and to serve the Supreme Lord, irrespective of the mind and body.

Failing to appreciate such a sublime view, many hasty people confound the religion of Mahaprabhu with a mere attempt for social reform from doing away with the exclusiveness of caste distinctions which may stand in the way of Mahaprabhu's religion of Eternal Love of the soul for Lord Sree Krishna.

Is the Religion sentimental ?

Another class of critics attempts to minimise the value and importance of of this lofty universal religion by misrepresenting it as sentimental. It is quite apparent that when abstruse theological intricacies cannot be penetrated or high transcendental ideas cannot be followed, the religion is usually misconstrued and is cried down on a misrepresentation to justify one's aloofness from it.

Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu is the most perfect and illustrative Exponent of Srimad Bhagabatam compiled by Vayas Deva himself as the explanatory commentary of his philosophy of theology,—the Vedanta Aphorisms, which is the epitomised quintessence of the Vedas and other Srutis, the basis and backbone of the Sanatan Dharma. As such, every action and movement of the life of Sree Chaitanya is deeply founded on and is the demonstrative manifestation of the highest truths of the Vedantic Theology, and thus the life and teachings of Mahaprabhu go far beyond all other schools of theology or religious thought and serve as the harmonising force to finally settle all differences among them. This is amply illustrated not only in the teachings of Mahaprabhu, but also in the authentic accounts of His Life, in the incidents of His discourses with conversion of Prakashananda Saraswati, the leader of the Adwaita School of Benares, with sixty thousand of his disciples, the Ramayets and Tatwabadins of the South, the Buddhist Bhikshus, the Pathhans of U. P., and Moulana Sirazuddin or Chand Kazi, the Moslem Governor of Nabadwip.

Is it theoretical ?

Mahaprabhu, although One with Sree Krishna, took the guise of the Devotee and was in a position of advantage to prove that Sree Krishna is the highest and most perfect Representation of Theos in as much as Sree Krishna is the Absolute Truth or the Supreme Lord over all gods, Nature and beings. Sree Krishna is the All-powerful Autocrat regulating everything including the phenomena the transcendence and the immanence ; and Sree Krishna is the greatest Attractor and All-comprehensive Sole Enjoyer yielding ultimate resort to all kinds of subjects as neutrals, servants or sons, as friends, parents and even as consorts. Mahaprabhu set a practical example as to how our relationship can be established with Sree Krishna and how unalloyed devotion can be cultivated culminating in perfect realisation of our highest desideratum, "Prema" or the 'Love of Krishna', which totally revolutionises and completely transforms man by making his unalloyed soul to be in tune with the great magic Flute of the All-Attractor.

In the way of practical illustration of the perfect life of a devotee, Mahaprabhu steered clear on the one hand of epicurean hedonists and on the other of cynical stoics, exposed the childish foolishnees of self-annihilation of dissatisfied and reactionary salvationists and the utter failure and uselessness of the infinitely ambitious and inexhaustible greed of the Elevationists. Mahaprabhu laid bare the great dangers of whirling round the vicious circle of intellectual speculation and the malicious mockery of blind fanaticism. He showed how every person occupying any position can approach Sree Krishna and be blessed with the highest fulfilment of life by the practice of devotion and how every entity of the Universe can be best utilized by its application to the service of Sree Krishna, the Sole Lord. This is taught to be the means and method of rendering oneself free of those dangers and pitfalls that attend upon the wrong use of one's opportunities ; and thus, keeping off from the vice of self-enjoyment, to turn to be a devotee of the Lord by all-round tactfulness in the use of the things of this world and thereby betake oneself to the royal highway of eternal bliss.

Is it proselytising and the Religion of the age ?

This religion of the Vedanta has been proved to be practically demonstrable in the life of Mahaprabhu. It follows, as a necessary conclusion, that it is preachable and consequently proselytising. How else could the Sanatan Dharma spread from the original abode of the Aryans and be made available to the people of the country ? This religion on the other hand cannot also suffer stagnation, which is the way to death. Every living religion should progress and, if found worthy on a comparative estimate must stand and spread. Mahaprabhu's desire and mandate was that His Religion must be carried to all corners of the world which is now being fulfilled by the preachers of the Gaudiya Math under the direction of the great Acharya Paramahansa Srila Bhakti. Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Maharaj. They have gone to the West and have evoked appreciation from the highest savants of Great Britain and Germany. The simple factof their rapid expansion in an age of stubborn materalism is not inconsistent with the claim that the religion of Mahaprabhu has an eternal appeal to all sorts of people and that can meet the latest requirements of the age. So it has life and it is, therefore, not content with being anything less than Universal religion of the age. Any challenge from the intelligentsia to its claim to their undivided allegiance are always taken up for detailed discussion in the pages of the Journal. Politics should not be the only nor even the principal pursuit of human life. The fearless quest and craving for the Truth is the only congenial function of human intelligence and human life, and it is the only solace or soothing balm for all human ailments.

A New Temple on the Birth-site of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna-Chaitanya

A great shrine, externally one of the biggest in Bengal, was opened to worship on the 20th of March by His Highness Maharaja Bir Bikram Kishore Dev Varman Manikya Bahadur of the Tripura State, at Sridham Mayapur (old Nabadwip), on the Birth-site of the Supreme Lord Sree Krishna-Chaitanya. The Temple is 125 feet high. Its donor is a merchant of Calcutta, Srijut Sakhicharan Roy Bhaktivijoya, a devoted servant of Sreedham Mayapur.

Lord Chaitanya is the Teacher of the Religion of Transcendental Love of Sree Krishna. He was born at Sreedham Mayapur in 1486 A. C. For a long time for causes that are yet to be explored, Sreedham Mayapur as well as the actual Site of Birth of the Lord were supposed to have been washed away by the Bhagirathi. We owe the discovery of the forgotten places to Srila Jagannath Dasa Babaji and Thakur Bhaktivinode. The detailed story of the search and discovery of the Site of the Appearance of the All-Love can be read in a Bengali Book, Chitre Nabadwip. It is not our purpose to go into the narrative at this place.

Sj. Sakhi Charan Roy Bhaktivijoy

We have also accordingly discussed the spiritual conception of the Transcendental Plane of the Appearance of the Divinity as well as the historical evidence on which the identification of Sreedham Mayapur and the Site of Birth has been based, in the back-numbers of this Journal.

We have all along observed that a great difficulty is sure to be felt by those who are not susceptible to the spiritual argument in being asked to regard the glorification of any particular locality for the accident of the birth of a personage however great. The actual teaching of Sree Krishna Chaitanya is separated by such persons from any sentimental reverence for the place of His nativity. It is also likely for them to experience a short of irrelevancy in this Journal bothering itself so much about the identification of the exact Site of Birth of Sree Krishna Chaitanya. Such matters, might appear to be capable of being left to the antiquarians and as not very material to the purpose of propagating the Teaching of the Supreme Lord, the object of the Journal.

We have, however, endeavoured to show that the above mode of thinking is itself based upon a narrow and untenable view of the nature of the Absolute, the Subject-matter of the Teaching of the Supreme Lord and of this Journal. There is an esoteric aspect of the Birth-site of the Supreme Lord which is all-important even for the universal spiritual purpose. The Absolute is not an abstract conception of the poor muddling brain of a mortal. This is liable to be forgot by those who do not care about the spiritual issue itself but bestow all their attention on its misrepresentations by the so-called philosophical method which is utterly and palpably inadequate for the purpose.

The Absolute is the Real Entity and not the attenuated zero of the empiric philosophers who is without any function or living relationship with humanity. If all the initiative and activity in this world is to be monopolized by those who cannot pass the line of puzzling ignorance, there is no room for the quest of the Absolute. It is only when the relative methods are found to be not only insufficient but positively injurious and false that there can be any serious necessity for seeking for the knowledge of the Active Absolute and not of a superfluous non-entity miscalled the truth, who is not to interfere at all with our wicked and foolish schemes of life.

Therefore, it is of the utmost importance to man to be able to know something that is definite in regard to the objective Absolute instead of affecting to remain content with a disappointing mode of existence by setting up a false theory of the Absolute to serve as an apology for our own inevitable foolishnesses.

Why should it be considered as a narrow sectarian move to postulate definitive existence for the All-Existence? Why should non existence be supposed to possess all these definite conditions for existence which are to be denied to the Real existence? This disingenuousness and demostrative malice against the living Source of all true and false existence form the alpha and the omega of the creed of impersonalism that has always possessed such a sinister attraction for sophisticated humanity. The dogma of impersonalism should not be allowed to block the way of the fruitful enquiry regarding the Truth. To seek for some definite foothold on the plane of the truth should be recognised as the immediate and imperative duty of all who are not willing to be in league with the forces of sectarian misrepesentations in the name of religion and thereby drawing upon themselves an impending universal destruction by the criminal and foolish indulgence of accumulated malice.

The discovery of the Birth-site of the Supreme Lord is an event which offers the definite starting-point of the truly scientific endeavour for obtaining a foothold in the plane of concrete transcendence. The building of the shrine on the Birth-site is a further step in the progressive invoked descent of the All-Love to the plane of internecine strife and gilded untruth.

Sree Vyasa Puja Ceremony

(Vote of thanks to the President)

By Upadesaka Y. Jagannatham B.A., Bhaktitilaka.

My most affectionate Master, illustrious Vaishnavas, Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen,

I deem it a special favour in that my humble-self, an Andhra disciple of Sree Guru Deva, has been ordered by the great Vaishnavas of the Gaudiya Mission to tender on their behalf a vote of thanks to our august President of the Vyasa Puja celebrations, I mean, the Raja Sahib of Puri, who has so kindly spared his evening hours of today for us. But before I actually carry out the mandate of the Vaishnavas, I venture to crave the indulgence of my affectionate Master and the Raja Sahib, as I propose to take a few minutes for offering my personal homage to my Divine Master.

My Divine and beloved Master,

You had on several occasions talked to us of Hindu Theology and on spirit and matter. You told us that when the same are examined from a philosophical point of view, they comprise five grade forms of faith, and that, in consequence, five kinds of worship came to stay in this world. Firstly, you told us of the worship of insentient, lifeless, blind gross matter of gigantic proportions, which is a kind of Sakti-worship and which goes by the name of Materialism.

Secondly you dwelt on the worship of partly sentient matter as appertaining to light, heat and their ilk which is otherwise known as Sun-worship, and this, you said, is Elementalism or the subtle form of Materialism.

Thirdly, you spoke to us of the worship of sentient matter in the animal kingdom, when sentience appears to move towards reason and this, you said, is symbolised in Ganesh-worship or the worship of elephant-man or Fetishism.

Fourthly, you told us of the worship of the mind symbolised by the human state and seen in its fullest play and in a state of salvation in Siva, the highest of Jivas. Inductive reason is the main plank of this worship and you called this Man-worship.

Fifthly, you were pleased to tell us of the highest form of worship of Satchidananda Bhagawan by the soul attracted by love, transcending empiric reason. This you called God-worship, but you never said that this worship is irrational because it has eschewed human reason. Man is endowed with perverted reason and love. But you told us that impure reason cannot transcend the four corners of the mayic domain, while pure love extends over both the mayic and the transcendental regions. Reason approaches the degraded love of this mundane sphere just to uplift and purge it of its unwholesome aspect, but has absolutely nothing to do with transcendental love which is eternal and beyond its sway and which is of the very essence of the human soul as well as of Bhagawan.

Therefore, my Divine Master, the religion you preach in this world is based on the spontaneous transcendental love of God which is natural to the human soul in his pristine condition; and woe to him who calls this religion of the world a sectarian religion.

But, my Master, you told us again that this natural love is in a suppressed state in fallen souls. When a jiva has out of his free will chosen to plunge into the maelstrom of this mayic samsar, the cord of transcendental love, that links him to the All-love, is rent asunder. But when he is overpowered with the rackings of maya, he lifts up a prayer unto Bhagawan. No sooner Bhagawan finds that prayer, a sincere and unreserved one, He loses no time in sending his Beloved to re-link the bro- n cord and restore once more the natural connection of the human soul with Satchidananda Bhagawan.

This Beloved of God is my Divine Master, the Guru Deva, through whom only my prayer can reach God. You never keep me out of service, but only point out that if I elect to serve the mundane sphere, I am bound to be the slave of my passions, but if service of the transcendental sphere is chosen I am free to serve the All-love. Thus you clearly pointed out that the linking of the human soul with the Supreme does not deprive the former of his inherent freedom, although in his present corrupt position it still comprehends and connotes service.

My affectionate Master, we surrender to You, and You in Your turn give us the very Krishna,—Krishna Who has descended as Nama. It is a thousand pities that we, fallen souls, attribute a physical body to You, for how can a Sadguru, or for the matter of that, a Vaishnava, possess a mortal frame? My Master always speaks and transacts with His spiritual senses and His words, which comprise the very essence of transcendental tidings, pierce the hide-bound two-fold tabernacle of the hearer and reach his very soul. When this soul-communion is established the value of the Guru is fully appraised, and all doubts cease to exist from that very moment.

My Divine Master, You directed us not to speculate on Godhead nor to approach Him in a challenging mood; for, You said that He is not amenable to such tactics. "Hear His message, cultivate and welcome humility, and purge Your heart of the three-fold sin of woman, money and fame. Your heart will then become a veritable playground to Krishna, the Divine Musician", this, my Master, is the quintessence of Your inimitable teachings.

My beloved Master ! You are the Namacharya of the present age. You have convinced us, beyond the shadow of doubt that Godhead and His Name are identical, and You have told us how Namaparadha or the offended Nama gives Bhukti, material aggrandisement how a single Namabhasa or dimly perceived Nama can easily secure Mukti which pantheists probably attain after a legion of births, how Sree Nama or the Holy Nama is the only means of saving the human-ship from being floundered in the obnoxious swamps of Bhakti or wrecked on the perilous rock of Mukti ; and how He helps the same to steer clear and race ahead of them towards Home, His transcendental Abode.

My Transcendental Teacher ! You are Acharana Guru, in whom both precept and practice are combined, but not the Tatasthitha Guru of pantheistic conception. In You are personified the very mercy and power of Sree Chaitanya Deva, Who is no other than Krishna in the cloak of His Own Servitor in the highest pastime of mellowed sweetness.

My Divine Master ! we worship You to-day, the day of Your Advent into the mundane region and we call it Vyasa Puja. Vyasa is Guru-Deva and You are identical with Him. But I do not refer here to the Vyasa who has not yet passed the stage of glorification of Varnasramadharma and the four Purusharthas and who has not yet ceased to consider salvation as the summum bonum of the human soul. Let pantheists worship such a Vyasa and please themselves. But I refer only to the full-fledged Vyasa whose peace of mind was restored by the mercy of Sree Narada-Muni, and who, by virtue of that mercy, has recognised the super-excellence of devotion to Krishna.

(Here the speaker was shown the table-clock to mark time). Yes, I see the clock. But my Gurudeva spoke to me of the human clock. It is not even a day-clock, but one of a few hours, a half-a-day clock. Its main-spring is mineness that holds close unto jiva, its central pivot. Quest-after Truth is its pendulum and Bhukti and Mukti which are its minute and hour hands, always rest upon Bhakti, its dial. Its mainspring is always wound up at the dusky evening hour preceding the dark period when we are compelled to lead groping lives, but the Ever-Merciful Guru-deva, my Eternal Master, does not allow the clock to rot or get rusty at that stage.

He merrily gives a push to the pendulum, an impetus to the quest after Truth. The pendulum swings and directs Bhukti and Mukti, the hands of the clock, which move and show angularities as the pendulum swings on unceasingly. The few hours elapse, the mineness (mamakara) is fully unwinded ; Bhukti and Mukti fall in a line with the quest after Truth and all come to a dead stop as mineness detaches itself from jiva. This is 6 a. m. and this signifies the rise of the morning sun of unalloyed devotion. My Master is adept at such teaching.

My Most beloved Master ! I am closing. I can count the particles of sand on Puri beach, but your attributes I cannot count. You uplift sinners like myself,—a sinner, in whose life, to quote the words of Thakur Bhaktivinode, there is not a particle of good and who has caused much torment to others and pained all jivas.

And now, Mr President, please pardon me as I have detained you long. Our heartfelt thanks are due to you, a distinguished and worthy successor of King Pratapa-rudra Deva, who felt it as the highest of honours to sweep with a gold broom the road leading to the temple, over which Vaishnavas once marched to have a darsan of Jagannathadeva. You have extended your love towards us and spared your valuable time for us and I, on behalf of the Gaudiya Mission, beg to tender our hearty vote of thanks which you may be graciously pleased to accept.

Round the Gaudiya Maths

Sree Gaudiya Math, Calcutta :

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj, who after his return from England was propagating the doctrine of Mahaprabhu in Bombay, Delhi and Central Provinces reached here from Delhi in the evening of March 14. The members of the mission welcomed him with joy and sincerity of feelings.

The Advent Anniversary of Sree Chaitanya was performed with due eclat here on 20th March. After Aratric and Kirttan an interesting discourse was held on the subject, which was listened to with rapt attention by hundreds of earnest people.

Editor reached here from Deruli in the District of Khulna with number of followers. at the night of March 29.

This evening, Sunday, the 31st March at 6.30 p. m. members and admirers of the Gaudiya Math Calcutta will receive Maharajadhiraj Sir Bejoy Chand Mahtab, G. C. I. E., K. C. S. I., I. O. M., Bahadur of Burdwan at the Saraswat Srabansadan (Assembly-Hall) of the Calcutta Gaudiya Math (16, Kali Prosad Chakraverty Street, Baghbazer) where a public meeting will be held and an address of welcome will be presented to the Maharajadhiraj Bahadur on his return from England after a long time and in recognition of his active help as the Chairman of the London Gaudiya Mission Society.

Sree Chaitanya Math, Sridham Mayapur:

The Annual Celebration of Sree Nabadwipdham Parikrama Mahotsab commenced from Monday, March 11, according to the following programme: (1) 11th March—Antardwip; (2) 12th March—Simantadwip; (3) 13th March—Godrumadwip; (4) 14th March—Madhyadwip; (5) 15th March—Koladwip; (6) 16th March—Ritudwip; (7) 17th March—Jahnudwip; (8) 18th March—Modadrumadwip; (9) 19th March—Rudradwip.

Many Sadhus from all parts of India assembled on this occasion. They delivered lectures in religious subjects and explained lucidly the significance and value of those different places of pilgrimage sacred with the memory of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu and His associates. Various scriptural texts in glory of these ancient places were recited and expounded in course of the tour. Various kinds of Kirttan songs by experts formed an interesting feature. The gathering was worthy of note.

The 449th Advent Anniversary Ceremony of Sree Chaitanya Mahaprabhu came off on Wednesday, the March 20, at Sreedham Mayapur under the auspices of Sree Nabadwipdham Pracharini Sabha. The celebrations were guided under the directions of Editor. His Highness Maharaja Manikya Bahadur of Tripura State who is the President of the Dham Pracharini Sabha was present on the occasion.

A 125 feet high temple recently constructed by Mr. Sakhi Charan Roy of Calcutta at Sree Yogapeetha in Sreedham Mayapur, has just been completed with all sorts of modern equipments and appurtenances and has been decorated with electric lights.

The installation of the Sree 'Vigrahas' of Sree Krishna Chaitanya Mahaprabhu, His Associates, Sree Sree Gaur-Vishnupriya and of Sree Radha-Madhabjiu in the new Temple was celebrated under the direction of Editor with all the formal ceremonies from the morning of Wednesday, the 20th March, followed by Pujah, Homa, Aratrika, Bhograg etc.

A public meeting was held at the Yogapeetha at 2 p.m. attended by many notable persons of Bengal and other provinces and presided over by His Highness the Maharaja Bir Bikram Kishore Dev Varman Manikya Bahadur of Tripura State. His Highness was given addresses by different Institutions of the locality. After this, the massive gates of the Temple was formally declared open by His Highness.

This occasion witnessed the installation of a four-armed image of Vishnu called "Adhokshaja". The image was found on the 13th, June last when the foundation of the temple was being excavated. The archeologists are of opinion that this sort of image was worshipped in Bengal before the days of Sree Chaitanya Whose father Jagannath Misra used to worship a four-armed Vishnu, which fact justified that the image was the family Deity of Sree Jagannath Misra.

The 42nd Annual General Meeting of Sree Nabadwipdham Pracharini Sabha was held as usual at Sree Yogapeetha in Sreedham Mayapur on Wednesday, the 20th March at 2 p. m. when all the members of the different Provinces of India attended. The President of the Sabha, His Highness the Maharaja Bir Bikram Kisore Dev Varman Manikya Bahadur of Tripura was graciously pleased to take the chair.

Swananda Sukhada Kunja :

Editor came here on March 13, to supervise the arrangements for the accommodation of the pilgrims of Sree Nabadwipdham Parikrama who are expected there next morning. The pilgrims after the day's circumambulation reached here. In the evening they were addressed by the preachers of the Mission on different religious topics. Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Vivek Bharati Maharaj clearly explained the necessity of singing the Transcendental Name of Krishna always.

Sree Gaur Gadadhar Math, Champahati :

His Holiness Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Pradip Tirtha Maharaj after a successful preaching of the Divine Messages of the Supreme Lord in England for over two years joined the Parikrama party on March 15, at Koladwip. The pilgrims finding him in their midst after a long time received him with great joy and pleasure. He was then taken to Gaur Gadadhar Math. The inhabitants of the locality and the pilgrims arranged for a meeting to accord fitting reception to Swamiji. Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Sarbaswa Giri Maharaj and Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Vilas Gavasthinemi Maharaj spoke about the activities of Srimad Tirtha Maharaj who in reply delineated his experience of the West in a neat little speech.

Sree Gostha Vihari Math, Seshasayee :

A great Mela was held at Seshasayee on the Ekadashi Tithi on March 15. A gathering of about ten thousand people assembled there. Many respectable gentlemen paid a visit to Sree Gostha Vehari Math, a branch of Sree Chaitanya Math. The Supreme Lord Sree Krishna Chaitanya Deva visited this place during the Brajamandal Circumambulation. In order to commemorate the event, Editor established a permanent centre of the Mission there and for the propagation of Name and Fame of the Supreme Lord.

Khulna :

Mahopadeshak Pandit Siddhaswarup Brahmachari with several other Brahmacharis of the Mission started from Sree Gaudiya Math and preached the doctrines of Sriman Mahaprabhu and the messages of the Gaudiya Math in the city and the suburbs for some days. In course of his short stay there Brahmachariji delivered lectures at several places on Sanatana Dharma to the satisfaction of the audience. On hearing of the thoughtful lectures respectable citizens took much interest and were impressed with the benevolent object of the Mission for the eternal good of the suffering humanity.

Personality of Godhead

The difference between religion and non-religion consists in the admission and denial of the Personality of Godhead.

There are different ways of denying the Personality of Godhead. We hope to go into that part of the issue in another number of this Journal. Our present topic is Personality of Godhead. We, therefore, assume that the Personality of God, do not necessarily agree with one another. It is our purpose to trace the differences that are found among these.

Srimad Bhagabat has explained the function of religion in a form that cannot be easily misunderstood. The function of all unalloyed souls is defined by the Bhagabat as consisting of activities that are promotive of devotion to the Transcendental Person (Bhag. 1-2-6).

The Divinity has got His Own Name. He is Hari. The Word Hari is expressive of absence of all mundane qualitative reference. One who chooses to mistake the nature of the Divine Personality under the influence of thought that is not perfectly immune from the mundane qualitative reference, cannot be said to possess sound spiritual judgment. We cannot praise such deliberate perversity of judgment. That which is contemplated by man with the help of his eyes, ears, nose, tongue and skin, is not God. If we are asked to define God we should say, "Godhead is He Who has reserved the right of not being exposed to human senses." It is this Entity Who is called Adhokshaja, Hari, Krishna or Rama.

Quite recently a number of scholars, including Dr. Ramgopal Bhandarkar, Dr. Macnicol, etc., have been led to regard the worship of Seeta-Rama to be higher than that of Radha-Govinda. They have failed to bear in mind the caution of the Bhagabat that we must once for all cease from deliberately ignoring or lowering the Thing denoted by Them by the misuse of the words or any of the lines of sensuous thought that are unfortunately current among mankind. Nothing short of this is required by the definition of the Bhagabat. No sooner do we choose to think of God as an object of mundane thought, like earth, stone, water, etc., it becomes idolatry.

We do not subscribe to the way in which Hindus, Muhammedans, Christians, etc., have been endeavouring to set forth their respective contentious views. Neither has the obsolete quarrel between the Shaktas and the Vaishnavas, as we read of it in Dasu Roy or among the women folk, any bearing on the subject-matter of our preaching. Our words will never die as long as time endures, nay even after time itself has ceased to function. The fact is that once a person becomes really conversant with the Message of Sree Chaitanya Deva about the function of spiritual love, all little narrownesses are eliminated once for all. No sooner is the stone image broken, a worse entity, in the shape of vacuum, takes its place. If the matter is judged by the human intellect, it is sure to become idolatry. It is not proper to target the Entity of Godhead to the limited things that submit to be comprehended or mastered by our defective senses. It is equally bad judgment that seeks either to break up God or to deprive Him of His Own Absolute Existence. He is the All-pervading Entity. If He is affirmed to be powerless, His Supremacy is denied.

There is another method of mangling the Figure and Function of the Divinity. There are persons who make it a point to insist on the finality of reverential worship. They admit the Transcendental Figure of the Divine Person. But they declare that it is proper to serve only the upper Limbs of the Divine Form. They accordingly want to confine their service of the Divine Form to the Limbs above the Navel. But such vision excludes the Sonhood, Consorthood, Friendhood, etc., of Godhead. The arguments, on which they want to rely for preferring their particular mode of worship, make God an imperfect entity.

There is the old quarrel, which is wide of the mark, between those who affirm a material form, and those who affirm a material void as the form of Godhead. It is unnecessary to take any of the sides for carrying on such futile and foolish controversy. If man cannot rise above such palpably wrong ideas, it is sure to breed narrowness, sectarianism or quarrel. The intellect of man is subject to error, inadvertence and self-deception and is also liable to be led astray by the false testimony of his defective sense-organs. He is sure to get entangled in some form of idolatry, if he permits his judgment to be biased by anthropomorphic, zoomorphic or phytomorphic ideas that constitute the stock-in-trade of all human thought. It will serve no good purpose if we seek to drag down within the jurisdiction of blundernig unspiritual thought the Entity Who transcends such thought. Is the range of the thought of man really unlimited that it can legitimately aspire to accommodate God? It is surely foolish to suppose that the apparent aspect is necessarily more important than the real entity.

The mischief, that is likely to result from any attempt to evaluate the facts of spiritual experience when they are presented to the judgment of man in an apparently tangible form by the inconclusive logic of mundane experience, may be illustrated by the following amusing story. A poor widow put her boy to school and, by dint of begging from door to door, managed to find the where-withal for his maintenance. The child, of course, began his studies at the Alphabet. On the expiry of half a dozen years of schooling the boy was promoted to study Euclid's Geometry. He was over-heard by his mother as he was reading the sentence, "Let A, B, C be a triangle." This made the widow very sad. She thought that the boy had been unable to get beyond his Alphabet, although he had been at school for so many years and she had been driven to her wits' end to find the means of his subsistence during this long priod. But the poor widow committed a great error of judgment. What she failed to understand was that the Alphabet in the two cases was not the same thing, although it might seem to her to be identical.

We must not assume the Entity of the Absolute to be any finite, disjointed object. He is nothing like an unintelligible section of the Whole, although by the constitution of our present equipments for the acquisition of knowledge we cannot have access to the whole truth of anything. There is similarity as well as dissimilarity between the language and experience of self-realised souls and those of ignorant worldly persons. This dissimilarity is of a nature that cannot be understood by our present defective judgment. If we are self-sufficient, there would be no God and no necessity of worship. We can be relieved of our native ineligibility for worship only by the causeless Mercy of the Transcendental Object of worship.

A Word to our Madhwa - Vaishnava Brethern

There is a fundamental justification in seeking to approach the past history of a sect, specially in this country, on the basis of the prima facie authenticity of the Guru-parampara as preserved in the sect. We would be more scientifically employed if we turn our attention to obtaining greater information by comparative study of the different records instead of resorting to gratuitous assumptions against the validity of the preceptorial lists.

For this very cogent reason we must accept as historically valid the existing preceptorial list of the Madhwa-Gaudiya Vaishnava sect till its authenticity in any particular is conclusively impugned by specific historical evidence. We have had no cause up till now to suspect the truth of any portion of this list.

This list discloses the fact that the Supreme Lord Sree Chaitanya accepted Sree Ishwara Puri as His preceptor. Sree Ishwara Puri was a disciple of Sree Madhavendra Puri.

Sree Madhavendra Puri is a most renowned Vaishnava. He is, in fact, the great founder of the society of transcendental lovers who adhere strictly to their all-absorbing passion for the Amorous Transcendental Hero, Sree Krishna. This constitutes a great development of the original doctrine of Sree Madhwacharyya. In spite of this peculiarity of the teaching of Sree Madhavendra Puri, the list of the former Gurus shows that Sree Madhavendra is descended from the line of Ananda Tirtha in the ascetic order of the Madhwa Vaishnavas. There is really nothing against the genuineness of the list of the Gurus of the line of the Madhwa Vaishnavas.

Some misguided critic may try to rashly propose to disconnect Sree Madhavendra from the line of the Gurus of the Madhwa Vaishnavas, by asserting that the Madhwa Sannyasins are known as Tirthas and that no Puri Sannyasin can have admittance into their ecclesiastical order. But the solution of this apparent difficulty is offered by an incident in the authentic career of the Supreme Lord, Sree Krishna Chaitanya. He is stated to have embraced the order of the Bharati Sannyasins. But He was also stated to be a disciple of Sree Ishwara Puri. This irregularity is to be ascribed to the practice of attaching their surnames by the older associations. The different Guru-paramparas show the same line. So we cannot discredit these records by basing our arguments on assumptions and ordinary argument from current practices. Moreover, whenever there is any congregational gathering of the different schools of Vaishnavas, the Gaudiya Vaishnavas, as a class, introduce themselves as belonging to the line of Sree Madhwacharyya. These are hard and indisputable facts and cannot be lightly explained away by inferences based solely on certain practices of either sect.

If, however, the Gaudiya Vaishnavas actually preferred to brand themselves as Madhwa Gaudiyas as a matter of history, enquirers would naturally be anxious to know whether the servants of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas subscribe in toto to the professions and practices of the Madhwas, or whether they differ from the older school in some other points. In case they have a distinctive reference, enquiry should naturally start to make a list of the differences between the two schools. This comparison should necessarily be made in regard to their practical activity, social procedure, philosophy, theology and different performances due to all these, —or, in other words, the examination should embrace both their exoteric and esoteric differences.

If we take up the practical activities of the Madhwa and the Gaudiya Vaishnavas for the purpose of such comparison, we find that the former put themselves under a severe reserve in their propagatory methods, whereas the latter are vigorously proselytising. The Madhwas keep up the old habits and ideas, whereas the Gaudiya Vaishnavas have advanced towards and utilized everything facilitating the true cause of devotion. The former are very fond of Archan according to the Pancharatric system ; whereas the latter, though not diffident to adopt Archan, yet in addition to that, they perform Bhajan like the Dasakoota section of the Madhwa community. The Gaudiya Vaishnavas give more stress to Bhajan than to Archan of the Vyasakoota section of the latter community. The habits and customs of the Southern Indian Vaishnavas are different from those of Northern Indian Gaudiya Vaishnavas, though both of them have a common base and origin as their guiding principle.

Turning to their respective social procedures we find that there is one great point of resemblance. Brahmanas are alone considered to be eligible for the service of God by the Madhwa community. Brahmanas are accordingly in sole charge of the religious institutions of the sect. They alone conduct all public and private worship. This is also the practice of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas. But in this matter also there is an important distinction between the two. The point has already been referred to in connection with propaganda and proselytisation. The Madhwas are not prepared to go outside the pale of the caste Brahmanas for imparting initiation for worship. In this they are in one sense too narrow in comparison with the method of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas. Sree Chaitanya accepted all who possessed the real inclination for leading the exclusive spiritual life and bestowed on them even the position and function of the Acharya. Thakur Haridas, the great Acharya of the Gaudiya sect, was a Muhammedan by parentage. Most of the Gaudiya Vaishnava Goswamis were not caste Brahmanas.

In another respect, however, the Madhwa practice is more lax than the practice of the Gaudiya society. No person is entitled in the Gaudiya community to mantra diksha unless he or she is prepared to submit unconditionally to follow the instructions of the Acharya in every particular of actual conduct. By this test caste Brahmanas are also liable to be ineligible for the service of God in the Gaudiya community, if they are not prepared to give up their unscriptural mode of life by submitting to the autocratic rule of the Acharya.

Gaudiya Vaishnavas claim to follow the real principle of the Scriptural Varnashrama institution in the organisation of their spiritual society. Whereas the Madhwas follow the hereditary principle which is seldom applicable in the present age when few persons possess either the habit or the inclination to follow the spirit of the Shastric regulation. Judged by the test of loyalty to the spirit of the Scriptural regulation, the Gaudiya community may justly claim to be far more conservative in their social practices than the Madhwas.

Proceedings of the Forty-first Session of Sree Nabadwipdham Pracharini Sabha.

The Forty-first annual sitting of the Sabha was held on Thursday, March 21, at the Avidya Haran Auditorium. Owing to heavy shower and high wind the sitting could not take place at Sree Yogapeeth, as in previous years. The work of the Sabha commenced in the evening after the Aratrika. The Editor Who presided entered the Hall at 7 p. m. in the midst of acclamations. The Editor took the chair on the proposal of Sj. Arun Kanta Nag, Zemindar of Barudi, Dacca, seconded by Sj. Pandit Pranabananda Brahmachari read the names of successful candidates who appeared at the Bhaktisastri Examination held at Sreedham Mayapur, and also of students appearing from Paravidya Peetha, Sree Mayapur, who came out successful in the different branches of the Government Sanskrit Examinations held last year.

Tridandiswami Srimad Bhakti Sarvaswa Giri Maharaj expressed the deep sorrow of the Sabha for the departure from this world of the following well-wishers and helpers of the Mission :—(1) Dr. Pramatha Nath Nandi ; (2) Nafar Chandra Pal, Zemindar ; (3) Hari Das Saha ; (4) Sasadhar Goswami ; (5) Gopal Chandra Mukherji ; (6) Babulal Das, (7) Upendra Das; (8) Kaviraj Shyamadas Bachaspati; (9) Dr. W. B. Moreno; (10) Chaitanya Chaturi Dasadhikari ; (11) Jatindra Nath Pal ; (12) Rajendra Mohan Pal Chowdhuri ; (13) Dr. Ekendra Ghose ; (14) Rashbehari Das ; (15) Kamala Kanta Das ; (16) Swami Nath Pillai ; (17) Krishna Das ; (18) Brindaban Chandra Bhattacherji, Bhaktibhusan ; (19) Wife of Mr. Panirulla Pillai.

M. M. Pandit Ananta Vasudeb Brahmachari read the names of the following who had been awarded the garb of Tridanda Sanyas by the Editor during the year :—(1) Srimad Bhakti Sudhir Yachak Maharaj, (2) Srimad Bhakti Kevala Audulomi Maharaj. The garb of Babaji had been conferred on Sripad Radha Govinda Das Babaji, and Adwaita Das Babaji.

Sripad Benode Behari Brahmachari, referring to the high qualities of the following Sanyasi preachers of the Mission, thanked them on behalf of the Sabha for their care and zeal in promulgating the Teachings of Sri Gaursundar:—(1) Tridandiswami Srimad Tirtha Maharaj ; (2) Srimad Bharati Maharaj ; (3) Srimad Bon Maharaj ; (4) Srimad Nemi Maharaj ; (5) Srimad Giri Maharaj ; (6) Srimad Srauti Maharaj ; (7) Srimad Sagar Maharaj ; (8) Srimad Sridhar Maharaj; (9) Srimad Bodhayan Maharaj ; (10) Srimad Audulomi Maharaj and (11) Yachak Maharaj.

M. M. Pandit Sundarananda Vidyavinode, B. A., expressed the appreciation of the Sabha of the services rendered by Pandit M. M. Narayandas Bhaktisudhakar, Bhaktisastri. He is doing Herculean labour in connection with the publication of the Harmonist, assisting Srimad Bon Maharaj and Sj. Sambidananda Das in conducting their devotional activities outside India. He then spoke a few words in praise of M. M. Pandit Kunja Behari Vidyabhusan who is at the root of all active services manifested in various ways. He spoke of him as service personified. One who looks at the Marble Temple of the Gaudiya Math of Calcutta, Bhaktivijoy Bhawan at Sridham Mayapur, the magnificent Temple at the Birth-site of Sriman Mahaprabhu cannot but inseparably recollect the name of this calm, serene, devoted personality of the most beloved of the Acharya. He carried out the desire that was uppermost in the mind of the Editor by securing a plot of land at Radhakunda this year. The speaker next expressed the grateful thanks of the Sabha to M. M. Pandit Aprakrita Bhaktisaranga Goswami referring to his great and manifold services to the Mission. He always takes an active, sincere and prominent part in fulfilling the desires of the Acharya. The best thanks of the Sabha were offered to Srestharya Sripad Sakhi Charan Roy Bhaktivijoy for his unflinching and sincere loyalty in the service of Sree Guru and Gauranga and for undertaking the construction of the magnificent Temple on the Birth-site of Sri Gaursundar. Bhativijoy Prabhu has dedicated himself body, mind and soul for perfecting the construction, decoration and electrification of the Temple. He has financed a telephone service for Sridham Mayapur. His eldest son Sj. Pramatha Nath Roy and his pious wife are most enthusiastic helpers in the devotional works of Bhaktivijoy Prabhu. In this connection the Sabha thanks Sj. Charu Chandra Srimani B. E., and Sripad Revati Raman Brahmachari for their untiring services in planning and supervising the construction of the Temple.

Srimad Bhakti Vilas Gavastinemi Maharaj offered the grateful thanks of the Sabha to the following gentlemen mentioning the specific assistance rendered by each to the cause of the Mission :—Seth Kissen Chand Lekhraj, Bombay ; Rai Lakshmi Dhar Mahanti Bahadur, Cuttack ; Rai Harihar Prasad Singh Bahadur, Rangoon ; Rai K. A True Grihastha

By Spd. Kishori Mohan Bhaktibandhab, B.L.

There is no exact English equivalent to convey the full intrinsic meaning contained in the word Grihastha, yet for the sake of convenience and ordinary use the English substitute 'householder' may be selected for our present purpose.

The etymological meaning of Grihastha is a man living in a 'Griha' then the monkeys will be termed as non-householders, and beasts, birds and such other worms or insects, that live in their respective appointed resorts, will be called householders. But that is not the case, the true meaning lies deeper than the surface.

The Hindu Scriptures have prescribed four different stages of a man's life and the life of a Grihastha stands second in order. The meaning of the word Grihastha, expressed in the stage of a man's life, is not the same as that stated in the previous paragraph. The four stages mentioned in the Scriptures are,—(1) Brahmacharya, (2) Grihastha, (3) Banaprastha and (4) Sanyasa. One, who lives in the house of his Spiritual Guru to learn the Vedas and to acquire the habit of self-restraint, is called a Brahmacharin. If, mere living in a house would give he name of a Grihastha to anyone then a person living in the house of his Guru to lead the life of a Brahmacharin would also be called a Grihastha. Further the Banaprasthas and the Sanyasis also, who are in the habit of living in some sort of a house, would also be called Grihasthas, if the word be taken in its etymological sense.

The stage of life of a Grihastha comes next in order, after that of a Brahmacharin. Residing in the house of a Guru, the Brahmacharins with self-restraint learn the Vedas or the Truths about God. They find ample opportunities for the same by living far away from the temptations of sensuous enjoyments. Out of them some turn out to be whole-life Brahmacharins while others may, by entering the state of wedlock in accordance with the injunctions of the Shastras, take to the life of a Grihastha or householder. Therefore, we find that a true Grihastha is one who, after undergoing training as a Brahmacharin in the house-hold of his Guru, enters the life of a householder by the sacrament of marriage.

A household without a wife is not a house in the worldly sense of the term Griha, neither is the owner or occupier thereof a Grihastha. To be a real Grihastha one must, however, be prepared to perform the religious observances for the service of the Supreme Lord, as laid down by the Shastras for the stage of the house-holder, in association with his wife as a partner in the said function. No stage of life under the Varnasrama arrangement should be conceived as divorced from the ideal of the whole-time service of the Supreme Lord. Men, who choose to abstain from the wholetime service of Godhead, are to be classed as stubborn atheists. In this country there has not yet been any great diminution in the number of those who pose themselves as Grihasthas by the sacrament of marriage. But, a careful scrutiny, on the line stated above, should convince us that a genuine Grihastha in the scriptural sense is hardly to be found anywhere. The houses of so-called Grihasthas have become the resorts of unbridled sensuous enjoyments, and the injunctions of the Shastras, laid down for the regulation of the life of a Grihastha, are honoured more in their breach than in their observance. The duties of the life of a Brahmachari not being strictly followed, not only have chaotic conditions prevailed in all stages of life, but even the very foundations of social life have been smashed. At present the life of a Grihastha, as it appears to us, is in reality just the opposite of what it shows to be. It is the life of Grihamedhi who has centred all his affinities and attachments to the Griha (wife) for the gratification of senses. There can be no spiritual stage of life of a man, if it is not based upon the service of Godhead which is the only function of all pure souls.
